(12) In relation to a company registered in Scotland, subsections (13) and (14) shall apply in place of subsection (11).

(13) Where after reasonable enquiry made at such intervals as are reasonable the person entitled to any consideration held on trust by virtue of subsection (9) cannot be found and twelve years have elapsed since the consideration was received or the company is wound up—

(a) the trust shall terminate;

(b) the company or, as the case may be, the liquidator shall sell any consideration other than cash and any benefit other than cash that has accrued from the consideration; and

(c) a sum representing—

(i) the consideration so far as it is cash;

(ii) the proceeds of any sale under paragraph (b) above; and

(iii) any interest, dividend or other benefit that has accrued from the consideration, shall be deposited in the name of the Accountant of Court in a bank account such as is referred to in subsection (10) and the receipt for the deposit shall be transmitted to the Accountant of Court.

(14) Section 58 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985 (so far as consistent with this Act) shall apply with any necessary modifications to sums deposited under subsection (13) as that section applies to sums deposited under section 57(1)(a) of that Act.

(15) The expenses of any such enquiry as is mentioned in subsection (11) or (13) may be defrayed out of the money or other property held on trust for the person or persons to whom the enquiry relates.'.

(m) for the purpose of enabling or assisting an authority in a country or territory outside the United Kingdom to exercise corresponding supervisory functions.".

2. After subsection (1) of that section there shall be inserted—

"(1A) In subsection (1) above 'corresponding supervisory functions' means functions corresponding to those of the Secretary of State or the competent authority under the Financial Services Act 1986 or to those of the Secretary of State under the Insurance Companies Act 1982 or to those of the Bank of England under the Banking Act 1979 or any other functions in connection with the rules of law corresponding to the provisions of the Insider Dealing Act or Part VII of the Financial Services Act 1986.

(1B) Subject to subsection (1C), subsection (1) shall not preclude publication or disclosure for the purpose of enabling or assisting any public or other authority for the time being designated for the purposes of this section by the Secretary of State by an order in a statutory instrument to discharge any functions which are specified in the order.

(1C) An order under subsection (1B) designating an authority for the purpose of that subsection may—

(a) impose conditions subject to which the publication or disclosure of any information or document is permitted by the subsection, and

(b) otherwise restrict the circumstances in which that subsection permits publication or disclosure.

(1D) Subsection (1) shall not preclude the publication or disclosure of any such information as is mentioned in section 149(5) of the Financial Services Act 1986 by any person who by virtue of that section is not precluded by section 148 of that Act from disclosing it."

(3) For subsection (3) of that section (competent authorities) there shall be substituted—

"(3) For the purposes of this section each of the following is a competent authority—

(a) the Secretary of State,

(b) the Department of Economic Development for Northern Ireland and any officer of that Department,

(c) an inspector appointed under this Part by the Secretary of State,

(d) the Treasury and any officer of the Treasury,

(e) the bank of England and any officer or servant of the Bank,

(f) the Lord Advocate,

(g) the director of Public Prosecutions, and the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland,

(h) any designated agency or transferee body within the meaning of the Financial Services Act 1986 and any officer or servant of such an agency or body,

(i) any person appointed or authorised to exercise any powers under section 81, 93 or 147 of the Financial Services Act 1986 and any officer or servant of such a person,

(j) the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies and the Registrar of Friendly Societies for Northern Ireland and any officer or servant of either of them,

(k) the Industrial Assurance Commissioner and the Industrial Assurance Commissioner for Northern Ireland and any officer of either of them,

(l) any constable,

(m) any procurator fiscal.

(4) A statutory instrument containing an order under subsection (1B) is subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.".

8. After section 451 of that Act there shall be inserted "Disclosure of information by Secretary of State.

451A. The Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, disclose any information obtained under this Part of this Act

(a) to any person who is a competent authority for the purposes of section 449, or

(b) in any circumstances in which or for any purpose for which that section does not preclude the disclosure of the information to which it applies.".—[Mr. Channon.]

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The House will understand why I am moving the Third Reading and not the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry as planned. I know that my right hon. Friend and his family have the deepest sympathy of the House in their tragic loss.

The Bill is a most important measure. The foundations of the Bill were laid in the White Paper on Financial Services in the United Kingdom published in January 1985. I should like to pay the warmest tributes to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) for their work on the White Paper, which was the precursor of the Bill. I also thank my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) for his work.

The importance of the Bill reflects the importance to the British economy of the financial services sector. In many of the financial services the City of London is the international market leader — for example, in international banking where London handles a quarter of the world total of bank lending, in the Eurobond market, and in insurance.

The maintenance of a strong British invisibles sector is an objective of considerable importance to the British Government. But more than in almost any other industry the maintenance of London's position rests upon its reputation for integrity and fair dealing. That is why the Government attach the highest priority to the rooting out of financial malpractice. By establishing a new practitioner-based regulatory system within a statutory framework, the Bill will play a major part in stamping out unfair and dishonest practice.

We have been concerned to create a tough and effective regime which will provide investors with a high level of protection, whilst at the same time avoiding a right bureaucratic structure incapable of adapting with the market. Our system of regulation has to be both effective and flexible. The balance is a fine one. We are convinced that in this Bill we have got it right.

Throughout we have always made it clear that our own views were not rigid and immovable. We have invited and welcomed comments and suggestions. I am most grateful to all those outside and inside the House — especially members of the Standing Committee — for the time and effort they have devoted to helping us get the legislation right. In Committee, we had many long debates. There were moments of humour and drama, and there was the odd defeat here and there. Undoubtedly, the Bill is better for the Committee's consideration.

We have accepted the proposal to give a special recognition in the Bill to the Securities and Investments Board, which hopes to become the designated agency. We have agreed to strengthen the powers of the designated agency over the recognised self-regulating organisations and to transfer more of the Secretary of State's powers to the designated agency. We have deliberately not created a statutory commission but have preserved the vital flexibility of the system. We have strengthened the effective enforcement of the provisions of the Bill by granting immunity to recognised self-regulating organisations. On other points, we are still consulting.

We are now ready to send to the other place a Bill setting out clearly the basic intitutional shape and the powers of our proposed new regulatory structure, with the weight of this House behind it. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Ashdown: The Government foresaw, as early as 1981, the need for comprehensive legislation to protect the investors when it asked Professor Gower to report. It is not surprising that with all that planning, in June 1986, the Government still propose major amendments to the Bill, making it extremely difficult to form a balanced judgment as to whether or not the Bill is adequate. Doubtless, we shall be told that it is all part of flexibility and open-mindedness. Frankly, it looks to me much more like muddleheadedness, confusion and retreat in the face of the vested interested groups which must not be offended prior to passing the plate round to replenish the Conservative coffers.

On Second Reading, I welcomed the fact that the Government had brought forward a Bill to reform the City of London but said that it was not possible to welcome the Bill, as it was then constituted, as an istrument of that intention. Since then, we have fought for a balance, which must be struck, between the need to protect investors and the avoidance of regulations that are too onerous and would only force users of the City of London to go elsewhere, thus causing loss of a great source of wealth for this country.

The Standing Committee, of which I was privileged to be a member, worked constructively. I pay tribute to the way in which the Minister and his staff took care to inform us all with the various briefing notes, which were invaluable.

I do not complain about the basic structure which has been proposed. There is flexibility in the arrangement. Had we legislated for similar flexibility when the Lloyd's Bill was before us, much trouble could have been prevented. There is nothing wrong with the SROs and professional bodies supervising the day-to-day activities of authorised or other persons overseen by the Securities and Investments Board. I am not happy, however, with the fact that the SIB will account for its stewardship in an annual report which, as things stand, we shall have no right to debate, certainly in the early years.

My doubts and worries really start when we look at the flesh that covers this structure. Regulation will be by rules laid down by the SIB. The Bill contains certain guidelines for these rules, but such guidelines can mean all things to all men. When we tried in Committee to obtain commitments on specific matters, we were told that that was not for primary legislation but was for the rules. Therefore, we shall have no say on the content of the rules, that being solely a matter for the Secretary of State or the SIB.

At this stage it is difficult to discover what the rules will be, for those that are available appear to be at best in draft, at second best in a consultative stage, and at worst not yet thought of. What I have seen in respect of competence tests, disclosure by insurance companies of commissions and surrender values, and cold calling fills me with a degree of apprehension, because they seem to lean over backwards time and again in favour of the practitioner. That is not good enough as far as I am concerned; nor will it be good enough, for instance, for the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson), who delivered a clear exposition on this matter on Second Reading. He stated:

"The principle function of both the designated agency and the SROs should not be to provide an easy working machine which is not subjected to criticism. Their principle objective is to protect investors.—[Official Report, 14 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 991.]

I could not agree more. But what guarantee is there that the Secretary of State will take that attitude when he examines the rules? Even if he did, what enforcement powers are there? It is one thing to have rules; it is another to apply them; and it is yet another to ensure their proper application and enforcement. Although I am happy that the SIB now has the power to insist on rules for the SROs, I very much regret that the Secretary of State has not seen fit to give it direct powers of enforcement. Apparently, he is happy for the SIB to rely on an application to the courts—probably a slow and ponderous procedure at best—or to invoke the nuclear deterrent of a revocation of recognition.

It is with equal regret that I note, despite a useful debate on clause 20 in Committee, that the Secretary of State has now decided not to give the SIB "intermediate powers" over recognised professional bodies. The quality of the work that the SIB will do, even inside what I regard to be its too limited powers, will in large part depend on the quality and type of persons appointed to it and the quality of the information available to them.

I make two complaints on that score. First, I am extremely unhappy that the Governor of the Bank of England has a veto. It is unnecessary, and it turns out to be present for political purposes.

Mr. Nelson indicated assent.

Mr. Ashdown: I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's agreement. He made an effective contribution in Standing Committee on that point.

My second complaint concerns user and independent representations on the SIB. In debating schedule 5 we managed — in a process that must be something like drawing a tooth from an elephant — to get the Minister to say that he expected a "significant proportion" of the board members to be independent people. "Significant" and "independent" are words capable of wide interpretation. I shall not be satisfied that my view is the same as the Government's until I have seen what is meant, and I probably shall not do that until after the Bill is enacted. I will not regard two or three names plucked from the list of the retired or the great and the good as meeting that requirement. Much the same comments could be made about the user content of the SROs.

Even if I am dissatisfied with the way in which members are appointed to the SIB and with the information available to them, I appreciate that the board's activities have to be paid for. I can see the force in the argument that if the board might be paid from state funds, it does have, in one sense, greater independence from those it is regulating. I am even more persuaded by the argument that if it is paid for by the City it avoids the clammy hand, or perhaps under this Government I should say dry hand, of the Treasury from falling on its activities. However, there must be a safeguard, and that safeguard should ensure that the city cannot limit funds to reduce the regulator's effectiveness. It was for that reason that I wanted the Secretary of State to have the reserve power to prescribe fees if he thought that insufficient resources had been made available for regulation. That power was denied.

I shall touch briefly on three other points of concern. I shall deal with them briefly not because they lack importance, far from it, but because time is limited and the measure we are considering is very substantial. I cannot be entirely happy with the scope of the immunity granted to SROs, in particular immunity from damage claimed by investors themselves. That seems to significantly diminish the safeguards to investors. I believe that going further than the clear consensus of the Committee, which crossed all parties, in favour of immunity for the regulators but not going so far as immunity for investors, will be a decision which will return to haunt the Minister in years to come when there will be some problems. This Government will be blamed, rightly or wrongly, for taking a decision which went against the consensus, spanning all parties, which they could have enjoyed in response to pressure from the larger vested interest groups. Whether that is correct or not is irrelevant. That will be the charge levelled.

I think that there are serious omissions from the Bill in respect of activities covered. I would have liked to have seen real property—by that I mean office blocks, shops, factories and agricultural land covered in schedule 1, because such assets are held extensively by pension funds and, therefore, appear indirectly in the savings of millions.

In its present form the Bill will not cope with the growing complexities of the financial services industry, or especially with the big bang, which is round the corner. I shall make a prediction to the Minister. The Bill will have to be changed in order to strengthen it and that will cause a period of instability in the City precisely when the Government wish to cause a period of stability. That will happen in due course. Whether that will happen sooner or later I do not know, but happen it will. If change is to be left in the hands of some, it may well end, as the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) has predicted, as a state organisation. It may be that if we get into that position it will be so difficult to unravel and resolve that that might be the only way left open to us.

In that sense, I believe that the Bill, as it is currently presented, represents a missed opportunity. The crux of the Bill has always been, and has been properly identified by all as being the balance to be struck between maintaining the efficiency and flexibility necessary for the practitioners and the safeguards necessary for investors to ensure probity. The Bill, in its final form, comes down, as I suppose we might always have suspected with a Conservative Government, far too much on the side of the City and far too little on the side of the small investor.

Mr. Gould: We welcomed the introduction of this Bill, we recognised the need for it and we agreed with the principle and broad structure of it. In particular, we thought that it was right to strike a balance between statutory regulations and a statutory framework and a substantial element of self-regulation. That was our starting point. I think that it is fair to say that, as we proceeded with the Bill, especially in Committee, we made substantial improvements to it.

The Minister was generous in his recognition of the work of the Committee, sometimes against opposition from Conservative Members or, at least, his civil servants. The Committee managed to make major improvements to the working of the Bill. It is fair to pay tribute to Conservative Members, as well as to my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) for managing to construct the sort of all-party consensus which was our objective from the outset and which produced an unusually constructive approach to the matter.

It is a matter for regret that, having agreed in principle with the Bill at the outset and having played our part in making the Bill a better measure, we continue to regard the Bill as a missed opportunity. It is defective, not only in the myriad small ways which the hon. Member for Yeovil enumerated, but in major matters. It does not cover the ground that it should cover. The exclusion of Lloyd's is a blot on the Bill and the Government. The failure to put in place a proper independent statutory commission will be regretted by the Government and is already being regretted by the City. Because we believe that those failings are important, we shall return to them when we return to Government and we shall vote against Third Reading tonight.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Patronage (Benefices)

Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, having been signified.

Sir William van Straubenzee (Wokingham): I beg to move,

That the Patronage (Benefices) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England, be presented to Her Majesty for Her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

I must first declare a personal interest, in that I am the patron of a living. The House well knows that such matters can no longer be passed for any financial consideration — quite rightly — and have not been for many years, so I have no financial interest to declare. Nevertheless, I wish the House to be aware of my personal interest.

At this hour, I think that the House would like me to explain the Measure, but not at inordinate length. The Measure is very different from that which originally saw the light of day some years ago and which, as some of us here recall, excited considerable opposition and anxiety. It sought, in whole or in part, to abolish patronage.

I think that it was wise for there to be a period of consultation and reconsideration. What is now before us is a very different Measure. It retains the right of patronage, although it makes what I believe are several improvements in the law which I shall describe briefly.

The House has the advantage in these matters of the report of the Ecclesiastical Committee, the legislative Committee of the General Synod and, in recent years, the verbatim report of the proceedings before the Ecclesiastical Committee which, painstakingly, as with other measures, studied this measure and decided to report to both Houses that it was expedient.

The measure has four purposes, the first of which is to establish certainty. I hope that this purpose was secured by expert approval. Part I, schedule 1, to the measure provides for a register and lays down careful regulations about how that register should be established. The provisions concerning the register deal with the right to appeal and other measures which, I am sure, the House would not wish me to spell out in detail.

At present there is no central register. I hope that all hon. Members would agree that it is beneficial to those in parishes, to the diocesan bishops and to patrons that there should be a conclusive register.

The second purpose of the Measure is to confirm and put in legislative form the collegiality and partnership which is now the accepted pratice, in most cases, when appointments are being considered. Over the years I have been responsible for one parish, then for a parish with another joined to it and lastly responsible for a parish with colleagues in a joint patronage. We would never have considered it possible to proceed without careful consultations with the laity of the parishes concerned. We carried out such consultation at all stages. Hon. Members will be aware of certain rights which are given to parochial church councils.

Part II of the measure provides, in legislative form, for the provision of collegiality, consultation and partnership when dealing with the appointment of the new incumbent. If some hon. Members are rather concerned at the unnecessary elaboration of those arrangements, may I say that it is possible, if there is consent on all sides, to dispose of those arrangements. It is necessary to have such provisions in the cases—I hope they are few—when a person is disposed not to operate the provisions. It is right for the House to make sure that those rights are enshrined in law. I attach considerable importance to the third purpose of the Bill. I find it offensive that, in the 1980s, there should be only two classes of persons, Roman Catholics and Jews, who are specifically identified as persons who may not exercise right of presentation. We all understand the historical reasons for this, but I do not think it accords with the attitudes of the 20th century. I shall be happy to see that go. In precisely the same way as I as an Anglican would not expect to play an effective and active role in the appointment to some position of importance in another church, it is not unreasonable that the person concerned, who will exercise his right of patronage, shall be able to say that he is a communicant member, as defined, of the Church of England.

I make it clear that the person concerned does not lose the right of patronage. It is the question of the presentation at the time in question, so if it were, for example, in a family—this is real to me in my family—it would at a later stage, or as the case might be. I hope that the House will feel that it accords far more with the general approach and attitudes of the present day that this narrow discrimination should be eliminated. Nevertheless, there should be a requirement for the person exercising the right of presentation to be a communicant member of the church to which he or she is appointing somebody of great importance to the active congregation concerned.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): Having served with my hon. Friend on the Ecclesiastical Committee, I should know what he means by the term "presentation". But will he explain it?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I was seeking to distinguish, but doubtless very inadequately, between the fact that a patron remains a patron, whether or not there is a vacancy, and that a person who is not a communicant member of the Church of England remains a patron regardless of that fact. If there comes a vacancy and either he or she has to exercise that right, that is the moment at which they have to say that they are a communicant member of the Church. Do I properly explain that?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In those circumstances, does the bishop have more power or less in the right to a presentation where the patron is not a communicant member of the Church of England, so that the bishop would be the one to nominate the incumbant?

Sir William van Straubenzee: No, Sir, I think not. The position of the bishop is the same in both circumstances, so he has neither more nor less power. A right is invested in the patron who is not a communicant member to nominate one who is. That nomination is a matter for the patron concerned, and has nothing to do with the bishop. I hope that my hon. Friend feels that that is a satisfactory answer. I am glad to see that my hon. Friend is nodding his assent.

It is inevitable that when we start on an operation such as this there will be considerable number of anomalies in the law that need bringing up to date. I can illustrate this. It is because it is correctly no longer possible, nor has it been by a decision of Parliament made many years ago, for an advowson to be bought or sold, so equally it is no longer appropriate for certain rights to be associated with property that can be bought and sold, and to which is attached an advowson, because the advowson no longer has any financial importance, nor would the House feel that it should. Such matters are dealt with in the fourth purpose of the measure.

I feel sure that the House appreciates that the Ecclesiastical Committee, to my certain knowledge because I am a member of it, looked at this matter most exhaustively and carefully and decided to report to Parliament that the Measure is expedient. I have the figures but I will not bore the House by reciting them. It was overwhelmingly approved. I see that the voting figures record only four House of Clergy against, and no voting against in the House of Bishops or the House of Laity by the General Synod.

I hope that the House will feel that I have trodden a middle course between treating the House merely as a rubber stamp—which I would never do, because it certainly is not a rubber stamp for Church legislation and I hope never will be—and taking too long. I commend the Measure to the House.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Firstly, may I dispose of a procedural point which is also in a sense a constitutional point, that was first established some two years ago, I think, in connection with the Appointment of Bishops Measure. It is that we were privileged to have with us for a short time at the commencement of the debate the chairman of the Conservative party. He was in dinner dress in order to signify the Queen's consent to our entering upon these proceedings. It is, of course, upon the advice of the Government that the Queen's consent is given and that was intimated by the distinguished source from which the message was conveyed to us this evening.

I place on record again as was done emphatically two years ago, the fact that no Government approval of the Measure, no espousal of the Measure by the Government, is implied in their providing the assistance to the House of the Queen's consent to our entering upon the matter. It is merely the means by which the Government facilitate the consideration by the House of Measures that come to it from the General Synod. There is no party issue or Government interest, and I assume that the Government would certainly not intend in any way to use their influence for or against such a Measure. In this context, the Government, as the Government, are very properly neutral.

One major matter arises from this measure and it was dealt with faithfully by the hon. Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee). It is the change in the religious qualifications for the excercise of the function of patronage. Hitherto, that exercise has been forbidden exclusively to Roman Catholics and to Jews. I see no reason why either a Roman Catholic or a Jew could not exercise the lay functions of a lay patron in the filling of a living with as much consideration and as much wisdom and propriety as anyone else. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Wokingham that this was an invidious limitation and it was high time that it was removed. The Synod has not proceeded by way of removing that limitation. It has not proceeded to enfranchise in the matter Jews and Roman Catholics. On the contrary, it has disfranchised everbody except Anglicans who have taken communion according to the rites of the Church of England or the rites of a church in communion with the Church of England within the preceding 12 months. A religious test of that nature has been imposed upon the exercise of a function of patronage.

[Mr. J. Enoch Powell]

The Ecclesiastical Committee was clearly horrified by the possibility that an indulgence which everybody would wish to be extended to a lay patron who was a Roman Catholic or a Jew should be exercised, heaven forfend, by a Methodist or a Baptist. I stop there for a moment to invite the House to contemplate the horrific consequences of a lay patron who happened to be a Baptist actually proceeding to exercise the functions of patronage. But that was not all, because further horrors were envisaged by the Ecclesiastical Committee to the effect that it might be a Mohammedan, a Hindu or a athiest who, but for the provisions in the Measure, could exercise the functions of a patron.

There is an important issue at stake here. We are dealing with the functions of lay patrons, who may be, by the process of acquisition of the advowsons, of any religion or of none, and the Synod of the Church of England has told the House that it is its wish that that function should be limited to those who are confessionally members of the Church of England. That was candidly brought out by the hon. Member for Wokingham, who said that in exactly the same way I noted his words, because I do not agree that the way is exactly the same — he as an Anglican would not expect to exercise a function in making appointments in any other church. Indeed not, but we are dealing with the Church of England, which is the established church of this land — the church which is the possession of all who inhabit England. Therefore, the considerations that should apply to the exclusion of persons who are not Anglicans from the exercise of the rights of patronage are different from those which would apply in the private and interior arrangements of any other church or sect.

Indeed, the Bill — admittedly on a small scale — is an example of the tendency, which I fear is implicit in many of the procedures of the General Synod, to approximate the Church of England to a sect and, to that extent, to deprive it of the character of universality in the realm of England, which is one of its characteristic and beneficent marks.

It is not right to impose a confessional test upon the exercise of the right of ownership of this hereditament of the patronage or advowson. If we do that, we raise several questions. This is not the only or the most important context in which advice may be given, or steps may be taken, in relation to appointments in the Church of England by persons who are not necessarily members of the church. Will we be told that it is the view of the General Synod that all those who are responsible for acting to make appointments in the Church of England should be communicant members of the Church of England? That would be a decisive declaration that the Church of England had become a sect, and had ceased to be the national church under the headship of the Crown in Parliament.

There are wide and far-reaching implications in this apparently minor adjustment in the qualifications for the exercise of the right of patronage. That departure and its implications should be signalised on the occasion of this measure, so that we shall not be told in future — I am afraid that it is becoming a characteristic of the proceedings of the General Synod in regard to Parliament that a small encroachment is made and is then claimed as a precedent — that we have created a precedent for saying that, in other respects, appointments and steps leading to them in the Church of England may be made only by persons, and advice may be offered only by persons who are communicant members of the Church of England.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. Does not his arguement imply that there is a defect in the current practice of the Church of England, which when someone seeks membership requires that person to renounce membership of other Christian churches by formal statement before being admitted into the Church of England? That is inconsistent with the principle of universality or national church that he was expounding.

Mr. Powell: The hon. Gentleman has told me something of which I was unaware. I was unaware that any such act of renunciation was required of parents who bring a child for baptism, or even of those who, present themselves for the first time to receive holy communion in the Anglican church. It may or may not be that the hon. Member is well informed. I am not aware that there is such exclusivity in the nature of membership of the Church of England in such a deed of renunciation that has to be made before a person resident in England can exercise his legal right to the ministrations of the Church of England.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Adults seeking membership to the church who belong to other parts of the church are asked to accept the 39 articles. Given what some of those articles say, it may well cover the point made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I am much obliged.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I wish to associate myself with the central theme of the remarks made by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that we have on all occasions to assert in the House that the Church of England is a national, not a sectional, church. We must on all occasions that we can articulate the primacy of the Crown in Parliament in the regulation of the affairs of the Church of England. The Church of England is not a sectional church. It can never be so. If it ever wishes to become so, it will simply fall apart into its own individual elements, and it will count for nothing in the country.

For myself, I find it impossible to oppose the measure. However, in saying that, I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) that in my opinion it is a quite unnecessary measure. As we have been told, it has had a long period of gestation. On several occasions in its gestation, its final form has been very uncertain. It has veered one way and then another way. Fortunately, as has been pointed out, what we now have is a sensible measure. In its gestation, I think it had every prospect of being a very foolish measure but sense has prevailed.

Nevertheless, over this long period of gestation, a considerable amount of time has been taken up first in Convocation — that shows how old it is — then in Synod and in various committees, trying to work out what would be the best method of securing a general patronage law for the Church of England. I am not aware of any evidence at present which shows that such a measure is necessary. I am not aware of any substantial abuse of existing procedures which compels changes to be made. It would have been a very good thing if Convocation and then Synod had decided to leave well alone, but they chose not to.

I assert further that in all these synodical discussions and committees involving people travelling up to London no doubt from all over the country, considerable sums of money have been spent over the years. That money would have been much better spent within the Church of England in securing a wider number of clergy and deploying that clergy in parishes throughout the country.

The fundamental of the Church of England is that it is a parochial church. All its strength lies within its parishes, and not within a synod, a committee or even within a diocese as a diocese. The particular character of the Church of England lies within the parochial ministry.

I for one — and I know that I am not alone — would wish that all the resources of the Church be devoted to parochial church life and to the preparation and training of the clergy to ensure that the clergy is available, and not to the running of the General Synod, the staffing of the General Synod, the running of its committees and so on.

Mr. Simon Hughes: We understand the issue about the cost of administering any body as large as the Church of England. However, I trust that the hon. Gentleman will accept that there is great merit in national debate, both temporal and spiritual, and for the Church to be seen to come together to pronounce on matters of importance to the nation. Since the synods back to Whitby and even further, there has been great merit in the Church coming together to seek a common mind. When it does so, as it did recently on the matter of the Sunday trading with almost total unaminity, it has a substantial effect on the affairs of this place and of the nation. Surely we should not renounce that.

Mr. Powell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I am aware that in the Church of England there are different traditions and groups of people who attach different degrees of importance to various elements within it. I speak as the son of a clergyman. It is 50 years since he was ordained and he has spent 44 years in the same parish. He finds the idea of the national Synod simply preposterous. Not everyone takes that view, but some do — and they should not be ignored. It is not just one obscure country clergyman who takes that view, but vey many.

One danger within the Church of England is that those in the synod had come to believe that the synod is the only thing that matters. One of the very great dangers is for example, that episcopal promotion is now almost entirely granted to those who take part in the affairs of the synod——

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): It always was.

Mr. Powell: I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) is here, and it is appropriate that he should seek to intervene, albeit from a sedentary position. However, he is not correct—it has not always been the case. Many of the greatest pastors of the Church of England have played no part in the convocational synodical discussions.

The greatest danger that threatens parochial life in the Church of England is the way in which episcopal patronage is being exercised. In the days when there were far many more lay patrons, there was an opportunity for independence — for the parson's freehold to grant the independence — which meant that everything was not dependent on the one fountain, which was the bishop of the diocese, and increasingly area bishops within diocese; yet they have no authority in law to exercise the functions that they are increasingly delegated.

Some 40 per cent. of patrons are bishops, but in rural England where parishes are increasingly doubled, trebled and quadrupled — even five, six and seven parishes are put together, as has happened in east Anglia and many other parts of the country — invariably there are different patrons, and then the patronage actually comes to be exercised by the bishop of the diocese. Therefore, although in 40 per cent. the patron is actually the bishop, he is really exercising the patronage in a great many more cases.

It goes one step further. One of the major changes in the Church of Englnd in the past generation has been that the clergy no longer stay in their parishes for a measurable length of time. In any parish church in the country one can see the long incumbancies through the 18th, 19th and early 20th century — but for the post-war era, they are for only three, four or five years. There are parishes close to the parish that my father has held for nearly five decades where there have been 11 changes of incumbant during that time. Bishops are the very people who are sending a man to one parish and then moving him on, and then on again. It means that it is impossible to establish the stability in the parish that holds together the community of the Church of England, which is the very strengh of the church in the parish.

Bishops are not exercising their patronage in a way which is necessarily in the best interests of the parishes, and that concerns me more than anything else. They are entitled to make a judgment, of course, and their resources may not be as adequate as they would wish. One of the depressing features in the Church of England in the past generation has been that the quality of the men who come forward for ordination has not always been as high as in earlier times. I revert again to the case of my father, about which I have personal knowledge. He held a parish in Oxfordshire just before the second world war and he was the only clergyman in the rural deanery who was not a doctor. It is inconceivable now that there could be a rural deanery in which a dozen or more clergymen were all doctors of divinity, music or whatever. The decline in the clergy is there for all to see, and the Church of England has declined with it.

Beyond that, the feature of the measure which worries me are the circumstances in which the bishop of the diocese comes into conflict — perhaps an unspoken conflict, but a real one—with the wishes of the parish when it comes to the appointment of a new incumbent. The old battles between the lay patron and the incumbent that were taken up in Victorian novels in the time of Lady Catherine de Bourg have passed, and we find now that patronage is increasingly exercised by the bishops.

In the parish in which I live new incumbents have been twice appointed in the past decade by the bishop of the diocese, and on each occasion contrary to the wishes of the parochial church council. I have not the slightest doubt that on each occasion the bishop of the diocese had good reason for wanting to make the appointment, but on each occasion his wishes clashed with those of the parochial church council.

What are we left with when that happens in rural England? The parish is told, "If you do not have this man, it is likely that your parish will be joined with another and the prospective clergyman will live in a vicarage or rectory some three, four or five miles away and not in the vicarage or rectory of the community." When that happens, the people feel that they are under an obligation to take what is on offer.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I have some sympathy with what my hon. Friend is saying, but is it not fair to say that under the measure the lay representatives of the parochial church council will be involved in the selection of the new incumbent and will have a veto over the appointment? Does the measure not say that? It does not set out how the representatives will be chosen, whether they will be mandated and how they will operate, and I think it should, but I think it says that the representations of the parochial church council will have an involvement.

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend is right, but beyond that there is something more subtle. Let us suppose that they exercise their veto and the bishop of the diocese says, "There is nobody else who I can offer you"? There may then be another prolonged vacancy. If there is a prolonged vacancy, especially in a small parish, it is likely that the congregation will begin to fall apart. Members of the congregation will drift off to other churches. Long vacancies are bad, especially in small parishes, and they must be avoided. If the issue is pushed to the point of veto, there is a danger that the parish will end up with nothing. That is what worries many parishes as they face ever changing circumstances with new clergymen being appointed to them.

I was brought up to believe in the principle that if it is not necessary to change, there should be no change. I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham that in this instance I cannot find the evidence upon which we should make changes. Accordingly, I think that it would be better to leave things as they are. Having said that, I think that with the important constitutional provisos which the right hon. Member for South Down has articulated and which I fully support, it would not be right to oppose the measure.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Many hon. Members will be in considerable sympathy with the views expressed by the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. William Powell). However, I had difficulty trying to relate what he said to the measure before us. He made some good points, but others were really a cry to understand how the Church of England has declined in they way it has. I fear that it will take more than an hour and a half of parliamentary time to reverse that decline.

Before the debate bagan, I would have put all the money I have on it being an uncontroversial debate. That may be a sign of my frail judgment, or it may be a sign of how interesting this place is – that debates can take off and get a momentum of their own.

I have put aside what I wanted to say. Instead, I shall address myself to the main point made by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). He knows – other hon. Members may not – that on the issue of whether the Church of England should remain a national church, he and I stand shoulder to shoulder. I am destressed at the tendency of the Church to move itself to a sect and to have that cosiness that comes with it.

There is a point of difference between the right hon. Gentleman and I this evening, because I support the Measure. I maintain, as the right hon. Gentleman does, that the Church is a national church and has a mission to the whole nation. Regarding the internal runnings of the Church, we must take on board the difference between the present position and that which existed 100 or 200 years ago. At that time, it was acceptable for a national church to allow other people, apart from the two categories outlined by the Second Church Estates Commissioner, to appoint clergy to livings in the Church of England, when few people in other parts of the Church held that privilege.

Today, it is possible to argue that we should have the exclusive right to appoint people to livings in the Church of England – in other words, practising communicants of that part of the Church – and at the same time maintain that we have a mission to the nation and oppose the Synod when it, as it often does, goes down the path of trying to move the Church to the status of a sect.

The hon. Member for Corby believes that the Synod is a waste of time and resources. When the next elections for the Synod are held, it may be possible for people who hold that view to try to get elected. Then they could try to lessen the number of Synod meetings. If one looks at other parts of the Anglican communion, one sees that Synods do not have to meet three times a year. I sympathise with those who want to see, in certain circumstances stronger leadership from the bishops. I sympathise when they say that they are often bogged down in activities and with committees of the General Synod.

I accept the inconsistencies. I do not put that stronger in the line I take.

Conservative Members expressed their agreement, facially, when the point was made that we are against bishops possessing more power of appointment. As a libertarian, part of me supports that line. As a church which believes in the apostolic succession and obviously gives a certain command to the bishops in the governing of the Church, I feel that to some extent it is overshadowed by the Synod.

I put aside the points I wanted to make to argue with the main point put by the right hon. Member for South Down. As so often happens in these debates, the answers that one gives are not always as neat as one would wish. I recall a statement made by Aneurin Bevan in the Chamber after listening to the then Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain. He said, that it was like a trip around Woolworth—everything was in place and nothing was priced over sixpence. In this life, it is difficult to get everything in place and have nothing priced over sixpence.

Given the circumstances in which the Church finds itself and given that the Church would be better to spend less of its time reforming its internal arrangements, I do not think that on this issue it has done a bad job. I said that I thought that this would be an uncontroversial measure. I notice that, with some sense of timing, the Vote Office today published the women deacons Measure. I thought that I would be able to say that this Measure would be passed peacefully. I do not think that that will happen with the second Measure. Indeed, I am not sure even about this one now.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I must declare an interest as a current member of the General Synod. I greatly enjoy serving on it, and it is not surprising that I do not find it a waste of time. It might be an expensive body to run, but so far I do not think that I have charged my local diocesan synod too much, if anything. I must declare also that I have voted on this measure in the past, both on the Guildford diocesan synod and in my local Dorking deanery synod. I am also a member of the board of patrons in the diocese. That does not mean that I agree with everything in the Measure. We are talking about the established Church of England, which is the property of its people and of the Crown. It is only right that such a Measure should come before the House, because there are 11,500 benefices, 28 per cent. of which are in the hands of individual patrons.

I am concerned that the bishops seem to have more and more power. But I make no criticism of the bishops. There is much to be commended in the historical role of a patron. The village life, with the patron in his personal pew and certain responsibilities, is to be admired. Patrons have a historical right to appoint those people whom they believe to be best suited to their benefice.

Under clause 8 a registered patron must be a communicant of the Church of England. I believe that, as long as a person is not an atheist, he should have the right to act as a registered patron. I regret that a representative has to be found to stand in for him if he is not a communicant of the Church.

The restrictions imposed in the Measure are understandable, but an existing patron—I hope that my hon. Friend the Second Church Estates Commissioner will explain this to me—experiences no such restriction. It is true that many patrons have held their positions for years, but I believe that they should be allowed to continue as patrons. Many churches in Leicester villages are still in tha hands of patrons. One patron has five churches under his command.

As for the registration of patrons, any diocesan handbook lists them and their names are found also in Crockfords. The facts are there already. I cannot unerstand why it is necessary to register patrons when they are already registered. Under the Measure, a patron who cannot make the necessary declaration will not be able to exercise that important right to present. With the united benefices that now exist, his role becomes even more important.

I am especially concerned about the patron's representative. He may be a church warden, who cannot serve as one of the two lay representatives. I am afraid that the patron's representative may on many occasions, be a bishop. That seems to be taking power away from the communicants and giving more power to the bishops. We admire bishops for what they have to do but I do not want to see a magic circle, with the bishop's favoured people coming forward. Indeed, I believe that, to a large extent, the patron understands the communicants and the residents of the parish far more than the bishop. The bishop is far more concerned with issues other than local parochial matters.

The votes in the synod, before I became a member, made it clear that all members of the laity voted in favour of the Measure. The vote was 121 to nil. Only four of the 138 clergy voted against it. I would say, "They would, wouldn't they". It is interesting, having been a member of the synod for eight months, to see how certain members of the clergy perform in front of their bishops, obviously in the hope of preferment in the long run. Some are commendably independent. However, it is almost a closed shop and it seems that the people being promoted and getting new benefices tend to be those who are most supportive of the bishop. I welcome independence in the Church of England, but I am a little worried about that.

There are not enough people coming forward to the Ministry and it is important to get the right kind of people. It is a calling and in controversial questions recently it was clear that, unfortunately, some parents of prospective clergy are deterring their sons from coming forward. It is a calling but there is, of course, a financial increment involved. It is a sad fact but it is necessary because clergy must be able to survive.

The patronage Measures are getting more complex and confusing. I rather like the Trollope way of church life. There was a bit of mystery. Certain favoured people came forward, but I want to ensure that the traditionalists are brought forward for presentation. I know that this measure retains the right of patronage and I know that consultation of the laity will still exist. However, I want the laity to be independent of bishops. I want them to work with the bishops but it is the church wardens who know what is best for their parish. The church wardens, in conjunction with the patron, can decide the future of that church.

Members on both sides of the House agree that a long interregnum is a serious matter. It can damage the future of the Church and these matters have to be speedily resolved. The Average wait for a new incumbent seems to be about eight months, sometimes longer. That is too long. Therefore, we must speed up the way in which incumbants are selected.

The historical relationship is important. The role of the bishop would be purely in a consultative capacity. Sometimes the bishops do not get on with the patrons. The bishop may be new to the diocese and the patron and his family may have been their for centuries. The bishop must pay far more attention to the views of the patron.

The rights to presentation must be carefully monitored, as they must be when the church warden is given the role of presentation. The universities, the Lord Chancellor and representatives of the Crown have a number of rights as patrons. It seems that anyone can be a patron. There is nothing wrong with that; but who is really representative of the Church? Most of the patrons I know have a total interest in the church of England. However, some patrons are the exception and do not wish to get involved in the running of the Church and that is why the Measure has been brought forward. It is right that we should have the Measure for them but not as a general rule. The patron must be a believer, but he must get on well with the church wardens. He will appoint them as the parish representatives, but both of them must listen to what the paraochial church council would like.

[Mr. Peter Bruinvels]

Clause 14 gives the power to the bishops to appoint a priest to the benefice. I would much prefer to see more emphasis put on clause 15, with the patron appointing his personal choice. However, clause 15 provides for the approval of the bishop. We should consider that because we must maintain the independence of mind which some patrons have had and which has preserved the Church of England from the modern laissez-faire approach, which is more Socialist than Christian.

We must also consider the role of the archbishop. Sometimes difficulties arise, and the archbishop must review the position. I hope that the need to introduce an archbishop to resolve a disagreement never arises. Existing patrons must be allowed to continue their good work.

The measure is complex, and having heard some of my colleagues speak I am tempted to wonder why it is necessary. Indeed, has not the Church of England been getting along nicely? We should encourage more people into the ministry so that we have a wider selection of candidates. The number of people applying for the Advisory Council for the Church's Ministry has so deteriorated that the Church should develop its skills in promoting itself in the market and encouraging more believers to come forward.

Clause 8, on the exercise and rights of presentation, should be noted with interest. The appointment of today's clergy is important to preserve the impartiality of the Church of England and the Christian faith which needs guidance, our help and prayers. We must ensure that the right type of people properly represent the Church. If the wrong people are appointed now, they could be bishops in 20 years' time, and where would the Church of England be then?

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): All those interested in this matter, and certainly all those who are members of the Church of England by admission, baptism or confirmation, will agree with the last point made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). He may not always get such cross-party support.

The substantive issue is how one manages — I am fully aware that it is not only within the lot of men and women to manage — the advancement of the ministry within the Church, and how one seeks by every measure possible to increase the number of people able to give full-time ministry to the Christian gospel in this land. We are doing pretty badly regarding the number of those who are full-time ministers and the number who believe in the Christian faith.

Two colleagues from the House—who in this context and I hope on other occasions the Official Report will permit me to call my hon. Friends, although they are not party colleagues — the hon. Members for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Bury, North (Mr. Bury), and I were in the Anglican church in the Alexandra township outside Johannesburg in South Africa a week and a half ago. We were reminded of the enthusiasm and commitment to the Church and gospel there, despite the most horrendous adversity. Between apparently 75 and 80 per cent. of the 27 million population of South Africa still proclaim their belief and adherence to Christianity—as a result in large parts of the missionary work of the past few centuries. When one compares that with the level of Christian adherence here — there is another debate about the link between the Christian belief and the political system —

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I am anxious to be tolerant, but the hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks to the measure before the House.

Mr. Hughes: My point is that we have a challenge to meet because our ability to bring ministers into the Church is certainly more limited and increasingly insufficient to meet the needs of Britain.

The hon. Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) introduced the debate with his customary efficiency and expertise, for which the House will be grateful. I shall deal in turn with each of the four matters to which he alluded.

The first purpose was to establish certainty. It was the simple administrative matter of providing that a record be kept of patrons thoughout the Church. Everyone would welcome that.

The report that was supplied to the House by the Ecclesiastical Committee noted that the matter before the House is "the only major area of the law of the Church of England in which, since 1945 there has not been a Measure designed to modernise and update the law."

Clearly, the measure is also a technical matter. We are told that part of the fourth purpose of the measures is to amend and repeal 35 statutes which go back to the 16th century. It would consolidate the law. I hope that everyone will benefit from a measure that makes the law in this area much clearer. It would be specifically more useful where people were looking for the names and the lists of patrons.

The second and third expressed purposes are the most crucial. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has said that the debate has centred upon certain important issues, despite the breadth of the measure. The second purpose was described in the opening speech as having the intention of affirming collegiality and partnership. Without going into the history of the matter in detail, the report from the Ecclesiastical Committee confirms that the debate on this subject has had a long history in the Church, dating back for decades.

For many years, the Church went in a different direction.

In the mid-1970s the Synod voted on the system of patronage that it had inherited. It came close to carrying an amendment calling for the abolition of patronage. The amendment was carried in the houses of clergy and laity and was lost only in the House of Bishops, because of a tied vote.

I started to consider the matter from the premise that patronage and, thereby the ability of lay people to appoint clergy irrespective of the lay person's position of seniority in the Church, was something that we should do away with. However, I realised that when the Church was divided on the issue it was more important for the Church to achieve unity. The Church has done that. According to the figures available to us only a total of four votes were cast against the Measure in the three Houses as a whole.

I take the view—I respect those of others, as I know do all Members of the House—that when the Church of England takes a clear view, then the House should seek to interfere with that with the greatest reluctance. But the more controversial a matter might be in the Synod and in its result, the more right it is that we should examine it in the House. I say that without betraying my views on the much more controversial subject of the principle of the relationship between the House and the Church of England. That discussion is not for now.

I believe that, given that the Church has found great unity in seeking the right direction and change, we must support the principle of a partnership between the patron, the bishop and the local people. That must be the right way to reconcile the conflicting interests that the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) and others have regarded as often important and useful. Clearly, it is important not to have regular occurrences of a situation in which a bishop proposes for a living someone who the local people find unacceptable. That situation does not make for a good community or relationship between pastoral leadership and congregation.

Occasionally, it is right for a bishop to press the congregation further than they would wish to go. I was somewhat perturbed by one argument put forward by the hon. Member for Corby, which seemed to suggest his lack of conviction in the competence and wisdom of bishops in their appointments. I do not wish to engage now in that debate, other than to refer to it. However, if that is his concern and the bishops are thought not to be sensitive, that should teach us something about the advice given and the methods by which the bishops should properly have a clear view and understanding of the pastoral needs of his diocese. He should be well equipped to make appointments according to its needs and the changing situations. I hope that there is no suggestion within the Church that people are losing confidence in the ability of the episcopate to make those crucial decisions.

The solution proposed combines the wisdom and authority of the bishops with the ability of the people to participate. Being a Liberal, I mischievously thought that it would be wrong—having decided originally as my premise that the patronage system should disappear, but believing in community politics—not to allow the local community to have as much say as possible. I feel that I have now found my rightful position in party political terms—inasmuch as they can ever apply to matters of this sort—by believing that it is right to maintain this partnership.

Another matter that has clearly troubled the House is that of the third purpose—credibility. How appropriate is it for appointments to be made by patrons who are not either Christians or members of the Church of England? I am unhappy that a patron who is neither a Christian nor a communicant member of the Church of England, nor of a church in relationship in communion terms with the Church of England, should have the right to pass that over to somebody of the same designation.

Somebody of a totally different faith, with no particular interest in this inherited right as a patron, might not show any care in the nomination of the member of clergy in question. Such a person might nominate the first candidate who happened, by that definition, to be qualified. In such cases, I should prefer the patronage entitlement to revert to the bishop, rather than have it rest with the nominee of the patron, the patron being a person who might not be a Christian, but alone a member of the Church of England.

A linked question is whether it is right for a patron who is not a member of the Church of England to have the right of patronage. That issue was explored by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) when he spoke of the relationship between the universality or nationality of the Church and the denominations of the other churches.

The Gospel makes it clear that there is one Church, one faith and one Lord. I am not a denominationalist, although I accept that people have chosen to group themselves into denominations, mainly because of the feelings and practices with which they feel comfortable. Having agreed, for the unity of the Church, to maintain the role of patrons, we should not seek to disqualify patrons from exercising that patronage if they assert and affirm the one true Christian faith.

I hope, in those circumstances, that they will show equal concern, as Christians, for spiritual leadership in the Church. They have a responsibility, though it may not be to the Church of their denomination, to exercise their activities with great care.

I support this instrument because it has been required by the Church for a long time. It will allow progress to be made along the lines suggested by the hon. Member for Wokingham. I hope, above all, that in considering the views of this House, the Church will be encouraged to strive even harder to meet the desperate need that still exists in Britain for more people to be called into the ministry of the Church. I hope, too, that the ministry will be ever more empowered to do the work that, more now than ever, we need the Church to perform.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): This is my first opportunity to pay a warm and generous tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) on the manner in which he presented the Measure and for the opportunity, which I count as a great privilege, to serve with him on the Ecclesiastical Committee for seven years.

I should like to relate my speech to the 191st report of the Ecclesiastical Committee, which concerns the matter under debate. I do not accept that the Measure has been a waste of time and energy. It is an important and reforming Measure, and the last in a long line to appear before the Ecclesiastical Committee. It has a major role to play in the future life and work of the Church, especially pastoral care.

I expressed my support for the Measure when the Committee studied it diligently. It embodies some 35 measures that go back four centuries. Clause 1 establishes a register. That is important for credibility. It will be open for the public to examine it. The Measure comes at a historic time for the Church of England. It is established and wide, but I am glad that it still encompasses the evangelical traditions that I hold so dear. The Church's credibility has been tarnished, but the Measure corrects that.

The General Synod considered the Measure and voted as follows: the House of Bishops, 15 Ayes and no Noes, the House of Clergy, 134 Ayes and four Noes and the House of Laity 121 Ayes and no Noes.

The measure has received considerable debate within the Synod in an attempt to produce that which is good and that which will stand the test of time. When the measure came before the Ecclasiastical Committee I and other members of the Committee—they have spoken with so much knowledge tonight—considered it in great detail. I am delighted to say that the measure in not just the best we could do but I unashamedly hold the view that it is a good and reforming measure. The measure will bring with it credibility and in that spirit I wholeheartedly support the measure.

In ecclesiastical terms I must get used to describing the measure as expedient. That was the view of the Synod. In simple terms I wish the measure God's speed. I am quitely confident that it will prove to be a considerable blessing to the Church and the work it undertakes. Some of the criticisms which have been made about patronage do not appear to have anything to do with the measure which is before us.

My simple and perhaps puritanical view is that there is no greater calling on any man than to be called of God. That being so, I am sure that such men will be called and that they will restore this nation to the Christian faith which it sadly appears to have left. This is one of the most important measures dealt with in the Ecclesiastic Committee. I commend it to the House and pray for its assent.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I apoligise for leaving the House for a short time. I find it fascinating that, under this Measure, a patron may be simple-minded but still a communicant member of the Church of England. People are excommunicated automatically only if they are definitely insane. Those who are simple-minded are acceptable communicants of the Church and are able to present someone to a living, but those who are in total possession of their faculties but who practise a different faith are not able to do so. I point out the fascination of that situation to the House. I agree with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) and the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on this matter.

The measure is unclear about the role of the laity. It does say that parochial church councils should be represented when considering an appointment and that its representatives should have a veto over an appointment. It does not say how those representatives will be appointed, whether they are to be mandated or whether they report back to the Church council. Effectively the veto lies with the church council and I agree with that. Such lay involvement should relate to the whole of the parochial church councils.

When the laity have not been involved, or to a small degree only, with appointments, some such appointments are disasterous because the laity of the Church have not accepted the individual because he is incompatible with them. I hope that, one day, the Synod will consider the role of archbishops and bishops when instituting people to livings.

There was a remarkable story of Canon Newell Long, who was appointed by a patron to the living of St. Aidan's, Birmingham, but the then Bishop of Birmingham, Ernest Barnes, refused to institute on the grounds of his Tractarian views, and there was an enormous battle between the Church and the Bishop of Birmingham. Eventually, the Archbishop of the day instituted the priest in Lambeth chapel, but still the bishop refused to recognise or accept the priest. It was a painful and sad situation, to which the Synod never faced up.

Under this measure, the Synod could have picked up such matters, because there are still occasions when bishops say that if a certain person is appointed, they are not sure that they could institute them. These matters do not come out in the open very much, but they exist, and it is tiresome, wrong and dangerous that they do, and something should be done about it. I hope that the Synod will one day face up to this question, which is even more important than the one with which we have dealt this evening.

Sir William van Straubenzee: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to what has been a most helpful debate. The House will acquit me if I do so briefly because it will realise that if the House is to come to a decision tonight, which I sense is the general wish, I have to do so within a general constraint of time, according to our Standing Orders.

I am obliged to hon. Members on both sides of the House who have been good enough to take part in the debate. If my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) will look closely at clause 11, he will see how the lay representatives operate, and he will see that they are representatives and not delegates. That is a difference of which we in this House are rather specially conscious because we pride ourselves on being not delegates but representatives. I hope that when he studies clause 11 my hon. Friend will feel that there is a good deal in it for the lay representation.

Rightly, the House has concerned itself with the point initially raised by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), which concerns the exercise of the right of patronage by a patron who is not a communicant member of the Church of England. I make clear the difference between the ownership of the patronage, on the one hand, and the exercise of the right in any particular vacancy, on the other. I hope and believe that this is not a narrow point.

The right hon. Member used the word "ownership" — I made a careful note of this — and said that it would lapse if the patron was not a communicant member of the Church of England. That is an uncharacteristic slip on his part, for we know him to be an exact person in the use of his words. The ownership continues, if necessary, from generation to generation. This is part of the historical nature of the Church of England as it is constituted, and as I approve of it, although not all would do so. I accept that there comes a point when such a person has to exercise in the vacancy concerned his or her right of presentation, and this is what is set out in the Measure. I realise that there have been some doubts about this.

I agree with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that these are matters of judgment, but I should be relucant, in such an eventuality, to see such a right revert to the bishop. However, I recognise that these are matters of judgment. I much prefer the right of the patron concerned to appoint a representative who is a communicant member of the Church.

I warmly agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) and other hon. Members that the role of the lay patron in the Church of England is immensely important. I agree with that wholeheartedly. Once again I have to record my personal interest, but my hon. Friend the Member for Corby knows about that. The role of a lay patron can be important and often is important, and for that reason I want to strengthen the role. I want to ensure that it can be ascertained without peradventure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) made a most helpful speech, but I do not think that the register in Crockfords is by any means complete. It is interesting to note that the register will eventually be completed and this in itself will strengthen the role of the lay patron. The other provisions of the Measure also help.

The lay patron is often a person with local knowledge, and is sometimes a bastion against a diocesan bishop who may want to move a man who, as the phrase goes, "has problems." The diocesan bishop may want to move such a person to a parish for reasons which may be quite right from his point of view but which are not helpful from the point of view of parochial life in the parish concerned. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby and I are united in anything that will strengthen, as this Measure does, the position of the private patron.

We all listened with great interest and respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby, who told us about the long years of devoted service given to one parish by his father. It brought back to mind, although not from personal recollection, my grandfather's grandfather in my village who was the rector of his parish for 51 years. It was his proud boast that he could drink any gentleman in his county under the table. That is a measure of hospitality that I try hard to maintain. Long service has much to commend it, but equally I see the great benefit nowadays of a proper period of service and then an equal period of splendid service in another parish.

I hope that I have answered the main points raised. The fact that I have not answered at greater length will be understood by the House. Hon. Members will appreciate my problem and will acquit me of discourtesy. I warmly commend the Measure to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved.

That the Patronage (Benefices) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England, be presented to Her Majesty for Her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

Filey Coastguard

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. —[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

12.4 am

Mrs. Elizabeth Shields (Ryedale): The subject of the retention of the coastguard at Filey has been causing widespread concern to many people, both locally and elsewhere. More than a century ago — in 1862 to be precise — a coastguard station was first established to keep guard over the bay at Filey. The geographical features of Filey comprise seven miles of sandy beaches which end in three miles of cliff about 300 ft high at the north end, which is towards Scarborough. The bay is attractive to yachtsmen, canoeists, fishermen, swimmers and divers, but it contains some treacherous undercurrents with which only skilled people can successfully contend.

The necessity of keeping a coastguard at Filey must not be underestimated. The population of Filey and its environs is vastly increased each year during the summer months when as many as 100,000 or 150,000 visitors make their way to this popular seaside resort.

The bay is watched over by a full-time coastguard from a specially constructed lookout window built in the coastguard station. The visual importance of that lookout cannot be overemphasised. Scarborough borough council, Filey town council, and the Filey district home and water safety committee, as well as the Filey auxiliary coastguards, have expressed anxiety about the proposals, which are regarded as just another part of the general erosion of visual watchkeeping to which opposition has already been expressed. Several hundred residents and tourists who visit Filey regularly each year have also written to me on the matter.

The number of reportable incidents — those requiring external assistance, such as the lifeboat, helicopter, police or ambulance — illustrates the extent to which the coastguard helps the public. During the past four years, there has been an average of 33 incidents each summer, and this year to date there have been 10 incidents. The number of incidents that are avoided because of the physical presence of the coastguard is considerably more. Part of the his job is the prevention of accidents — warning people not to surf or swim or advising against putting a boat out to sea. It is impossible to quantify the incidents prevented that might otherwise have ended in tragedy.

Not only visitors use the sea at Filey bay. There is a fishing fleet of 16 cobbles, which put out to sea regularly throughout the year, and in the appropriate season there are an additional 13 salmon boats. During the summer months, six fishing boats take parties of anglers out to enjoy their pastime, and dozens of small boats sail in the bay, most of them without radios. All are kept under surveillance by the unremitting efforts of the full-time coastguard.

Another worrying factor is that the proposed reorganisation will lay the major responsibility for replacement cover on the Filey auxiliary coastguards. That is not a practical idea, since most of the auxiliaries are in full-time employment and would be unable to provide the overall weekly cover required in the summer.

The personnel at Filey have already been reduced drastically. In 1982, there were three coastguards. Two have subsequently retired and not been replaced. A year ago, there were as many as 25 auxiliaries. Today, there are only 11, and I understand that there is little possibility of enlisting more members to the auxiliary. Yet the responsibility for that bay is no less.

It is absurd to say that by merging the sectors of Scarborough and Filey and depriving the latter of its full-time vigilante, the residents of the town, the tourists and fishermen will,

"detect an improvement in the standards of coverage."

This is a prime example of remote bureacrats playing with maps and budgets, without taking into consideration the real local case. I wonder whether the Minister has visited Filey and is conversant with the geography, tides and dangers of the area. I should be delighted to show him round Filey, if necessary.

No money will be saved by transferring the service to Scarborough, although money will have to be spent on converting the toll house at Scarborough when there is already a purpose-built station at Filey. Scarborough also has a harbour master and lifeguards. Neither of those facilities is available at Filey.

One of the most important factors is the excellent Royal National Lifeboat Institution, whose members were not informed of the decision to remove the coastguard, with whom they work in close conjunction. During operations, the RNLI relies heavily on the expertise of the coastguard, who acts as a co-ordinator and monitor for its boats when they are out in the bay.

In his letter, the deputy chief coastguard assured me:

"When it is necessary to provide watch locally at Filey, it will be set, whether on the advice of the auxiliary-in-charge, the Sector Officer or the watch at Bridlington."

Without the visual aid, immediate knowledge of incidents in the bay will be delayed. The Filey auxiliary-in-charge lives in Scarborough. The sector officer, who will spend only two days a week at Filey, will also be based at Scarborough, and the watch at Bridlington is equally remote. Perhaps the Scarborough coastguard will be omniscient as well as omnipresent.

The most important issue in all this is safety – the safety of human life, be it that of a child or an adult. I beg the hon. Gentleman to make this his main priority.

12.9 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) on her good fortune in securing this Adjournment debate.

I welcome the opportunity to explain to the House the circumstances surrounding the change in one coastguard officer's duties at Filey and to demonstrate that, in consequence, there will be no reduction in coastguard coverage on the coastline in the hon. Lady's constituency.

However, I am somewhat perplexed about why the hon. Lady has sought this opportunity to raise the matter on the Floor of the House since Adjournment debates normally follow correspondence in which Ministers have failed to satisfy the Member of Parliament concerned. In this case the hon. Lady wrote to the chief coastguard on 23 April, the letter was received on 28 April, and it was replied to on 2 May. Nothing more was heard until there was a telephone call on or about 3 June to say that the hon. Lady or her office had mislaid the reply to the letter and asking for a copy, which was sent to the House of Commons on 3 June. I make no criticism of the hon. Lady for having apparently lost the letter – it can happen to any of us.

I wonder whether the hon. Lady sought this Adjournment debate in the time when the letter had been mislaid. I say that because, when my hon. Friends the Members for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw), and for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) all raised this matter with Ministers, they received a full response which, I think, clarified the matter.

In her letter on Monday this week to the Secretary of State, the hon. Lady, as in her speech tonight, expressed concern about what she calls the Government's plan to close the vital coastguard service station. The Government have no such plan, they never had and there is no intention to close it, as I would gladly have told the hon. Lady, and will confirm in reply to her letter of Monday this week.

It may help the House if I explain the coastguard organisation. The United Kingdom coastline is divided into coastguard districts, each under the control of a coastguard rescue centre manned 24 hours a day with constant monitoring of radio distress channels and a 999 telephone system. I was concerned – as, no doubt, the hon. Lady is – that the hon. Lady had to refer, no doubt quite rightly, to the fact that boats go out to sea without VHF radio. It is a relatively inexpensive piece of equipment, and I hope that she will join me in urging all who take boats to sea to carry VHF radio because it is their lifeline to the coastguard and to the rescue service that comes with the coastguard.

The hon. Lady will well know that, slightly further north of the lookout point to which she referred at Filey, there is a ridge of cliff beyond which the coastguard cannot see. No matter whether he stands over the telescope or elsewhere, he cannot see it. That illustrates the value and importance of boats having VHF radio. I hope that all Members will seek opportunities to remind those who take out boats that they should ensure that they have VHF radio. It is a small cost for making life more secure.

I can assure the hon. Lady that any part of the coast can be placed under visual surveillance if required, and visual watch is ordered whenever required. That applies especially during bank holidays, when there are many more amateur sailors about – in which number I include myself – which obviously requires more visual watch because of the higher risk involved.

Each of the districts to which I referred – the coastguard districts under the control of a coastguard rescue centre manned 24 hours a day – is divided into sectors with a regular coastguard as sector officer, responsible for recruitment, training, overseeing and administration of the auxiliary coastguards who form the local coastguard company for the unit. The sector officer is not intended to man a watch. He recruits, he trains, and he organises.

The system can well be illustrated by a recent incident off Filey on Saturday 10 May, with which the hon. Lady is familiar. A sailing dinghy capsised, throwing four people into the water. I know the coast a little further north than Filey quite well; the water is very cold and it is necessary to get people out of it very quickly. They did not have lifebelts or any suiting to protect them against the cold. The incident was reported by a 999 call to the coastguard rescue centre at 14.23 hours. It immediately alerted the Filey auxiliary coastguard manning the Filey marine rescue unit. The unit, led by Mr. Parrish, arrived on the scene in five minutes, and having assessed the position arranged the launch of the Filey inshore lifeboat. It was launched at 14.32 hours and, seven minutes later, had effected rescue, no doubt to the relief of the local windsurfer and his friend who had assisted, and, needless to say, to the immense gratitude of those who were in dire trouble in the water. I think that we would all wish to thank Mr. Parrish and his team for what they did and also the RNLI for its sterling and, as always, reliable work.

As I said, the sector officer's job is not to man the watch. He was on that day, having a day off. The first that he knew of the incident was when the RNLI fired its maroons for the inshore lifeboat. The crew already in the boathouse had been alerted by the coastguard through radio pagers; thus the rescue was fully under way without the participation of the sector coastguard. That is no criticism of him, for that is the way that the system is designed to work. In fact, Mr. Cother, the sector officer, although off duty, came as soon as the maroon launching the lifeboat was heard. I would like to thank him for that, and I am sure that the hon. Lady would also wish to do so.

I turn now from the way that the system was supposed to work and did work to the small staffing change that is to take place at Filey. In future, the sector covered by the sector coastguard officer will have 40 auxiliaries in three companies, one of which will be at Filey, and will consist of 14 auxiliares—exactly the same number as now. The lookout is not being closed; it will be used as required. The marine rescue unit remains. The only difference will be that the regular sector officer responsible, not for watchkeeping but for recruitment, training and arranging duties, will be stationed in Scarborough. No one can realistically claim that it should take one man to recruit, train and organise 14 auxiliaries—it does not anywhere else.

It has been claimed that the purpose of this reallocation of duties is to save money. The hon. Lady did not say that, but it has been claimed in her local papers. I wish to make it clear that this rationalisation is to enable increased manning to be provided on the Humber estuary. There is a great deal more activity there. There are various forms of danger and there is mixed shipping. I can assure the House that the sector officer, Mr. Cother, to whom I have already referred, will not lose his employment. He will be offered an alternative post in the coastguard service where he will be more fully employed.

Swimmers do not come within coastguard duties and many local authorities recognise this by providing lifeguards, who mark safe bathing beaches, and watch over them. If the local coastguard unit is aware of a problem, however, it will always seek to help. At Filey, the 14-strong company remains. It is there for any duties which it may be called upon to perform. I cannot too strongly emphasise that there will be no reduction in coast guard services to those in trouble on the sea in the Filey area.

The hon. Lady referred to the proposed changes in her letter—she made a somewhat similar reference in her speech—having "an incalculable effect on the fishing and tourist industries."

If I may say so, that is going over the top a bit. Will there be an incalculable effect in putting the Filey auxiliaries under a different coastguard officer for the purpose of training and rostering? It would seem that the position has been misunderstood and that the hon. Lady's assertion cannot be taken seriously.

As the Minister who at one time had direct responsibility for HM Coastguard, I pay tribute to it for its constant watchfulness round the clock. Regular and auxiliary coastguards alike do a wonderful job right round our coast, including Filey, and will continue to do so. The House and those who go down to the sea in ships, boats, dinghies, and in these days surfboards as well, have every reason to say thank you to them. I believe that that is the right note on which to end this short debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Enterprise and Deregulation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. — [Mr. Garel-Jones.]

9.35 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I welcome this opportunity to discuss enterprise and deregulation. To my knowledge, this is the first occasion on which the House has debated these subjects together. The debate shows the priority which the Government attach to encouraging enterprise and removing unnecessary regulations and it is particularly appropriate following the recent publication of the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers".

I am particularly pleased to be taking part in this debate because of my own involvement within the Government in enterprise and deregulation. I have been the Minister responsible for small firms for three years now, both at the Department of Trade and Industry and now with my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment at the Department of Employment. Enterprise and deregulation are, of course, linked and in my remarks I shall show that one of the best ways to encourage enterprise is to remove unnecessary regulations, which act as barriers to business success and the creation of more jobs. The Government have acted consistently to create favourable conditions for enterprise, through our economic and other policies. We have also taken action to reduce barriers to business success and new jobs. As the new White Paper shows, further action is planned to remove restrictions which prevent business from providing more opportunities for enterprise and employment.

Our policies have aimed at creating the right conditions for enterprise and growth, and the attack on inflation has been rewarded with the lowest level of price increases since 1968. Competitiveness has been improved and the labour market made more flexible. The benefits of this strategy have been seen in a sustained period of growth with increases in manufacturing investment, exports and the creation of new jobs.

We intend to continue this process. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General told the House last week, it is important that we keep our industry competitive by keeping unit wage costs down, improving further the working of the labour market—linking pay with performance, improving training for both young people and adults, and encouraging business and enterprise of all kinds.

In addition to squeezing inflation out of the economy, the Government have taken a wide range of action to free markets and to remove unnecessary obstacles. On coming into office in 1979 the Government took early action to remove controls on foreign exchange, hire purchase, dividends and bank lending. We have also liberalised markets in telecommunications, bus and air services. Privatisation has encouraged wider share ownership and improved business understanding in the economy.

We have cut down bureaucracy in reducing the number of forms and statistical inquiries sent to businesses, and more recently we have produced two White Papers on removing controls which are a burden on business and act as a brake on enterprise. Our aim has been to reduce the time and resources that people in business are obliged to spend in meeting the requirements of Government Departments. Time spent filling in a form or writing to a Government Department could more profitably be spent in running the business, generating products, services or sales.

"Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" contains a balanced series of steps, some admittedly modest, which are intended to help enterprise and employment. It also shows the action that the Government have taken to follow up the proposals in "Lifting the Burden" which was published last year. "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" also marks a first for the Department of Employment in that my right hon. Friend has included for the first time the objectives of the Department. These set the proposals on deregulation in the wider context of the Government's objectives for employment and enterprise.

The White Paper reflects our balanced approach to deregulation. We still need regulations — every society does. We must ensure proper protection for employees and consumers and the environment. The Government do not want to see a free-for-all where the strong exploit the weak. As my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State has said, the line between liberty and licence is a fine one. Where controls are necessary, they will be retained.

The new White Paper also describes the new arrangements that have been established within the Government to pursue deregulation: there is the small central task force on deregulation, known as the enterprise and deregulation unit, based at the Department of Employment and including staff on secondment from other Departments or the private sector; there are the deregulation units in all Departments reporting direct to a Minister with responsibility for reducing burdens on business; and there is a new system to assess the cost to business of complying with new regulatory proposals.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East) rose—

Mr. Trippier: I shall give way to my hon. Friend when I finish this point, because it will particularly interest him, with his concern for small firms. An advisory panel on deregulation, which is a group of nine small business men, has recently been appointed to advise on the problems of deregulation in the real world.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend confirm that there is a deregulation unit reporting to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, who introduced a Bill on Wednesday night that calls on businesses to keep records for as long as 15 years? That seems an excessively long period when the EEC is looking only for 10 years. Will my hon. Friend comment on that burden on business?

Mr. Trippier: Now that my hon. Friend has raised that point, I am under a moral obligation to look at it carefully. I was not aware of the provision introduced by my hon.

and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, but I shall look at the matter further and come back to my hon. Friend on it next week.

"Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" contains some 80 proposals for action to reduce burdens on business. I shall not attempt to explain them all in detail, or even to list them, but it is worth picking out some of the main proposals which meet important concerns of business.

The Government's aim is to make it easier to construct or alter business premises, and the White Paper includes measures to remove from the planning system altogether developments and changes of use that cause no harm to the environment and do not therefore need to be subject to specific controls. My right hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will be announcing on Monday the detailed proposals for changes in the use classes order. These and other planning proposals are being taken forward in consultation with business, the planning authorities and other interested groups.

Taxation — whether through Customs and Excise or the Inland Revenue — is a major preoccupation of business and the White Paper makes a number of important proposals to help enterprise.

The major review of VAT and small business will provide an opportunity to identify precisely the problems being encountered by businesses with the working of VAT regulations, and suggest means to alleviate them. This will be a wide-ranging review, but it will look in particular at the possibility of cash accounting for VAT, annual VAT returns with a possible instalment system of payments and the special schemes for retailers. I know that these are matters of concern to small businesses. The recently introduced VAT penalties will also be the subject of a separate review.

On the Inland Revenue side, we will be modernising the PAYE form P35 which is used for end of year pay summaries and looking further at form P11D on payment of expenses and benefits in kind.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is a broad and widely held feeling among small businesses that the Inland Revenue in particular is adopting an unhelpful attitude to small business? I am inundated with letters from small businesses, which seem to have suffered considerably at the hands of the Inland Revenue, which is taking action against them that is unnecessary and damaging to their continued existence.

Mr. Trippier: That is why we think we should review this matter, and the Department of Employment has made representations to the Treasury on that point, which will be reviewed. My mail bag is heavy with complaints about Customs and Excise, but I have some sympathy with its proposals.

The evidence of the Keith committee showed that two thirds of those liable to pay VAT were paying late. I do not see that any right hon. or hon. Gentleman could possibly countenance that, because if we were to allow it to continue it would discriminate against those who were paying on time. The penalties introduced by Customs and Excise for the late payment of VAT are not particularly onerous. People are given two opportunities to delay payment, and on the third occasion Customs and Excise imposes its penalties. All that said, the Treasury has given us the undertaking that it will review both matters, and I would have thought that that would be welcomed by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Have my hon. Friend's representations to the Treasury included — or will they include — finding an easier test of self-employment and enabling it to be possible for people to be self-employed without being harassed by the Inland Revenue, which has been the experience of many in our constituencies?

Mr. Trippier: That point concerns me in my role as Minister with responsibility for small firms, and I am aware of the ten-minute Bill that was recently introduced by my hon. Friend. Again we have made representations to the Treasury and it has undertaken that, wherever possible, it will explore the progress that can be made to make it more easily discernible as to who is self-employed and who is not. I hope that that will, to a large extent, meet the point.

The White Paper also includes some further proposals to reduce the burden on employers of employment legislation. It has, of course, been said on the Labour Benches that the Government have dismantled the system of rights that we inherited. This is of course absurd. There is in this, as in all matters concerned with employment protection, a balance to be achieved between safeguarding the rights of employees and the encouragement of employment opportunities. The proposals in the White Paper are intended to modernise the system of employment rights to meet the present-day patterns of employment and in particular to encourage the provision of part-time jobs, which are much in demand. Those who say that we have not got the balance right should remember that employment protection legislation has never created jobs.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The hon. Gentleman believes that employment protection has not created jobs, but we are concerned about employment protection rights. What jobs are created, and what help is given to small businesses, by providing for the payment of a deposit by people who wish to go to a tribunal to appeal against unfair dismissal, and restricting yet again the rights of pregnant women to return to work?

Mr. Trippier: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the proposals in the latest White Paper are open to discussion. He will be aware that in the Committee debating the Wages Bill we spent a considerable amount of time saying that it was seen by employers to be a considerable burden, when, from memory, 75 per cent. of claims were settled outside the tribunal. It is seen not only as a cost, but as something of a harassment to those who are concerned about whether they would be taken to an industrial tribunal at a disproportionate cost. That militates against increasing the number of people they employ. Some employers believe that it is not worth having the hassle, trouble and cost of employing people, and rather than make that decision they avoid it and keep the work force at its present level.

Mr. Prescott: I understand what the Minister is saying. Does he mean that, whatever the justification for the unfair dismissal case, the deposit is to be a deterrent to people going to the tribunal? Presumably that is the case because fewer will go to the tribunal and that will be less of a deterrent to the employer to take people on. What about justice?

Mr. Trippier: There will be a reduction in the number of people who might be trying it on taking cases to an industrial tribunal. It has to be made clear, as it was in the White Paper, that the deposit is returnable if the industrial tribunal upholds the case brought by the employee. The White Paper is also a consultation document, and we invited comments from both trade unions and employers' organisations.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Despite the intervention of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), does my hon. Friend agree that on many occasions money is paid into court? That is well understood by litigants and other people, and in many respects this proposal does not depart from the normal state of affairs.

Mr. Trippier: That is right. I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention.

Our proposals on health and safety are based on the report of a special study to see whether the law on health and safety at work and its administration causes difficulties for employers, especially small ones. I am glad to say that the study revealed that the great majority of firms contacted had a strong commitment to health and safety. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) would pay attention, he might welcome what I have just said. It is worth repeating, because I think that he would agree with me about it. The study revealed that the great majority of firms contacted had a strong commitment to health and safety. That commitment is shared by the Government and, as we said in "Lifting the Burden", we have no intention of lowering standards or of removing the necessary protection. We want to ensure that health and safety controls are practicable and as clearly understood by employers as possible. We are keen to improve consultation on new proposals and intend that paperwork or administrative arrangements which do not have practical benefits should be removed.

Mr. Prescott: I should like to make a point about health and safety. All hon. Members agree that standards of health and safety have improved since the setting up of the Health and Safety Commission. If the Minister looks at the evidence, he will see that accidents in the construction industry and in manufacturing industry have increased considerably in the last two or three years, coincidental with the reduction in the number of health and safety inspectors and the relaxation by the Government of some of the regulations.

Mr. Trippier: I do not think that the increase in accidents is related to the reduction in the number of inspectors. It is a cause of anxiety to me that there has been an increase in the number of accidents in the construction industry. I can meet the point made by the hon. Gentleman by telling him that I am more concerned about simplifying the regulations than about deregulation.

When I assumed my new responsibilities for health and safety and combined them with other responsibilities for relatively small firms, I asked for all the leaflets that we were sending out to employers to be brought in the Department. From memory, the number of leaflets was 71. Perhaps we are mad enough to assume that all employers read these leaflets. I found some of the leaflets extremely difficult to understand, and I think that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, and indeed my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), would also find them difficult to understand. There is a case for repackaging some of these leaflets and for simplification, and that is one of my tasks in the Department of Employment.

If one looks at a pamphlet that one expects an employer to read, one might ask oneself whether the pamphlet is necessary. That might lead us down the track of asking whether the regulation itself is necessary. We ought to concentrate on the matter to see whether we can deregulate, but simplification must come first, and the Opposition ought to welcome that.

Mr. Prescott: What about reducing accidents first?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman has a valid point and I am trying to meet it. I would love to show him some of the pamphlets that I examined. They are so full of verbiage, perhaps parliamentary language, and certainly legalese, that in most cases they would confuse the very people whom we are seeking to encourage. If we can simplify them and make them more easily understood, we would get increased compliance.

There are, of course, proposals on other subjects, such as company law, exports, transport and agriculture, and general proposals on licences, communications between the Government and business and on dealing with European Community regulations.

We are anxious to help those in business to get on with their job with a minimum of interference. It is the cumulative effect of regulations that places burdens on businesses, and especially on smaller businesses such as the owner-managed concern. The regulations which must be encountered when moving premises, or when the business grows so that it must register for VAT, or, most important, when the business man or woman wants to take on an employee, can mean that the business simply does not bother. The business does not grow and valuable opportunities for enterprise and employment are lost.

We aim to remove some of the mystery from setting up in business by removing some of the complications so that more people see running their own business as an attainable rather than a remote goal. We are also anxious to encourage people to go into self-employment, to work for themselves and their families.

There has been an encouraging expansion in the number of small businesses and self-employment and in the number of jobs being created in the United Kingdom. There was a net increase of 130,000 new businesses in the last three years for which figures are available. After declining steadily in the 1970s, the number of people in self-employment has increased to 2·6 million, the highest level for 60 years and representing 11 per cent. of the employed labour force.

The Government are keen to encourage small business and self-employment, while it seems — in fact I am certain — that the Labour party did not even mention small businesses in either of its last two manifestos. We are not concerned only with small businesses because we want to see enterprise succeed throughout the economy. Certainly we do not want to place any restrictions on small businesses to stop them from becoming large ones.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): There are record bankruptcies.

Mr. Trippier: There are also record start-ups, and the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) and his hon. Friends should remember that the net increase in small businesses is the highest in recorded history.

Mr. Prescott: Not established businesses.

Mr. Snape: I do not envy the Minister his task of having to read that dross. Since his Government came to power in 1979, 83 companies in the borough of Sandwell, each of which normally employed more than 100 people, have closed. The result is that 25,000 people have been thrown out of work. That is just one borough in the west midlands. Let us have less complacent nonsense and more action from the Minister.

Mr. Trippier: As an example of my interest in Sandwell, not long ago I opened the enterprise agency there. We are well aware that larger firms have shed labour. No one has a monopoly of compassion for people who, tragically, have found their way on to the dole queue. The Opposition assume that it is the largest companies that will increase their share of the labour market. They will not, and the major reasons for the shedding of labour in Sandwell and elsewhere are increased productivity per man and high technology. Sandwell has one of the best enterprise agencies in Britain, and I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's constituents and the enterprise agency. The agency will stimulate the growth of small firms and encourage people who have never in the past considered self-employment as an option to become self-employed. Instead of being so negative about the things that are going on in his constituency, the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East should be much more positive.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that in Japan and the United States, where enterprise and small businesses flourish to a great extent, 50 per cent. of all businesses fail? That shows that the failure and bankruptcy rates do not necessarily suggest that America and Japan are not enterprising. Quite the opposite is the case, because those are the most enterprising countries in the world.

Mr. Trippier: There is another major difference between the United States and Britain. It is that firms that fail in the United States set up again very quickly. In Britain there seems to be something of a social stigma attached to firms that go down, whereas in the United States it is seen as part of the education process and the people who, unfortunately, go into liquidation learn from their mistakes. They have little or no difficulty in getting a second loan from the bank or in getting Government assistance. When a firm goes down in Britain, it is difficult for it to get a loan from the bank to start up again.

The rate of survival and growth is that much better here than in the United States. Although many people refer to the one in three failure rate over three years, saying that two out of three businesses succeed shows an encouraging record. It is a matter of saying whether the glass is half empty or half full. It is my main responsibility to ensure that the survival rate increases, but we want there to be growth and development as well. My hon. Friend's intervention met that point head on.

Mr. Prescott: I do not even understand it.

Mr. Trippier: Well, my hon. Friend knows more about enterprise now than the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East will ever know.

Mr. Prescott: When comparing the success rates of companies, we must consider their character and that of those that are collapsing. New companies might employ only one or two employees, but the ones that are collapsing are probably established. They are altogether a much more serious proposition and are being replaced by small companies which are highly likely to fail.

Mr. Trippier: I must try to convince the hon. Gentleman otherwise. Unemployment in my consitituency reached 19·1 per cent. in the early 1980s — that is Rossendale alone, and not including the Accrington part of the travel-to-work area. We have now managed to get unemployment down to 13 per cent., which I accept is still far far too high, only through growth and the generation of small firms. All the evidence shows that we shall have growth in employment and a reduction in the unacceptable level of unemployment only through small firms.

I have not met one person in the past three years during which I have had responsibility for small firms who believes that large firms will increase their share of the labour market. The official Opposition should be aware that they will kid nobody at the next general election if they try to convince the electorate that large firms will take on more people. All the international and national evidence contradicts that view.

Mr. Thurnham: Would my hon. Friend like to comment on the nationalisation that Britain has suffered? Does he not think it surprising that the Opposition are not joining us in pressing for more privatisation immediately?

Mr. Trippier: Absolutely. The record of denationalisation proposals shows the success of the Government's policies. The difference between the official Opposition and us is that they see the future in terms of Government interference, whereas we believe that we should stand back. If we are to stand back, however, we should take with us an awful lot of the paraphernalia, by which I mean regulation and red tape, which successive Governments have slapped on the statute book. It is one thing to say that we should stand back, but entirely another to say that we should stand back and take with us much of the red tape which is acting as a brake on enterprise.

There are many signs of successful enterprise in the economy. Since its inception in 1980, the unlisted securities market has seen 443 companies raise £750 million. The United Kingdom is creating more jobs than any other European country, more than 1 million new jobs being created since the spring of 1983.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): When talking about creating new jobs, will the Minister be clear whether they are full-time or part-time?

Mr. Trippier: That question has been asked often. The hon. Gentleman does a great disservice to people in part-time jobs — he is rubbishing the work that they are doing. He is aware that unemployment remains stubbornly high because more young people are coming on to the job market than there are people reaching retirement age, and because more women are looking for work outside the home. That makes our task that much more difficult. The evidence shows that there is an increasing number of jobs in the small firms sector and that the vast majority of them are real.

We are also witnessing the development of new business opportunities with substantial employment potential in the leisure and tourist sectors. Tourism is Britain's biggest growth industry, accounting for £13 billion worth of business each year and employing almost 1·5 million people. New jobs in tourism are being created at the rate of 50,000 each year, and there is scope for substantial further growth. There is nothing more annoying to those who work in the tourist industry than to hear Opposition Members say that theirs are not real jobs. Where employment provides a living it is real enough. Tourism is a major industry, and a very successful one.

The Government have been supporting enterprise throughout the economy through our broader economic policies and in practical terms through schemes of assistance and advice to businesses large and small. The loan guarantee scheme provides an important source of funds for companies which need to raise up to £75,000. The scheme has been extended for three years as a result of a Budget measure, and the premium has been reduced to 2·5 per cent., which is 1·75 per cent. net. Because interest rates are so low, and because of the reduced premium, the scheme is cheaper now than it has ever been. It has been very successful in creating many new jobs at a net cost of £700 each. This bears favourable comparison with many other schemes for which the Government are responsible.

The business expansion scheme has also been successful. It has helped more than 700 companies to raise more than £100 million. It has been extended and is now targeted towards businesses with special potential for job creation.

The enterprise allowance scheme has helped more than 150,000 people to set up their own businesses. A recent survey which we commissioned shows that, for every 100 businesses which have survived for three years, 99 additional jobs have been created. Thanks to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, we will have 100,000 places by the end of the current year. The scheme has helped many people, and two out of three of the businesses that have been set up have succeeded. That is a real attempt at job creation and self-employment.

Financial assistance for enterprise in innovation and exports is also available from the Department of Trade and Industry's support for innovation schemes and the British Overseas Trade Board. The Government also provide advice and guidance to businesses through the small firms service of my Department, which has doubled in size during the past three years. It is a service of which I am extremely proud. We have also launched the regional enterprise units, which are another way in which to have a presence at regional level and get away from Westminster.

The Government also help business through their own purchases. Government contracts offer many valuable business opportunities for small firms. Departments place contracts worth more than £14 billion each year with that in mind. I am pleased to launch formally today a new Prestel information system which will complement the booklet "Tendering for Government Contracts—Advice For Small Firms". It provides detailed information on tendering procedures, the products purchased and who to contact. Initially, the information covers three Departments — the Ministry of Defence, the Crown Suppliers and Her Majesty's Stationery Office, but I intend to expand it to cover more Departments as soon as possible.

The Government also have a substantial commitment to training — both to skills training and training for enterprise, and to equipping people with the skills required for enterprise and employment. The two-year YTS will cost almost £1 billion in 1986-87, and we are also increasing our commitment to adult training with around 800,000 training starts planned at a cost of £270 million in 1986-87, as well as 60,000 places on the training for enterprise programme in 1986-87. The revised enterprise allowance scheme contains a new management training scheme that I have introduced to help new businesses to survive and grow.

The Government are also helping the long-term unemployed through the restart and job start schemes and support for job clubs. The community programme is being expanded to over 250,000 places by November.

We are also taking action to improve the awareness of enterprise and the nature of wealth creation. There is always much talk about how to slice up the economic cake. The Government are trying to get across, particularly to young people, the factors which determine the size of the cake, and how we go about making it bigger. We are also seeking to stress that wealth creation paves the way for job creation.

The Government are supporting Industry Year 1986, the campaign being run by the Royal Society of Arts to improve the understanding of industry and to encourage young people to take up the challenge of a career in industry. Our targets for Industry Year include the introduction of mini-enterprise projects in each secondary school to teach schoolchildren how business works, and to have a schools industry liaison officer in each local education authority by the end of the year. These initiatives contribute to the better understanding of business in schools and in society, and go towards creating an enterprise culture where entrepreneurship and initiative are respected and encouraged. Enterprise and education also come together in collaboration in high technology industry. The universities are realising that there is no place for the ivory tower in the modern world. There are 21 science parks already in operation, with another six under construction. Putting ideas into action creates new jobs.

It would be wrong to conclude my remarks without referring to local enterprise agencies, although I touched on them earlier. Enterprise and new businesses are encouraged not only by central Government but by established businesses, local authorities and other organisations, through local enterprise agencies in England and Wales, involving more than 4,000 companies and organisations as sponsors, and funds from both the public and private sectors.

To assist the valuable work of the local enterprise agencies we have launched the local enterprise agency grant scheme. Our aim is to help to establish a network of viable self-supporting enterprise agencies with funding from non-Government sources. We are providing pump-priming funds for the first five years, matching other contributors pound for pound up to a maximum of £20,000. I commend those working in local enterprise agencies for the invaluable support that they provide for small businesses.

I commend to those hon. Members who have not already seen it the leaflet entitled, "Business in the Inner Cities" which is produced by Business in the Community — the umbrella organisation responsible for helping to strengthen and develop the local enterprise agency movement. That leaflet is very interesting. It covers a wide range of projects throughout the country where established businesses have been helping others to get started. I refer to help in staff, premises and advice. I draw attention, in particular, to one of its paragraphs, which states:

"The primary contribution of companies to assist the inner cities is by remaining competitive, staying in business and growing. In this way a major contribution is made to the creation of wealth and the local economy through wages, rates, taxes and indirect employment in addition to the production and sale of goods and services."

That is true not only for the inner cities but throughout the country. Obviously the economy as a whole is vital in the encouragement of enterprise, and that is perhaps our overriding concern, but the Government also have other responsibilities. We have a responsibility to allow businesses to grow and expand and to stop people from being prisoners of their in-trays, so that they can get on with doing the job.

I conclude by referring to the United States and to the practical example of enterprise, deregulation and the creation of jobs, which is there for all to see. The United States' economy has been thriving and creating jobs 20 million jobs between 1974 and mid-1985. The United States has also been losing regulations, while Europe has gained regulations and lost more than 2 million jobs in the past decade. Within Europe, the United Kingdom has been creating jobs more rapidly than any other country. We hope that by reducing regulations further we can create the conditions to gain more jobs. Freeing the spirit of enterprise is the only way to create lasting prosperity and employment.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Listening to the Minister, one would not think that the chilling unemployment statistics published yesterday were the grim reality. That is the backdrop to this debate, despite all the ebullience of the Minister at the Dispatch box. To give him credit, he seemed to give us a Cooks tour of the enterprise initiatives introduced by the Government. However, the grim reality is that we again have an upward trend in long-term unemployment. The Government have thus failed to come to grips with the economy's problems.

The Opposition welcome a debate on enterprise and deregulaton, because we take the subject very seriously. The Labour party very much values the notion of enterprise, but abhors unnecessary regulation, because it makes the lives of our citizens and companies more difficult.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: I should like to continue my speech further before giving way.

We believe that two challenges face the country in our search for the successful creation of wealth. During the past seven years the Government have failed to create that wealth. When we refer to wealth, we mean wealth for all our people.

Those twin challenges in our search for the creation of wealth are meeting the challenges of international markets and of fast-changing technology. The country must overcome those challenges if it is to create wealth and jobs. However, there are fundamental differences of view between Labour Members and the Government over what enterprise and deregulation mean. We believe that enterprise and deregulation should be liberating our country so that it can create that wealth. But the Government have given those twin notions a rather sinister and unique interpretation. They have come to mean not, as many of us might have thought, the liberation of our fellow citizens and their enrichment either individually or as a group, but the taking away of the fundamental rights that people have had for many years. I refer, for example, to rights such as safety and health at work, the right to a decent wage, the right to maternity leave, to trade union activity and to job security.

Mr. Trippier: If the hon. Gentleman is serious about enterprise — and it is quite a revelation to us that the Labour party is interested in it —

Mr. Snape: Come off it.

Mr. Trippier: It is a revelation to us. Today is only the second time that I have heard the Opposition Front Bench say that. But if the Labour party is serious about enterprise, why did it omit to mention small businesses in its last two manifestos?

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister had three quarters of an hour in which to make his speech, and he knows that what he said about our last two manifestos is not correct.

The Government's interpretation of enterprise and deregulation is not what we mean when we use those words. Many of the measures supported by the Government are rather sinister. Indeed, I hope to discuss some of the aspects which are more likely to enslave our people than to set them free.

The measures contained in the two most recent White Papers have been offered by a Government who offer precious little else to the unemployed, the employed, small businesses or the economy as a whole. The Minister's presentation was not complete, and my hon. Friend the Minister for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) drew attention to that when he intervened to refer to local enterprise in Sandwell. Since 1979 we have seen the devastation of industry throughout the country. My constituency, which was so strong in textiles, engineering and chemicals, has been devastated. Large and medium-sized firms have been devastated. This has happened because of the exchange rates that the Government have inflicted on them, as well as cripplingly high interest rates.

Mr. Sheerman: I shall give way later.

Companies went down like ninepins throughout the 1980s, and many companies are still facing serious difficulties. When we ask our local business men what they want, they tell us that they do not want numerous small enterprise schemes: they want a Government with a sense of direction, interest rates brought down and a stimulation of the overall economy by Government-led enterprise.

The measures offered in the past two packages of deregulation offer precious little to most sections of our community. They are part of the Secretary of State's baggage. We know that the real power in the Department of Employment lies with the Secretary of State, Lord Young, not the House. Lord Young carts his baggage around Whitehall as he glides from No. 10 to the Department of Trade and Industry and now the Department of Employment. He cuts regulations and encourages enterprise everywhere he goes. I have no doubt that many of those now languishing in Her Majesty's prisons cannot wait for the day when the noble Lord becomes Home Secretary and promptly sets up schemes to punish the wicked prison officers who are responsible for all the red tape and regulations, and begins to reward the enterprise of those planning or aspiring to escape.

Only a touch of humour is allowed when talking about Lord Young, because humour plays a small part in the story of everyday regulation and entrepreneurs. The story involves people losing their jobs. Of course, the Opposition do not like us talking about job losses.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford): The hon. Gentleman is the Opposition.

Mr. Sheerman: Not for very much longer.

The Government cannot bear it when we discuss unemployment statistics. They cringe in their seats when we talk about 4 million being unemployed. The story involves people losing their jobs, often unfairly and without redress, having been stripped of the protection of wages councils. They are unable to resist environmental deterioration.

Mr. Trippier rose—

Mr. Sheerman: They are unable to protect their lives, even in terms of the environment, because of a lack of planning protection. People encounter serious risks at work because of the weakening of health and safety safeguards.

Having considered carefully the Government's actions over the past year and the two White Papers entitled "Lifting the Burden on Business" and "Building Business . . . not Barriers", we find that the Government could be trying to do two things. First, to give them the benefit of the doubt, they could genuinely believe that their measures will help the economy and do some good. I suspect, however, that there is another deeper and more sinister motive. I believe that they understand that the sort of measures that they have introduced help to deflect attention from their total and absolute failure to tackle the fundamental problems that besiege our economy and their incapacity to begin the process of rebuilding it on firm foundations.

We know only too well of the Government's belief in the virtues of the market. They have a profound ideological belief that merely to free market forces will free the individual and the company and bring about inevitable wealth creation. No one likes unnecessary regulation or red tape. The Opposition applaud the sweeping away of rules that have outlived their usefulness, or the eradication of regulations that make life more difficult for successful business generation. The Minister was talking to his Parliamentary Private Secretary and did not hear my last remarks. I repeat, the Opposition applaud the cutting of unnecessary red tape, but cutting through red tape is very different from doing away with rules and regulations that are often the hallmark of a civilised society, giving and ensuring rights of citizenship, employment protection, fair play and limiting the dislocation that is caused by planning abuse. We must be exceedingly careful in arriving at a balance. The Minister thinks that the Government have the balance about right, but anyone reflecting on the Government's proposals would be dubious about that claim. One person's red tape is always, or possibly, another person's personal protection.

The Government claim to be striking the balance, but we cannot agree with that. Their belief in deregulation and the market has been elevated to an article of faith. As we know, it is part of the Prime Minister's rhetoric and the ideological baggage of the Secretary of State for Employment. That is dangerous because, as a creed, it is so simplistic that it leads to ideological fixation.

Mr. Thurnham: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will enlighten the House on the Opposition's ideological fixation on Clause Four which has been the cause of so much loss of enterprise. When does the Labour party intend to get rid of it?

Mr. Sheerman: In pursuing Clause Four we are applauding enterprise. We believe that the rewards of enterprise should be shared among all the people, not just a few of them. I take that intervention much amiss from someone who in Committee said that we should return to sweat shops. I believe that the pursuit of Clause Four is compatible with the spirit of enterprise, but enterprise that creates wealth for all our people.

Mr. Thurnham: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has misquoted me. If he cares to refer to the Hansard report of the proceedings of the Committee on the Wages Bill, he will see that I referred to wealth shops, not sweat shops.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to make his own speech. I presume that it will be more of the same.

The Government's creed is dangerous because it is so ideological and simplistic that it will lead to an ideological fixation. Those who peddle it court the label "ideologue", and there is no better example in the Government than the Under-Secretary of State. The evidence of this is the single-mindedness with which the market philosophy has been presented as the saviour of the British economy. The Government can see nothing but the freedom of market forces. That doctrine continues to be presented despite all the evidence of the past seven years, the disaster that has befallen our manufacturing capacity and the testimony of the 4 million who are unemployed.

We now have the emergence of Lord Young's review unit — the enterprise and deregulation unit. There is policing of Whitehall thinking in every Government Department to ensure that the correct ideological line is toed. That is the centrepiece of the recent and most pathetic White Paper.

It is clear that we have a Government with an ideological fixation rather than a practical programme of measures to help British industry. We know that that is so because of the gap between the rhetoric of Ministers and the reality of what they are doing. The claims made for the proposals in their White Papers and other similar measures are pathetically over-inflated. They range from the claim of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who says that unnecessary regulation has lost 1·6 million jobs to the British economy, to the claim from other quarters of the Government that their measures will help to generate an enterprise culture and free business to create significant new wealth.

Indeed, The Times leader of 23 May commented:

"Even judged by such sympathetic standards, however, the upbeat presentation cannot disguise the disappointing contents of the latest deregulation White Paper."

In similar vein, the Financial Times said:

[Mr. Sheerman]

"Micro-economic reforms are necessary but they need to go together with appropriate macroeconomic policies and to be directed towards those areas of the economy on which they will have a really significant effect."

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman has quoted from newspapers. I am sure he will have read The Times of 5 June, which contained a special report on small business. The newspaper said:

"The Labour Party, taking the wide view in its economic policy, has yet to examine the situation at a small business level."

I am sure The Times consulted the hon. Gentleman's party before it published the article. That article shows that the Labour party has done almost nothing to examine the question of small business, and what we have heard today has added very little to it.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman does not know what is going on in the Labour party. The Labour party is, and has been, committed to the generation of small business and to helping small business and enterprise. The Labour party will present to the electorate, at the next general election, a package of policies for small business and enterprise that will be more acceptable and attractive to the electorate and the small business man than anything the Conservative party has done, will do or promises to do.

The claims that we have heard this morning about Conservative party policies far exceed any possible achievable results. That part of the Department of Employment which the Paymaster General retains must know what a limited effect, in terms of job and wealth creation, the range of measures has. Perhaps the Paymaster General lives in a different world from most of us. Recently, he was quoted as asserting that he and the Government were doing the same things that Lord Salisbury would have done 100 years ago. I must tell the Paymaster General that the world today is different from the world in Lord Salisbury's day. This is the age of microchips and multinationals. We have lost an empire and protected markets. We are struggling to survive in a turbulent international environment against a background of rapid changing technology and with a wholly inadequate capital machine and manpower stock to compete effectively. None of the policies mentioned this morning by the Government Front Bench do anything to create that kind of base. Indeed, the Minister actually boasted about the freeing of exchange controls.

Mr. Trippier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: No.

The freeing of exchange controls has allowed footloose British capital to flow and to invest not in Britain, but in our competitors in other parts of the world.

Many of the implications of the recent measures are illustrated in their effect on real workers in real industries, many of which, such as the printing and the building and construction industries, are dominated by small business. Let us consider the implications for them. Labour Members have mentioned, by way of intervention, the amazing suggestion that, in this day and age, sacked workers must pay a fee of £25 to appeal against wrongful dismissal before a tribunal. If a worker wins his case, he will get the £25 back. If he loses his case, he will lose not only his job—and all that means to persons who, in most parts of the country, have poor prospects of getting another—but his £25. A caring Government would not come forward with such a proposal. The Minister said that is still open for negotiation, but it is appalling that it had to be mooted even in the first place.

The qualifying period for providing detailed reasons for dismissal has been extended from six months to two years. That is another blow to workers' rights, which the Minister says does not matter. In this day and age, we must be interested in the rights of women in the workplace. Many talented women have never been allowed to use their abilities to the full—to get jobs that do justice to their talents and to be rewarded properly for those abilities. The Government have struck a further blow on working women. Until now, a firm with fewer than five employees was exempt from the obligation to allow women to return to work within 29 weeks of the birth of a child. That will be increased to apply to firms employing up to 10 employees. That is another cruel blow to the rights of women to work, to pursue a career and to return to it after they have had a child. It is a disgraceful and mean suggestion. I am surprised that the Minister supports such a measure. I see that he is not begging to intervene.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in Italy all firms which employ fewer than 15 people are exempt from all regulations regarding health and safety benefits and so on? The effect has been a dramatic expansion in employment and the growth of such firms. Does he condemn the ideology of the Italian Government for that?

Mr. Sheerman: I should have thought that my responsibility and that of the Government was to the rights of people in this country. We believe in the protection of workers at work. We believe in the rights of women to work and to go back to work. We do not have to look to Italy in terms of the rights and the abilities of women to make their way in society. In fact, Italy is one of the last countries I would look to in that respect.

Regarding the right to time off for trade union matters, another damaging blow has been struck against genuine trade union activity in the workplace.

Amazingly, firms with fewer than 20 employees will be exempted from producing a written health and safety policy. The Government may think that it does not matter if they start trimming health and safety regulations in small business. Once again, health and safety at work are seen by the Government as not important in small firms. The Minister glided over the fact that most accidents at work occur in those small firms on which he has turned his back.

Mr. Trippier: I have already made that point. I wish to make it clear to Opposition Members that one of the major reasons for a higher incidence in accidents is that the material for which we are responsible, through the Health and Safety Commission, is misunderstood or not complied with in many instances. It is simplification, not deregulation, which will put that right. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to accuse me of wanting to deregulate health and safety.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister is absolutely obsessed with pamphlets. It is not a matter of the clearness of pamphlets. The fact is that in real industries, such as the building and construction and manufacturing industries, the accidents occur in small firms. If we give up on regulation, having cut back the number of factory inspectors by 200 between 1979 and 1984, how can we police and regulate whether employers adhere to proper health and safety standards? The fact is that the Under-Secretary of State and the Government do not care. The increasing number of deaths and serious injuries in small firms is a national scandal, taking us back to Victorian days when people were killed and maimed and no one cared. That is what the Government's deregulation policies are doing.

Mr. Trippier: Private enterprise.

Mr. Sheerman: That is private enterprise — private enterprise according to the Government.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I heartily endorse my hon Friend's remarks about the Tory attitude to health and safety. Does he accept that one problem is the inadequate number of health and safety inspectors and the many loopholes in the regulations? Many serious health hazards and accidents at work could be prevented if the health and safety inspectorate were strengthened.

Mr. Sheerman: I agree with my hon. Friend. We do not want to inhibit small firms, but we owe a duty to people to protect and ensure their health and safety at work. That has been a long tradition. It used to be a bipartisan policy. We used to take it for granted that civilised Governments and political parties believed in protecting people at work, but obviously that policy is long gone in view of the present ideological climate of the Conservative party.

Mr. Trippier: Will the hon. Gentleman, either now or later, refer to that part of the White Paper that says we will deregulate on health and safety matters?

Mr. Sheerman: I have already given chapter and verse on the reduction in standards. Does the hon. Gentleman deny that firms with fewer than 20 employees will be exempted from producing a written health and safety policy? If that is not the document, will he say so?

Mr. Trippier: That is not deregulation.

Mr. Sheerman: If I start speaking in Italian, perhaps some Conservative Members will start to understand what we mean by health and safety at work. Unfortunately, my competence in Italian is not sufficient for me to use it at the Dispatch Box. I challenge the Under-Secretary of State to deny that policy.

What is worrying about the Government's proposals is their simplistic solution and rigid ideological trains of thought at their worst. Real problems are set to one side; they are not taken seriously. The Under-Secretary of State refused to deal with the problems of exchange rate fluctuations, interest rates, investment in Britain, and so on.

Mr. Trippier: What would the hon. Gentleman do about them?

Mr. Sheerman: Those are the macro issues to which the Financial Times referred.

There is nothing wrong with deregulation done in a practical spirit with regard to a balance of interests, respect for the environment, concern for employment rights and a genuine interest in the fate of workers and consumers as well as private business. That is our view. There is nothing wrong with the right balance; nor is there anything wrong with enterprise. The problem is that the Government fail to see that enterprise must start at the top.

What we want, and what the Minister did not mention, is an enterprising Government who recognise that it is their job to be enterprising. We want a Government who will take responsibility for creating a framework for strong economic performance and who understand how our international competitors use planning and intervention in the market in an innovative and enterprising manner. That is what the Government cannot grasp and take on. Our competitors use innovation and inventive and enterprising policies and intervene in the market to ensure that their industries can compete easily with ours. That is the success story of other countries which are doing so much better than us.

The Under-Secretary of State boasted about how much training the Government were providing. What are the facts of deregulation in training? Instead of freeing enterprise, what happened when the Government abolished the industrial training boards? The Minister said that when we get rid of industrial training boards, private industry with free enterprise workers will train the work force.

Mr. Trippier: Rubbish.

Mr. Sheerman: All the printed evidence shows that private industry spends 0·15 per cent. of turnover on training, compared to our international competitors who spend between 1 and 2 per cent. of turnover on training. That is the reality of liberating enterprise without any regulation.

The Under-Secretary of State did not mention research and development and the extent to which freeing the spirit of enterprise had created research and development in our industries. There is an appalling level of research and development in most of our manufacturing and industrial companies. Without Government intervention, direction and incentives, research and development, like training, will not take place.

Mr. Trippier: What will the hon. Gentleman do about it?

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman has proudly boasted of enterprise schemes. If the country does not invest in training and in research and development, our economy's long-term prospects will be dismal. The hon. Gentleman knows that, but he did not address his remarks to the fundamental issue. The real thrust of our economy will come from the major manufacturing companies. If they do not succeed, the small firms — yes, they are valuable, but most of them are running and working in the wake of the large companies — will perish. The Under-Secretary of State does not see that the real objective is to get the heart of our economy and manufacturing employment researching, developing and training its work force. If the Government do not do that, all the work of small business will be to no avail.

This morning, we heard of the wonderful parade of work that will be done for small businesses, but there was no understanding of the fact that, if prime manufacturing industry is allowed to go under, there will be nothing left and small businesses will die. Those small businesses live on the business of prime manufacturing units. There was so much rhetoric from the Under-Secretary of State that he missed the point about the reality of the manufacturing future for our people and our country.

[Mr. Sheerman]

I do not want to take up as much of the time of the House as the Under-Secretary of State. We want a Government who will force companies——

Mr. Trippier: What will a Labour Government do?

Mr. Sheerman: After the next election, the Labour Government—perhaps not many Conservative Members will be here then and perhaps the Under-Secretary of State will be showing his enterprise in stockbroking—will co-operate with companies in a planned way to ensure that investment, training and research and development take place and that there is investment in this country, not in other countries. Such developments will ensure that we can compete effectively with our rivals, by deregulating—[Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) wish to intervene?

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): My hon. Friend is not able to intervene.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) is making great play of the fact that so-called declining industries are not playing their part. GEC, which is in my constituency, has just made £1·5 million available to a college for research and development.

I should like to take up many points in the hon. Gentleman's speech, but I will not do so now. However, I may refer to them when I speak later.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman has quoted the wrong company. Its chairman told the House of Lords Select Committee, as did Sir John Harvey-Jones, that we cannot base the future of our country on the service industries and that, if we do not pay attention to prime manufacturing industries, we are lost.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that since Lord Weinstock took over GEC, 15 or 20 years ago, there has been carnage in jobs at the Stafford works and related factories in that area, which has led to serious levels of unemployment and the destruction of the electrical engineering manufacturing capability of this country by a process of asset-stripping by that gentleman?

Mr. Sheerman: I take note of my hon. Friend's serious and worrying point.

In many ways the Government have attempted to hijack the word "enterprise" and to use it as though they invented it. I shall illustrate what a real spirit of enterprise might do for our country — a spirit of enterprise interpreted in a rather different way. I would like a Government — especially the Departments of the Environment, Health and Social Security and Employment — with the vision to accept that this country suffers deep problems of housing disrepair and homelessness, to say, "There are hundreds of thousands of unemployed building workers. Construction is a great engine for economic growth; it has minimum import implications and a healthy multiplier effect when it starts growing. Let us get these unemployed building workers back to work building houses for people who want homes. Let us get them moving into that area, building up our country and getting rid of the dreadful scourge of unemployment." What a spirit of enterprise that would show.

A careful and detailed analysis of this country shows that such initiative and enterprise would lead to significant savings in public expenditure.

Mr. Trippier: With all that proposed Government expenditure, will the hon. Gentleman tell us by how much taxation would need to be increased and what rate would be levelled on, for example, the small firms that he purports to support?

Mr. Sheerman: Does not the Minister believe that it must be good sense and good value both for our country and people to pay people to work, to get them into the tax-paying bracket and to create real assets to hand on to our children? Surely that must be good value, even if it means an increase in taxation — [Interruption.] Conservative Members know that I am giving not a specfic answer this morning, but an overall picture of what the next Labour Government will do. They will be an enterprising Government who will invest in people, in assets and in the future of our country.

This Government, in so many areas of their policy, have abolished and stifled enterprise. For example, some of the best local authorities were leading the way in local enterprise. The Minister referred to Sandwell and its enterprise initiative. What about the enterprise initiatives of the metropolitan counties and the GLC which the Government abolished? They were leading the way in much of the social and industrial enterprise in their local economies.

Positive, not negative, enterprise is what the Labour party believes in and what our country so desperately needs. We must await the next general election, when a Labour Government will release a spirit of enterprise so that all our people can work together to create real jobs and real wealth—wealth that will be distributed fairly to all the people.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): The House will not have failed to notice that during the 40-minute speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), with its characteristic windy rhetoric, he devoted only two or three minutes to discussing what the next Labour Government, if there were to be one, might do for enterprise and jobs.

I noted two salient characteristics in the small, positive aspect of the hon. Gentleman's speech. The first concerned the objective to plan to ensure that this, that and the other happened. It is clear that behind that lies an interventionist philosophy that was severely discredited—not only in this country but in all free economies — during the 1970s.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman made a rather guarded admission that a Labour Government would increase taxation to pay for their approach. The figures on the record, which have not been seriously challenged, suggest that a Labour Government would increase taxation by at least £24 billion, and that is probably an underestimate. Therefore, the House should treat the policy part of the hon. Gentleman's speech in the spirit it deserves.

By contrast, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister for his excellent and positive speech which set out a whole range of measures in which the Government are engaged to stimulate enterprise and create more jobs. Against the background of the recent White Paper

"Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" the Government have clearly established that there is much that we can still do to foster a tendency that is already evident in the economy—the creation of new jobs and new businesses.

I was heartened by what my hon. Friend said about the creation of 130,000 net new businesses during the past three years under the policies established by this Government. That, more than anything else, shows that if we create the right conditions for employment, small businesses will follow. What are today small businesses will, in many cases, tomorrow become the larger thriving businesses that will take on more people.

Mr. Snape: In which part of the country have these 130,000 new businesses been created?

Mr. Forman: I do not have a detailed breakdown of the figures; I took them from my hon. Friend's speech. However, I have no doubt from my experience in my constituency that a large number of new businesses have been created—some because of the excellent enterprise allowance scheme which has been such a positive measure.

I wish to refer in a little detail to the important question of balance between regulation and deregulation—a point which, in all fairness, was touched upon by the hon. Member for Huddersfield. The Government rightly contend that in this country—and, indeed, in much of Western Europe—there is an excess of regulation, and has been for historic reasons for some considerable time when compared with the United States. Paragraph 1.12 of the White Paper makes the point that further deregulation along the lines of that carried out in the United States during the past 10 years could create a large number of new jobs.

One thing from which I think the House would benefit, not necessarily today, but subsequently, is to have fuller information than could be given in one paragraph in the White Paper about exactly how and to what extent the United States has deregulated over that period. One brief paragraph, which makes an important point, needs to be elaborated on on a future occasion. For example, it would be interesting to know the extent to which it is a matter of things not being regulated in the first place in the United States, or of active deregulation. There is some ambiguity in that paragraph. I think that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary would do well to use an appropriate occasion to spell out further some of the benefits of the American model.

It is true that where regulation is a restraint on trade, it is absolutely right for Government policy to be founded on strong deregulation. I shall give two or three examples. There is no doubt that national regulations in the European Community have prevented the emergence of a genuine Common Market. It is most welcome that the Government's policy, in alliance with many other member Governments, is to make further progress, particularly during our presidency of the EEC in a little while.

Secondly, there is no doubt from historical evidence that trade union restrictive practices, based not so much on legislation, but more on historical collusion between employers and unions, have been against the national interest. That merits an approach of deregulation, which the Government have taken. I need cite only the examples of the printing industry, which is topical, or, traditionally, shipbuilding, to make my point.

Thirdly, to show that I am in a spirit to be fair about those matters, I say that there is no doubt that this country has suffered over many years from what I describe as professional or commercial monopoly practices. Examples are the solicitors on conveyancing, or the British Medical Association's hostility to homeopathic medicine. Until recently, there was a self-regulating ban in the City of London on multiple capacity in financial services. All those things are examples of the barnacles of regulation which have grown up by collusion between private interests over many years. The Government are absolutely right to tackle all those things. Deregulation is bound to help the progress of the economy and the creation of jobs if it directed to those purposes.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Does my hon. Friend put in the same category the recent contract negotiated between the pharmacists and the Government, which restricts the right of new pharmacists to open up in competition and dispense National Health Service products?

Mr. Forman: I do indeed. My hon. Friend has chosen a good example. I am afraid that it demonstrates how widespread is the almost automatic approach in too much of the British economy.

It is much more dubious to seek to deregulate on a large scale where the essence of the regulation involved is genuinely and widely recognised to be for the common good, public safety or the protection of the environment. In such cases, deregulation might please the business lobbies and might eventually increase profits as a result of reduced compliance costs, but will not necessarily produce many or any new jobs. Let me give a few examples of what I mean.

I represent a constituency that is very much interested in the future of the green belt. There is no doubt that any serious infringement of the green belt in London or the south-east, or any major revision of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1972—which I understand is to be the subject of a further consultation document, perhaps next week—would be a matter of considerable concern to many of my constituents. They believe that existing regulations in those spheres help to protect the quality of life in residential areas. They are right to believe that.

Mr. Corbyn: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's remarks about protecting the green belt. Does he agree that, by the same judgment, it is wrong of the Government to introduce special development orders for nuclear dumping sites? Does he not agree that there should be normal planning requirements for them?

Mr. Forman: That demonstrates the unwisdom of giving way to the hon. Gentleman. There is little relationship, either direct or indirect, between the point that he makes and the point that I was seeking to make about the genuine preservation of residential areas.

Another example of regulation that needs to be preserved is this. If the Government proceed, as they say they might in the White Paper, with the rationalisation of air pollution control—I understand that there is also to be a forthcoming consultation paper on that—or with simplified licensing arrangements for water abstractions and effluent discharges, notably in the context of water privatisation, once again, we must look carefully at such measures. Those are examples, in what I would describe as my balanced approach, of regulation that needs to be carefully preserved and used in a modern, sensible way.

Mr. Cash: I always have the greatest respect for my hon. Friend's opinions, fairness and sense of balance. Does he acknowledge that in the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers", paragraph 5.2 states that "The chapter on 'Planning and Enterprise' in 'Lifting the Burden' reaffirmed the Government's concern to protect and enhance the environment in town and country, to preserve our heritage of historic buildings and rural landscape, to conserve good agricultural land and maintain the Green Belts"?

That chapter is well written. The White Paper shows how the balance that my hon. Friend would like to see is in fact being achieved without derogating from the rights of individuals, which we all want to protect.

Mr. Forman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That endorses the importance of the point that I was seeking to make. It is not that I do not trust the Government—I trust them implicitly. The point is that I wish my hon. Friend the Minister, and through him all my right hon. and hon. Friends, to be acutely aware of the strength of public feeling in those areas.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the hon. Gentleman particularly worried that the present Secretary of State for Employment's only real claim to being an entrepreneur is as a property speculator?

Mr. Forman: I am not at all worried about the provenance of the Secretary of State. He is doing an admirable job in his sphere of responsibility. He is one of the most positive members of the Government.

There is one other example where I express a small concern and put down a marker, in my willingness and keenness to preserve the balance. The Government speak in paragraph 7.10 of the White Paper of raising the hours of work thresholds above which employees qualify for the main employment rights. Once again, the Government need to be cautious in that area because those are far-reaching measures. I have nothing against part-time work. Indeed, the expansion of part-time work has been one of the positive characteristics of recent job creation. But we must be careful of a society that might emerge, in which there is a stratification of the labour market and in which a growing proportion of those in work find themselves without the normal protection and understandings that would be available to full-time workers. The Government need to be cautious before going too rapidly in the direction suggested in paragraph 7.10.

The overall picture that I draw is that deregulation has a very important part to play in stimulating enterprise and jobs, but the balance must be preserved. More important even than the thrust of deregulation are the Government's other policies to facilitate and enable the creation of new employment. Let me give some examples. The enterprise allowance scheme, to which my hon. Friend the Minister referred, is an excellent example of the success of the Government's enabling policy. I should like to press, as I have done in pamphlets and elsewhere, that the qualifying conditions and other aspects of the scheme should be further relaxed to make it demand-led. Secondly, I welcome very much my hon. Friend's remarks on the loan guarantee scheme, and the Budget extensions to the scheme. Once more, it is an example of the effective use of public money. If one can get a net cost per job of some £700, as my hon. Friend said, obviously that is a cost effective scheme.

Thirdly, I repeat my plea for the Government to continue efforts to persuade our EEC partners to raise the VAT threshold from its present far too low level of £25,500 to nearer £50,000. The Government's idea of an optional maximum threshold, about which more could be said, is good in the sense that it would allow more flexibility in what seems to me to have become rather tight arrangements.

My final example is the promotion of tourism, both at home and abroad, and the use of a range of policy intruments for intelligent regional policy, combined with institutional mechanisms which will bring together public and private finance. The Government would do well to consider public procurement and use as a model the Scottish Development Agency which has been successful in attracting investment. The Government would do will to encourage the embryonic Northern Development company which typifies the mixed public-private approach that I recommend.

Such changes in the climate for enterprise make it easier to encourage jobs and to make changes of a positive character. However, the Government often make changes easier to make prospectively than retrospectively. We must always carry public opinion with us when contemplating such changes, especially in those areas around which I have put some markers.

It is worth bearing in mind that a growing number of people put a high value upon the quality of life. In many people's minds that is associated to some extent with regulations in the environmental and similar spheres. The Government are wise to concentrate on trying to eliminate some of the estimated compliance costs, which all new legislative measures involve, especially those emanating from the European Commission in Brussels. Extra compliance costs on the private sector produce extra enforcement costs to be borne by the public authorities—central and local government.

I support the continuing work by the enterprise and deregulating unit in the Department of Employment, but, like everything else, progress should be on a balanced basis. We must guard against going too far in either direction.

I am glad to have contributed briefly to the debate. I wish the Government well in their efforts to encourage enterprise and new jobs without abandoning the essential regulations necessary in a civilised society.

11.12 am

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I listened with pleasure and much agreement to the speech by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman). His wise comments on deregulattion and the balance that needs to be struck will bear reading in the Official Report on Monday, particularly by those in his party who seem to be driven more by ideology than by pragmatism or practicalities.

I apologise for the fact that I shall have to leave the debate for about an hour about midday, but I shall return to hear the winding-up speeches. I am sorry that I shall miss the speeches by other hon. Members.

We can all understand why the Government wish to have a debate to show off their achievements in enterprise and deregulation, but it is sad that it is being held on a Friday. All our debates on small businesses and enterprise seem to be held on a Friday. The last exception was on a rare alliance Supply day, when we chose the subject for debate mid-week. The Government are right to have this debate.

I congratulate the Government on beginning to tackle the task of altering Britain's culture to give appropriate standing, status and impetus to enterprise. Uncharacteristically, I want to pay tribute to the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), whose long commitment to and knowledge of the small business sector is broadly respected and well understood by the small business sector.

I hate to temper that comment with some harsher words. I do not call into question the hon. Gentleman's personal commitment or the respect in which he is held, but I have rather less confidence in the Government's commitment. Shifting the responsibility from the Department of Trade and Industry to the Department of Employment and the rest of the evidence available shows that the Government are now regarding enterprise and the small business sector in the context of the battle against unemployment. They see it as a soft option.

Mr. Trippier: I appreciate that there could be balancing arguments about whether the responsibility for small firms should remain in the Department of Trade and Industry or be moved to the Department of Employment, but I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would acknowledge that since the change last September the policy for small firms has assumed a much higher profile.

Mr. Ashdown: I am happy to concede that, but the Government's attitude is driven by the desire to use enterprise as an instrument — perhaps the 'only instrument' — to bring down the scandalous unemployment levels. I am worried that enterprise, which is so important and vital to the industrial restructuring of Britain, is being treated in some senses as a PR exercise. There is far too much froth and far too little substance in what the Government say.

As I go round the country I find, like the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and others, that the first complaint that small businesses make to me is about the generally low level of economic activity. Valuable and important though enterprise is, it is not a substitute for economic regeneration. It is only part of a general plan for economic regeneration, which is so desperately needed in Britain. Encouraging enterprise can be successful only if it takes place in the context of a thriving economy, and in particular of a regeneration of the manufacturing sector, one-sixth of which has been wiped away since 1979. I accept that some of that is to do with world recession, but some of it is a result of the Government's general and rather surprising dependence upon the miraculous power of the market place. They believe that that will achieve all that needs to be achieved. I say that while dissociating myself from the comments and tone of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, who seems to think that everything can be planned into existence and that prosperity can be achieved because it is in the will of the Government.

We need to establish a partnership between Government enterprise and small businesses — I congratulate the Government on having begun one side of it—to regenerate the economy. That partnership cannot be driven by ideological concepts on either side of the equation.

Mr. Cash: One of our difficulties is that the alliance parties so often try to have it both ways. An SDP industrial policy document speaks of "a situation in which there is little prospect of a significant increase in employment in large enterprises in either the private or public sector".

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) argues in support of enterprise, while saying that we must stimulate the larger public and private enterprises. The SDP document contains a realistic appraisal of the position, which we acknowledge.

Mr. Ashdown: I suppose that it must be because of the hon. Gentleman's training as a lawyer that he has the habit and skill of deliberately misunderstanding what is said. I did not say that we can necessarily generate new employment in the larger industries, whether state or private. I share the Minister's view that small industries will be the employment growth sector. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) overlooks — probably deliberately, because he is too intelligent to do so accidentally — the fact that small industries depend on the wealth and prosperity created by larger firms. We cannot pass Britain over to a service sector industry.

The experience of the United States has proved time and again that effective service industries depend on an effective manufacturing and industrial sector. That is the key point. I make it, the SDP makes it, and hon. Members in all parts of the House make it.

Mr. Thurnham rose—

Mr. Ashdown: I have a number of points to make. I shall allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene, but that must be the last intervention that I take in this speech.

Mr. Thurnham: The hon. Gentleman makes the same mistake as the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) in thinking that small firms depend on larger firms. The statistics from our major competitors show that it is the other way round, and that larger firms depend on successful small firms. We have only half as many small firms as our competitors.

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman is deliberately misreading the figures. Japan and the United States have a much larger small industry sector than we have — I look forward to the day when ours is equally large — and small firms in those countries are an essential part of the economic infrastructure on which larger firms depend. The subcontracting part of the manufacturing sector needs small firms, but those small firms depend on the prosperity of the larger firms. The statistics referred to by the hon. Gentleman prove the exact opposite of what he suggested.

The regeneration of our manufacturing sector is an essential ingredient — no one claims that it is the only factor — in a decent strategy for our economic regeneration. The Minister rightly pointed to the Government's record on inflation. I agree that it is a good record. They have reduced inflation and deserve congratulations, but that compliment must be tempered by setting our record against the performance of our competitors. When the Government came to power in 1979 we had the highest unemployment and the second highest inflation in Europe. We still have the highest unemployment and we still have the second highest inflation. As any small business man knows, inflation in Europe is significantly lower than in this country, and real interest rates in Europe are very much lower.

Deregulation and enterprise are two parts of the same debate. I have no doubt that the Government's moves on deregulation have been welcomed by small businesses, and I do not wish to diminish the start made by the Minister or the energy that he puts into his work, but the Government's efforts remain patchy. In too many cases the left hand seems not to know what the right hand is doing. For example, the Government's proposals on family credit would dump an enormous new burden on small businesses. Those proposals may be reviewed, and we shall have to wait and see how they eventually come out.

The Government increasingly treat small business men as unpaid tax and social security collectors. That worrying trend hits small firms harder than it does larger companies. The cost of acting as a Government tax collector is proportionately greater for a small firm. There are figures to prove that fact, and I hope that the Minister will produce more figures, because I believe that they will reveal a worrying trend. The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses has wittily said that it seems appropriate that the key Minister involved in this area should be the Paymaster General, because the small business man feels like a paymaster general for the Government.

I am proud to have led my party in its opposition to the Data Protection Act. We were the only party to vote against the Act, and we did so at least partly because it will dump huge new burdens on small businesses. The form that small businesses using new technology have to fill in under the Act is a horrific and leviathan document, which most do not understand. When I filled in my form I had to get consultants to advise me. There has been a proliferation of agencies to assist small businesses.

All too frequently, deregulation has taken the shape of an attack on employment rights. I agree with the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington that a closer study of United States' experience would prove valuable. I understand that not one of the deregulation measures in the United States has had anything to do with employment rights. This is an important factor which needs to be taken into account. I accept that there are fewer employment rights in the United States, but we cannot ignore the fact that if new jobs have been created there, it has not been done by an attack on employment rights.

It has been suggested that deregulation has accounted for an upsurge in employment in the United States. I urge the Minister to be cautious about using the statistics in their raw state. I understand that a young person in the United States who has never had a job does not go on the jobs register. In addition, there are hundreds of thousands —perhaps millions—of illegal immigrants in the United States, and whereas those who get jobs are recognised as being in the employment market, those who have no jobs dare not register.

Mr. Michael Forsyth rose——

Mr. Ashdown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way. I am sure that he will have a chance to speak, and I do not want to take up too much time.

Of all the deregulation measures that the Government have introduced, the one that I cannot understand—it makes no sense in justice or common sense—is the attack on the wages councils. I cannot see that it will create any significant uplift in employment. I do not believe that paying less to people who earn the very low wages that some wages councils have sought to protect will create more jobs. The Government's action is motivated more by ideology than by any other consideration.

Enterprise is the second part of the debate, and I should like to repeat a strategic point to the Minister. I regret that 99 per cent. of the Government's excellent measures for encouraging enterprise are still directed towards new starts. I understand why that is done. The Government understandably want to take credit for the maximum number of new starts. They are the easiest development to measure and to crow about.

However, much of the Government's enterprise policy can be described as the policy of the Cornish wrecker. Lights are hung out on the rocks, but still one third of those embarking on new starts go down. I do not want to diminish the fact that that proportion has been reduced and our record is better than that of the Americans, but each failure is an individual personal tragedy. Not only is a person made bankrupt, but he loses his job and perhaps even his house. It is nonsense to suppose that we could ever ensure that there were no failures, but we must keep working at the problem.

The Government ought to shift the emphasis towards giving advice and ensuring that small firms survive. That would reduce the number of failures and contribute much more significantly to the growth of employment and prosperity. It is at the point of expansion that the quantum leap from one employee to three can be made and significant prosperity can be generated.

I believe that we need a better system of measurement of the reasons why firms fail, and that more Government resources and assistance should be put into that area. If we are under tight budgetary restraints, the resources should be at the cost of employment measures to encourage start-ups. I would not wish to see that, but if that is the choice I hope that the resources will be diverted in that direction.

I shall now deal with VAT, where we come on to the subject of small firms being the Government's tax collectors. I ask the Minister to comment on the often suggested measure, which we might be able to put into practice and to which I know he has given some thought, to eliminate VAT between registered traders. This is an important measure which would, at one bound, reduce the immense burden of paperwork on small businesses.

Inevitably, one is making a number of unco-ordinated comments. I shall now deal with discriminatory discounts. We have talked about restrictive practices. I say bluntly to the Minister that the level of discriminatory discounts now being operated by the larger operators against the small retail shops is a monstrous injustice. For example, Safeways is able to buy in a tin of dog food more cheaply than a small retail outlet can sell it. We have looked carefully at the power of the monopoly seller. We now need to look at the power of the monopoly buyer, because the large retail outlets now command such power in the buying market place that they are able to command discounts that are all too frequently at a cost to the small retail outlet. It is an injustice that is beginning to hit many of our small grocery outlets and the Government will have to take action.

I am aware that we have had the Binder Hamlyn report, but that report was little more than a whitewash. It will be necessary to take action, and it may be that our starting point should be a code of practice. If, in the end, we have to introduce legislation, defective though it might be, like the Robinson Pasman Act in America, the Government should not shrink from it. In my view, the effect of the monopoly buyer in the market place—monopsony is the correct term—is now becoming so large that it must be tackled.

I shall now deal with the centralisation of finance. I and others are worried about the grip and power that the City of London has over providing finance for small businesses. I remind the Minister that 60 per cent. of all the business expansion scheme funds dispersed in Britain have, I understand, been dispersed to firms in the south-east. A mere 13 per cent.—perhaps the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) will make this point—has gone to the midlands. If one wants to obtain finance for one's company in Britain, large or small, unlike in America or Germany, where there are decentralised banking systems to go to, one must in most cases go to the City of London. In my view, there is a real case to be made for decentralising the financial structure of our country so that small firms can go to somebody who knows and understands their problems, and even perhaps knows their personalities, in order to obtain finance.

I shall now talk about co-ordination. The assistance available to small businesses, especially for new starters, is bewildering in its complexity. Let me remind hon. Members of who are involved in assisting new businesses and new starts today: nearly all county council departments, many district councils, the Manpower Services Commission, the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas, the Small Firms Service, the urban programme, the Development Commission, local enterprise agencies—I commend them—local enterprise boards, regional bodies, such as the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the Welsh Development Agency, ad hoc groups of business men up and down the country, churchmen, enthusiasts, chambers of commerce, banks and valuable organisations such as Business in the Community. To the person starting out it is a mass of duplication, confusion and, in all too many cases, muddle.

I firmly believe, and have written a pamphlet on the subject, that we need a strategy and framework in which we can co-ordinate the activities in this vital and important sector. In my view, Britain should look towards a national community enterprise agency, something that would co-ordinate with community enterprise units, perhaps positioned at county level, which would deal with the initiation of enterprise, the co-ordination of assistance and the establishment of funding and would be a channel for Government assistance and support. That could be more elegantly expressed as the "one-stop shop", which I believe would draw all the activities together in a much more co-ordinated and effective fashion.

I believe that through these measures we could build a start. It may be defective in places, but and that is not surprising. However, the Government have made an important start. We could establish the partnership which is so essential for the economic regeneration of Britain and which is so lacking at present. It would be a partnership between a Government determined to plan and act to reverse Britain's economic decline in the macro-economic sense and to assist small business men in the micro-economic sense, and business men who wish to create prosperity and employment in their own communities. The establishment of that partnership is the essential task that now confronts us.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): The Parliamentary Under-Secretary spoke about enterprise and small businesses, and he listed what the Conservative Government have done in six years. That needs to be put on the record. He has spoken about the White Papers dealing, first, with lifting the burden off the shoulders of small businesses and, now, "Building Businesses . . . not Barriers". I believe that what he has outlined gives hope and new opportunities in many areas, including my city of Sheffield.

I was disappointed by the contribution of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) who described the White Paper as pathetic. I would have been more understanding if he had concentrated on the positive side. He made a plea, although he changed his tune towards the end, for more regulation and controls and then spoke about more training and more research. That would lead me into areas that I deal with elsewhere.

When I was a director of one company in Sheffield and there was an adverse cash flow I had to face decisions about what to cut out. Many other companies in Yorkshire had to face similar decisions. The first thing to cut out was research and the second was training. That was at a time when Labour Chancellors of the Exchequer wallowed in taxing industry and creaming the top off the milk. We paid the price of that in subsequent years, and the Government have had to live through that since 1979.

The Paymaster General and the Secretary of State for Employment had reason to visit Sheffield frequently because the headquarters of the MSC is there and I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary who opened the debate will be speaking to business men in Sheffield about business opportunities this July.

There are many struggling small businesses in a difficult environment in a city such as Sheffield. They have been helped by Government policy and there has been correspondence with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and a number of my constituents about the red tape and burden on established small businesses. Some recent correspondence obviously deals with VAT thresholds on small businesses, a point already made this morning, and I welcome the fact that the Minister will be seeing what people are to do in Sheffield, and I look forward to spending the day with him.

What has happened in Sheffield presents an immense challenge to that city. It may also present challenges to cities such as Newcastle, Liverpool and others. However, there are many people of goodwill, often top executives who have taken early redundancy, who are working to bring Sheffield back to the top again. As the only Conservative Member of Parliament for Sheffield, I am working with them willingly. I ask Ministers for more help for my city.

The debate provides an opportunity to touch on many other issues. The hon. Member for Huddersfield touched on rights, perhaps health and safety at work. I have found that if one industry, one region or one country concentrates on rights too heavily it is not competitive and competitors take business away.

We have touched on the international impact for small businesses and particularly on the scene in Europe. I welcome the reference to the EEC directive. The year 1983 was Europe's year for small and medium-sized enterprises, and it was a Liberal German who initiated the work of the Economic Affairs and Development Committee of the Council of Europe of which I am still a member. Paragraph 6 of its resolution says:

[Sir John Osborn]

"there is still ample scope for action by governments and the competent international organisations in order to meet the specific needs of SMEs and to improve the environment in which they have to operate".

I would have thought that the Government have reacted effectively to that Council of Europe and EEC initiative.

Another aspect that has to be dealt with is the contract of employment. When I was in the European Parliament, I initiated a private Member's Bill, but in the mid 60s, together with the trade unions, I had initiated the first blueprint for a contract of employment. There was the subsequent protection of employment legislation but, by the end of the 1970s, the Labour party chose to destroy my private Member's Bill, at a time when too much protection meant that employers would not take on labour. It must be remembered that when the Labour party was in government unemployment doubled. I know that it has continued to increase since then.

In a league table, 102 major European cities have been dealt with according to their urban growth or decline. This was mentioned in the Sheffield edition of the Star last week. Sheffield was rated number 95 in 1984, and if its situation does not improve it could become number 98. That would leave it above only Sunderland, Messina, Belfast and Liverpool. This is proof to EEC Commissioners that it is an area badly in need of their funds, but it has also aroused some hot reaction from the Lord Mayor of Sheffield and other leaders.

I have been a Member of Parliament for Sheffield for 25 years and I have lived there for many more years, and I wonder why Sheffield is now in such a bad position. Nationalisation of steel was a disaster for Sheffield, and accelerated its demise. Part of the problem has been the long existence for over 50 years, with the exception of 1968, of a powerful Socialist council. It has vetted those industries who sub-contract to the city council, but it has been vetting new businesses as to their political acceptability for the city. I now hope that this political vetting will be reduced.

Mr. Sheerman: I may be anticipating some remarks, but is the hon. Gentleman going through his speech without paying tribute to the enormous enterprise initiatives that Sheffield city council has made to help to improve the dreadful unemployment situation inflicted on the city since 1979?

Sir John Osborn: I thank the hon. Member for that intervention. This is what I shall speak about in the next five minutes. I shall try to cover the invitation adequately. I hope that I shall not be on my feet for too long.

One of the snags has been high rates in Sheffield. I spoke in a debate on the rate limitation orders and said that 48 per cent. of firms questioned by the chamber of commerce said that high rates were the cause of their difficulties. Traditional heavy industries have been heavily hit, with the result that businesses and residents have chosen to leave the city and avoid the rates bill, so that the declining rates base hits even harder those who are left behind. As recently as January, there was a scare in the newspapers of a 71 per cent. rate increase. That has now been reduced. One article dealt with an internal report by the council's budget chairman and deputy leader. It lambasted the Socialist leadership for not facing up to the realities of the situation, but continuing to spend, spend, spend when there was not enough money. There has been a division in the Labour-controlled city council.

There is still resourcefulness in Sheffield that will overcome the exceptional difficulties. Individuals, local companies and councils are involved. I sense a willingness to co-operate even across political boundaries. My hon. Friend mentioned the industry year, sponsored by the Royal Society of Arts, which has had my full support. It has been extremely successful in the city. The chamber of commence and the Industrial Society commissioned a seminar in the early weeks of this year, and one of its outcomes has been an awareness of local industry, and industry in general, by the people to a greater extent than has ever happened before. At one working lunch sponsored by one company, masters, headmasters, managers and trade union leaders were all at the same table. That has resulted in works visits taking place this summer.

Another activity that bodes well for the city's future is the encouragement of links between industry and education in a city where the Socialist city council has in the past banged on, presenting a doctrinaire picture of management as being intent on exploiting the worker. Local businesses have been quick to realise the opportunity for showing young people, through their experience, that this is not the case. The success of the venture Young Enterprise, mentioned by my hon. Friend the Minister, is remarkable. Some of those people will be visiting the House of Commons soon. Local companies are ensuring that people get some idea of the business ethic and what goes on in business. Sheffield has been helpful towards young persons setting up their own businesses.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will see the activities of Volserve, the community programme agency. It has brought together people with experience of insulation, draught proofing and home decorating to try to help them set up their own businesses. My hon. Friend will be meeting the chamber of commerce, which set up its Springboard project two months ago, in association with the MSC. It is helping to assess business potential. Assuming that it is found to be feasible, Springboard will give ongoing moral support and guidance, while the individual receives funding under the enterprise allowance scheme.

The local enterprise agency has set up the Sheffield business venture. As I am the only Sheffield Conservative Member of Parliament, many problems have been brought to my notice, and to be able to send small business people struggling in established or new businesses to an agency where they can get help is an example of the type of help that the Government have been able to give. The city council has an economic development and advisory committee, a meeting of which I should have been attending this afternoon. It has made good suggestions and bad suggestions, but one of the means of attracting the expanding industry and commerce is to establish a one-stop bureau staffed by council personnel from the relevant departments. Again this is another move by the city council.

The other side is the fact that there are more research associations in the city. Surely more than the science park can be given a boost. I have been in touch with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary about a technology park alongside the polytechnic. I hope that he will look at that. Only two months ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie), the Minister for Information Technology, came to the university to set up an institute of information technology. All these ventures have started, but it will take time for them to develop. A city can do much for itself but it needs encouragement from outside and from Government.

Following the Green Paper "Lifting the Burden" there has been the White Paper. We must accept that every region has its own problems. If after this debate there is greater hope that the trade unions, employers, Government and Opposition will all learn to work together to put communities back on their feet, then something will have been achieved.

When I was a boy and when I first entered industry, business was carried on by large companies. History might be repeating itself. For centuries we have had the "Little Mesters" of Sheffield, and in 1634, if I remember the date correctly, the Cutlers Company was founded to support small businesses. My great grandfather established what became a big business, and both he and my great-great grandfather were merchants and had small businesses.

History has its cycles, and for that reason a city like Sheffield will have once again to build up small businesses. There must be no illusions: economic circumstances are making the growth of the small business more important in Europe. Chapter II of the White Paper, entitled "The Next Steps", deals with:

"The machinery established to monitor progress on deregulation—"

I welcome that. It goes on:

"The need to assess regulations in this way should gradually change the context in which decisions are taken and permeate the machinery of Government".

That is a reference to the enterprise and deregulation unit and is welcome. The chapter goes on to deal with communications with business. Both White Papers have proved complex to even the CBI and to Chambers of Commerce, but not to secretaries and legal and financial experts in the companies that make up their membership.

I welcome the illustrated booklet. For the self employed the complexity of life is great. I started a small business with an energetic parent company some 30 years ago. I had the advice of secretaries and financial directors in the parent company and that is the sort of advice small businesses want now. The White Paper goes on to acknowledge that the task of implementing the Government's many proposals will be a major one, and hon. Members should work with my hon. Friend the Minister who is responsible for small businesses, who has shown enthusiasm and courage. I look forward to welcoming him to Sheffield so that he can see for himself what the city is doing, and outline to business men the next steps.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn) will forgive me if I do not linger too long on the problems of his great city. He would not expect someone born on the other side of the Pennines to spend too long in his part of the world anyway.

The hon. Gentleman's outline of the problems facing Sheffield was little more than a ritualistic attack on the city council. By implication, he said that it is the high rates in Sheffield that have wrought the sort of industrial damage that we see in that once great city. No one likes paying rates, and any business man would say that he would prefer to pay less in rates. It is generally accepted that rates form a marginal part of the outgoings of a business. If high rates are the sole reason for the industrial ravages of Sheffield, why is it that unemployment in areas like the south-west, which are traditionally low-rated areas and where traditionally and regrettably the councils are not controlled by the Labour party, unemployment is as great as it is anywhere else?

Mr. Snape: The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has just returned to the debate. He has intervened on a number of occasions, and I have no doubt that he will try to intervene again. I have a recurring nightmare, having spent a night last week listening to the hon. Gentleman, of being strapped in an aeroplane with the light on which shows that I cannot leave my seat, and sitting next to me is the hon. Member for Stafford clutching a copy of "Erskine May". I would be grateful to the hon. Gentleman if he would restrain himself for the next few minutes.

The Minister represents a Lancashire constituency, and I compliment him on that. Perhaps it would be an apt metaphor to say that he wove a fairly elaborate tapestry with some fairly coarse cotton. We should not allow his loyalty to the Government and the quality of his briefing to blind us to the fact that his material was thin stuff. Like other members of his party, the Minister takes the view that Governments cannot do very much. Speeches by Government Members would lead one to believe that there is not much point in taking part in national elections because the activities of the Government are peripheral, except of course when a Labour Government are in power. All the economic ills of the nation are held to be the responsibility of the last Labour Government and the result of the incompetence of their policies.

Over the past couple of years a not very subtle sea change has taken place. The Government are playing the red card for all they are worth. They say that it is the terror and loathing of the next Labour Government that is causing all the damage to British industry and that they themselves are responsible for none of its ills. Within their first few weeks of office the Government virtually doubled value added tax. That had a serious impact on the profitability of small businesses in particular and industry in general. During their term of office the Government have presided over the highest interest rates in Britain's history. Does that not have more than a marginal impact on the profitability of large and small businesses? The Government have presided over — or perhaps just watched, as they do not believe in interference — the wildest fluctuations in the rate of exchange in British history. Have none of these things played more than a marginal part in the virtual collapse of industry in the United Kingdom?

Like other Ministers charged with the unfortunate task of speaking from the Dispatch Box, the Minister said that many jobs have been created. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) spoke about the thousands of new jobs that have been created. Perhaps that is thanks to the policies of the Government. Perhaps their policies do have an impact on job creation. That is what the Government tell us, but it is only in areas of unemployment that their policies have no impact. When asked where these jobs were, the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington could not tell us. I do not know either, but I am prepared to accept the figures that the Minister trotted out. I know where jobs are not being created. They are not being created in my constituency, and not in the borough of Sandwell or in the west midlands, despite what the hon. Member for Stafford says.

The statistics for the west midlands show that the number of people in employment in June 1979 was 2,241,000. The latest month for which I have figures, and I have no reason to think there has been an increase since then — they are more likely to have decreased — is December 1985. The number of people in employment in the west midlands at that date was 1,960,000, a drop of 281,000. That ignores the sea change that has taken place in the type of job that we are talking about. There is a net and not insignificant overall reduction in the number of people in work in what used to be regarded as one of the richest parts of the United Kingdom.

The west midlands traditionally had lower unemployment than the rest of the country, but the reverse is now true. Outside Northern Ireland, we now have almost the highest rate of unemployment in the United Kingdom. Is that something for which the Government or the Conservative party bear no responsibility? Has there been this enormous decline in employment just because of world economic conditions? The bulk of the decline between June 1979 and December 1985 in the west midlands and, no doubt, elsewhere has been in manufacturing industry, in which no fewer than 278,000 jobs have disappeared since the Government tragically, for the future of the nation, took office in 1979.

Mr. Cash: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Unemployment in the west midlands region is of course serious, and the current level is about 15·2 per cent. Stafford is an industrial town. That is why I take exception to what the hon. Gentleman has said. The unemployment rate there is lower than the average for the region. There are some lessons to be learnt from Stafford. Although we have lost jobs in heavy engineering and major industries, we have kept unemployment down. That has much to do with the work force, enterprise and small businesses.

Mr. Snape: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I noticed that his intervention was more general than specific. He will know the exact rate of unemployment in his constituency—at least I hope he will. I could hazard a guess, which would be fairly informed, as I spent some time in Stafford canvassing for one of the hon. Gentleman's opponents during the by-election campaign. Regrettably, he was unsuccessful—regrettable, that is, from a political point of view. The hon. Gentleman will understand what I mean. My guess is that the rate of unemployment in Stafford is far higher now than it was in June 1979.

Mr. Cash: Not so.

Mr. Snape: Well, it would be interesting to hear what the figures are.

Mr. Cash: It is not significant.

Mr. Snape: We are backpedalling pretty desperately before we get on our feet, if such a thing be possible. If he succeeds in catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Gentleman will be able to tell the House what the rate of unemployment in Stafford was in June 1979, compared with the latest date for which figures are available. Even if the increase if lower in his constituency than in the rest of the west midlands, the fact remains that the rest of us are not so lucky.

In the Sandwell and Dudley travel-to-work area, there were 46,818 unemployed people in May. In the borough of Sandwell alone, more than 28,000 men and women have lost their jobs. I have mentioned the devastation in manufacturing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said, it is no good the Minister glibly assuring us that there are alternative jobs for people who formerly worked in manufacturing industry.

In Sandwell we would take some exception to the inference that we should confine our economic activities to the production of hot dogs for American tourists or postcards for passing Japanese visitors. We do not have too many of either. Without the manufacturing capacity that we once had in Sandwell, the nation is poorer. It is tragic for the individuals concerned, but the nation suffers. We have not stopped buying the things that we used to produce in Sandwell — we merely buy them from elsewhere.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Snape: If the hon. Gentleman has something to say, he ought to get on his feet and try to say it.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Whose fault is it that we buy such goods from other countries? Is it not the result of the restrictive practices and behaviour of trade unions during the past two decades, which he has supported?

Mr. Snape: It is my own fault. I should not allow someone with such an obviously unformed mind to participate. Is it the trade unions in areas such as the south-west, where unemployment is tragically just as bad as in my constituency, who are responsible for job losses there? Is it the trade unions in the tin industry in Cornwall——

Mr. Forsyth: Yes.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Gentleman says yes. I withdraw the word unformed as a description of his mind. Malformed is probably a better description. I shall waste no more time on that.

Mr. Corbyn: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend, as I have here unemployment figures by constituency and by local government area. On 10 May 1979, 1,689 people were registered as unemployed in the local government district of Stafford. That figure rose to 4,719 by 14 March 1985.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) said 1983.

Mr. Snape: No, I did not. I said 1979. The Conservative party took responsibility for the nation's affairs, or not, depending on which member of it one listens to, in June 1979. It is not unfair for us to compare circumstances then with now. It was not my party that had an expensive advertising agency to coin the slogan, "Labour isn't working". I do not know whether those actors appeared on the main street of Stafford as they did in West Bromwich during the 1979 general election campaign, but we do not need actors in Stafford, West Bromwich or Sandwell now if the Conservatives want to repeat such a campaign.

We are in a way fortunate to be able to discuss enterprise and deregulation today. I understand from my colleagues in the shadow Cabinet that the motion was originally entitled "Action for Jobs" but somebody pointed out to the noble Lord who is responsible for these matters that, by giving the debate such a title, he might, as he habitually does, be shooting himself in the foot, so the title was changed. We can now talk about deregulation as well.

Some of the more simple minds on the Conservative Benches—we have not heard too much from too many of them other than by way of intervention—talk about privatisation and deregulation with almost as much reverence as some members of far Left splinter groups talk about nationalisation.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman should look behind him.

Mr. Snape: I do not have to if I can look at the hon. Gentleman, because nothing behind me would equal what I am looking at opposite me for simple-minded simplification.

The benefits of widespread deregulation ought to be examined. That is one of the things about which we are supposed to be talking. I have the honour to have some responsibility on behalf of my party for transport matters. Conservative Members worshipped at the altar of transport deregulation for some years. They started in 1980 with the long-distance coach business. They said that the restrictions on that business were unnecessary, so they virtually wiped them out overnight and almost completely deregulated the industry.

Since the passage of the Transport Act 1980, there has been a considerable increase in long-distance coach mileage, but almost exclusively to and from this city. That has brought problems such as unrestricted coach access to any large city. Many continental cities that are not controlled by Socialist administrations have had to act to prevent the tidal wave of long-distance coaches engulfing them.

One of the side effects of the 1980 deregulation has been the appearance of far more coaches in London. Moreover, the facilities available to them are not very good. The National Bus Company, to name but one, was one of the first to say that. Moreover, that well-known Left-winger—at least in the 1930s—Sir Alfred Sherman, has always complained about the number of coaches passing the end of his, I believe, very fashionable street near Victoria coach station.

The Government introduced deregulation overnight in 1980 without giving it much thought, but it has not been without its peripheral effects on the coach business, and particularly on the cross-country coach business. Most of the operators that are left have had to withdraw their coaches from long-distance cross-country routes in order to run coaches to and from London. The NBC has also had to withdraw them from its stage carriage services.

I readily concede that there were some benefits to the industry from that Act, but the NBC now covers about 20 million fewer rural miles than prior to that Act's introduction, and employs about 15,000 fewer people than before. That may give some Conservative Members enormous satisfaction, but deregulation has also had an effect on the coach-building industry.

In their rush to deregulate, the Government never thought to consult British coach builders about their capacity to provide more long-distance coaches. Consequently, our roads and motorways, which are already pretty crowded, have seen the addition of hundreds of foreign-built long-distance coaches. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) holds his head in his hands. Presumably he is in favour of that.

Mr. Michael Forsyth rose—

Mr. Snape: I have learnt my lesson about giving way to the hon. Gentleman. No doubt he will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in due course. The directors of Metro-Cammel or of Dennis—to name but two coach firms—could put the hon. Member for Stirling right about the impact of that legislation on our bus and coach building industry. Once people had rushed in to buy foreign-built coaches, the market more or less collapsed. Virtually no British operator has bought a new coach or stage carriage since that deregulation measure was first published. Was that the Government's intention when they decided on deregulation?

The Government's deregulation policy has had a serious effect on other parts of our industry. The Government admire what goes on in the United States. Some might say that there is more than admiration in the relationship between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States. It is almost hero worship—[Interruption.] It is certainly not heroine worship. It is a one-way sort of worship. American-style deregulation has been adopted in respect of British aviation, and early on we saw the effects of such deregulation. In the United States there is an enormous market, with many customers and many successful, and some not so successful, airline companies. In Europe and in most of the world, airlines cannot compete in the same way. The market is quite different. Poignantly, the first casualty of airline deregulation was one of the Prime Minister's new knights, Sir Freddie Laker. He discovered that the world of deregulation was not quite as profitable as he had thought.

Deregulation and the encouragement of small wharves has meant about 30,000 lost jobs in the docks. No doubt that pleases the Conservative party. It obviously thinks that a good dose of unemployment is needed there, but as recently as 1982 one of our strategic industries, the shipping industry, was praised by the Government Front Bench for its efforts during the Falklands war. About 30,000 seamen have lost their jobs since the Conservative party took office, and about 1,000 ships have been withdrawn from service. The British maritime fleet is as small now as it has ever been in modern times. Deregulation has not brought too many benefits to the shipping industry, and I only hope that some of the lessons have now been learnt.

The Minister made something of training for our young unemployed. I should have thought that both sides of the House were united on the necessity to provide adequate training for our young unemployed people, but the Government show no sign of doing anything apart from paying lip-service to that principle. Their latest palliative for the young unemployed is known as restart. That might apply to the Government's policies, because a good restart is what is needed there. The scheme is intended to be nationwide.

I shall quote from a Manpower Services Commission course booklet on restart. It says:

"Many people develop a negative attitude to unemployment".

The Government had that sort of attitude to unemployment right from the start. The Manpower Services Commission appears to believe that it now permeates the ranks of the unemployed, but that is a somewhat heartless and out of touch view, because the vast majority of the unemployed are desperate for a job of any description.

The booklet does not quite go along with what the Minister had to say about training. It says that the restart scheme initially involves a five-day course at a training centre, during which the unemployed must discuss their attitudes and feelings about being without work. In the blunt speaking part of the country that I have the honour to represent, that could no doubt be disposed of fairly quickly. Next, the unemployed should do "confidence-building" exercises. That is a bit steep coming from this Government. No one has done more than they have to undermine the confidence of the unemployed. Perhaps the unemployed are supposed to do mental press-ups to make them feel better. Next, it says that the unemployed should set themselves "goals". That is a bit like Bobby Robson's pep talk the other night, but he was more successful than the Government look like being.

Finally, the Manpower Services Commission says that they should draw up a checklist of personal strengths and weaknesses. Perhaps the title of the scheme should be "Teach Yourself Psychology".

The young unemployed are supposed to attend the training centre for one day a week for certain periods. The MSC states that newspapers should be made available. It does not specify whether they should be Murdoch newspapers or others. In any event, it says that newspapers should be made available and that help be provided in letter writing with facilities such as photocopiers being on hand. The idea and purpose of the visits is that the trainees should practise writing letters in their quest for a job.

Perhaps I am being unfair, and perhaps this might be a job-creation exercise. I have no doubt that Basildon Bond and other notepaper manufacturers will benefit. The supply of photocopiers might benefit 3M. This is an example of the training that the Government will give. It is an example of the acquisition of skills that the Government will make available to the unemployed. Colleges throughout the country where the courses are to be held are already being asked to prepare their budgets. They are told to make estimates of the number of young people who will be staying for tea.

Mr. Prescott: Tea and sympathy.

Mr. Michael Forsyth rose——

Mr. Snape: No. My hon. Friend is being too kind. Tea and cynicism is a more apt description of the exercise. With some degree of trepidation and reluctance, I give way to the hon. Member for Stirling.

Mr. Forsyth: Has the hon. Gentleman studied the results of the pilot schemes which have been carried out by the Government to help the long-term unemployed? Has he seen the figures, which show that about 90 per cent. of these people are helped either in obtaining employment or in finding a place in training? Does he not welcome that? Is he not being a little cynical about the Government's efforts in this direction?

Mr. Snape: The hon. Gentleman is the one who is being cynical. He knows full well that the "jobs" that young people find are mainly community scheme jobs. They are not jobs in the accepted sense of the word. They are temporary jobs. I can imagine a similar scheme being instituted in an eastern European country, and if it were the hon. Gentleman would be the first to complain about people being directed towards the sort of work that is felt to be good for them.

Mr. Prescott: Freedom!

Mr. Snape: It seems that the Conservative party thinks that freedom should benefit only those who have proved by their own success or income that they can handle it properly.

The cynicism that lies behind the Government's so-called schemes for young people has led, and is leading, to the economic and unemployment tragedies that we are seeing in the west midlands and elsewhere. The one small ray of sunshine is that some Conservative Members will have the benefit shortly, we hope, of learning just what it is like to be unemployed. It will be a long time before the people of the west midlands forget the experience of two successive Conservative Governments.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I am grateful for the opportunity to take up some of the remarks of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). When he was talking about the success of the Government's policy of deregulation of long-distance coaches, it was significant that he did not once mention the consumer. He did not say that people are able to journey across the country now at substantially reduced fares and that the range of services has been greatly extended.

Mr. Snape: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman so early in his speech, but he must get this right. People are not able to journey across the country in the way that he describes. Cross-country long-distance coaches have virtually disappeared since deregulation. I accept, however, that the public are able to journey much more easily to and from London, but that is a different matter.

Mr. Forsyth: I accept that the effect of deregulation has been a substantial increase in the number of services to London. That increase is a result of the demand from consumers. People want to travel to London at prices that are much lower than those which prevailed before the Government's efforts to deregulate long-distance coach travel. Before that it was impossible for them to travel by coach so cheaply. The only other option was to use the overpriced rail system, which was not subject to competition and was weighed down with restrictive practices and overmanning, on which the hon. Gentleman did not lay enough emphasis. It is true that some cross-country coach services have been reduced. That is because coaches have been taken off those routes to meet demand on the London routes.

I found it interesting when the hon. Gentleman said that there are many foreign coaches on our roads and that the British coach-building industry was not able to supply

British-built coaches because the Government had not warned it that demand for coaches would increase. At the same time he was arguing that there were fewer drivers in employment. I have yet to see coaches being driven along motorways without drivers at the wheel. I wonder how the contradiction is resolved.

The significant feature of the hon. Gentleman's speech—this was clear also in the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman)—was the enduring myth in British politics that it is possible to create additional employment through additional Government spending. The extraordinary thing about this myth is that it has managed to survive for so long and that Labour Members should find themselves going along with it in the absence of any evidence to support it.

In this respect, the speeches of Opposition Members have two main themes. First, they contend that it is possible to create jobs by direct subsidy to enterprises. I suppose that we must think of the De Lorean model, and Linwood and Invergordon in Scotland.

Mr. Sheerman: What about Rolls-Royce and Leyland?

Mr. Forsyth: Jobs in Rolls-Royce are not being created by direct subsidy. I agree with the hon. Gentleman in respect of British Leyland because the Government have put £1·4 billion into it. One must ask how many jobs have been destroyed in the private sector and elsewhere in meeting that bill.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman is urging the Government to pull the rug on all state aid and subsidy to all industries. Is that what he is saying? Does he realise the impact that that would have in the west midlands, which has already been affected disastrously by unemployment, especially in the car industry, and specifically at British Leyland and Rolls-Royce at Derby? Throughout the country firms have been helped positively in the past by previous Governments, and this has created and maintained jobs.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman must not try to put words into my mouth. I am not urging the Government to withdraw all state support as he suggests. I am merely saying that it is a delusion to believe that it is possible to create jobs by direct subsidy. The hon. Gentleman makes the point for me extremely clearly, for he takes no account of the fact that the money that Governments provide has to be found from somewhere. It is found by taxing free enterprise in the private sector, and if that is taxed we pre-empt resources which would otherwise be employed in providing jobs within the private sector.

Mr. Sheerman rose—

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my argument, I shall give way to him willingly.

No account is taken by Labour Members of the fact that the levying of taxes on small firms and private enterprise generally will mean that their prices will be forced up and they will become less competitive. They will have less money to invest in developing and expanding their businesses. There will be less demand within the market place and we shall become less competitive as a nation. The hon. Gentleman must answer that point.

Mr. Sheerman: Does the hon. Gentleman understand that the largest charge on public expenditure and on the taxpayer since the Conservatives came to office in 1979 has been the massive and wasteful cost of unemployment—the massive dole queue? All our revenue from the North sea has been spent on that. Would it not be much better, in terms of value for money, to put money into productive firms to keep them going and get them over a difficult patch?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct in pointing out that the largest increase in Government spending has been on the social security budget. Indeed, it has increased by more than 25 per cent. in real terms. It was gratifying to see the hon. Gentleman make that clear to the House. The largest proportion of the expenditure has gone on increasing pensions, for which the hon. Gentleman gives the Government very little credit.

Mr. Sheerman: Do not be silly.

Mr. Forsyth: The largest increase in the social security budget has been for the provision of pensions. The hon. Gentleman made a further mistake, which takes me on to the more convincing and sophisticated part of the argument. He said that it is possible to create employment by increasing public expenditure on the infrastructure—roads and construction. The hon. Gentleman made that point by way of intervention. He argued that if we spent the money on extra building, roads, sewers—the infrastructure—it would create employment and provide savings in that section of the social security budget devoted to unemployment benefit. I think I am right in saying that that was the substance of the hon. Gentleman's argument. It is a complete delusion. His argument presupposes that the extra jobs created in the construction industry, the building of sewers and so on, will be available to those on unemployment benefit.

The experience of both Labour and Conservative Governments who have tried to do that is that large sums spent on capital projects do create a massive demand for workers in the construction industry, but that, on the whole, the demand is for skilled labour. We are talking about creating jobs in particular pockets of the country for those who are unskilled. If the economy and the system are so rigid that workers are unable to move around the country—for example, because of rent control, which the hon. Gentleman supports—high demand for labour is created in some sections of the country at the expense of others, as well as massive distortions in the rest of the economy as false signals are set up by artificial demand.

The most damning aspect is that when roads are finished and sewers are ultimately repaired, the jobs will no longer be available for those brought off unemployment benefit. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Huddersfield laughs, but that is the difficulty. Jobs created by public spending on the infrastructure last as long as the money goes into providing for the project. Jobs created in the free enterprise sector, based on goods and services which are in demand and for which there is a ready market, are not only secure in the long term but allow the creation of further jobs as those enterprises expand.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): Will the hon. Gentleman explain why jobs in housebuilding and construction in the public sector are not ongoing jobs, whereas jobs in the private sector housing and construction business, according to his analysis, are? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, during the lifetime of the Government, housebuilding has fallen to the lowest level recorded since the end of the war, purely as a result of cuts made by the Government in the public sector house building programme? Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the enormous unemployment in the construction industry could be tackled substantially by way of quick action to build new houses and to renovate the enormous number of houses in poor condition?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman and Labour Members are obsessed with the public sector and public sector spending.

Mr. Sheerman: No. Stimulate both.

Mr. Forsyth: I give the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) credit for not going down the road taken by his colleagues and talking about infrastructure projects. He seized on housing repairs. Certainly, in that area the cost per job is lower. Therefore, in terms of the public money put in, more jobs will be created. The hon. Gentleman said that we have the lowest house building programme ever, but he does not take into account the dramatic expansion in the private sector. The hon. Gentleman asked me about the difference between public and private sector housing. It is simple. Private sector housing is funded out of private money. Public sector housing is funded out of public money. Public money must be raised by way of taxation. That taxation pre-empts resources from the private sector which are invested by the private sector far more efficiently than public money which is directed by politicians, committees and bureaucracies. Private money invested in the economy is far more productive, in terms of creating jobs and wealth — the multiplier to which the hon. Member for Huddersfield referred — than public sector money. That is the difference.

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Mr. Snape rose——

Mr. Forsyth: Perhaps the hon. Gentlemen will allow me time to continue. I have been very generous in giving way and I should like to deal with the point that I am trying to make.

Job creation with public money is a high-cost approach and is at best marginal. It is short-lived. It does no one any favours. If Labour Members are concerned about that, they should look at what is happening in their constituencies. If they cannot see what is happening in their constituencies, they should come to Scotland — to Bathgate, Linwood and Invergordon — to see the social misery that has been created by Conservative and Labour Governments in trying to create jobs by pumping in money and giving subsidies. Large enterprises, such as British Leyland, move in and attract people to the area. Then sooner or later they find that because they are located in a disadvantaged place in relation to the real market, they have to close. The subsidies cannot sustain them. People are left, beached like whales, without any prospect of employment.

Mr. Snape: Forgetting British Leyland, which I have no doubt the hon. Gentleman would like to do, will he tell the House whether he supported his Government's desire to renovate private sector housing? They drastically increased public funds for the renovation of privately owned housing. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that legislation actively assisted private companies? Did he support its restriction and virtual abolition within two years by his Government?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman must not muddle two things.

Mr. Snape: Why not? The hon. Gentleman has managed to do so.

Mr. Forsyth: No. It may well be that, in terms of the Government's housing policy, it is desirable to encourage private money to be invested in the rehabilitation of properties. The hon. Gentleman must not confuse that policy with a policy of job creation. I am talking about employment. Spending large amounts of public money is not the most efficient way to create jobs. It may well be that a grant system is a good way to improve housing, but the two policies should not be confused.

Mr. Snape: Did the hon. Gentleman support it?

Mr. Forsyth: I certainly supported the temporary introduction of the 90 per cent. grant levels. That was a successful policy. The Government, having sown the seed, were right to reduce the level, because the activity had begun.

It is unfortunate that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) is not present.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Does my hon. Friend agree that under the Socialist Government the amount of funding available——

Mr. Snape: The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. There are too many sedentary interruptions.

Mr. Howarth: Labour Members obviously had a tiring and emotional night last night.

Does my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) agree that the last Labour Government were so concerned to help in the provision of renovation grants, and so on, that they managed to provide about £92 million? That figure increased to more than £500 million under a Conservative Government.

Mr. Snape: What is it now?

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In almost every aspect of policy where the Labour party attacks the Government — whether it is spending on the Health Service or help for pensioners, the unemployed, education or, as my hon. Friend pointed out, housing — the Government's record is far better than the Labour party's. We have invariably increased expenditure and improved performance. The Labour Government so financially mismanaged the country that, in the hands of the International Monetary Fund, they had to introduce real cuts in many of those areas.

United States experience is a key example that we should follow. Employment during the 1970s grew by about 26 per cent. compared with a United Kingdom figure of 2 per cent. It is significant and symbolic of the Opposition's negative attitude, endorsed by the hon. Member for Yeovil, that they constantly harp on about unemployment when they should be talking about employment and the way to create new jobs. Because the Opposition are so tied to the trade unions for support and succour — and must worship at that altar — they are obsessed with large, unionised enterprises which have nothing to offer this country in terms of employment and growth. That has certainly been experienced in the United States. During 1981 to 1983 the 500 largest companies shed 3 million jobs — over the decade the figure is between 4 million and 5 million — whereas 20 million new jobs were created exclusively in the small business sector.

Opposition Members who argue that large enterprises must flourish and be successful in order to keep the small businesses going should study the United States economy, and other economies, where they would find that that is not the case. In the United States, small businesses are now responsible for 38 per cent. of the gross national product. In the service sector, which is the largest growing sector, 90 per cent. of new jobs are in small firms. Surely the real challenge in creating new employment lies in the expansion of existing small firms and the creation of further small firms.

I welcome the Government's attempt to establish an enterprise culture, which is central to meeting our obligations to employment and creating the social welfare conditions that Conservative Members want. However, having listened to the catcalls and the negative attitude of Opposition Members, I am concerned that the Government's task may prove greater even than the energy shown by my hon. Friend the Minister. It is a matter not of deregulation and creating the right climate for competition and enterprise to survive, but of getting into our society an understanding of the ways in which wealth is created. Rather than treating entrepreneurs as second-class citizens — and there is still a feeling that they should be using the tradesman's entrance — they should be revered, because we depend on them for the quality of life to which my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) referred.

Few Opposition Members have tried to get people to set up in business. If, as an exercise, they did, they would quickly learn that it is rather like surmounting an obstacle course, despite the many measures introduced by the Government to make life easier. As Conservative Members recognise, it is not sensible for the time and energy of business men, which could be devoted to selling their goods and services, to be diverted into the minutae of regulation and form filling.

There is also a role for the schools, which are not doing enough to create an enterprise culture. Indeed, many aspects of the curricula are positively anti-capitalist. There is still an anti-capitalist version of history, where the industrial revolution is portrayed as a period of great poverty and deprivation. The reality is that while conditions were considerably worse than they are today, by our standards, they were considerably better than those achieved by previous generations within the agrarian and feudal economy. The reality is that the industrial revolution liberated people. It improved their standard of living and resulted in an upward mobility in society, which was impossible for all generations before that.

Mr. Raynsford: There has been some discussion in another place recently about the importance of religious education. How would the hon. Gentleman reconcile the advancement of the precept, with the views that he has been putting forward about the need to encourage enterprise in schools?

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth",

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman's smugness is appalling. Has he not heard of people such as Andrew Carnegie? Is he not aware that some of the great charitable works that have been carried out in this country and in the United States are the results of entrepreneurs? [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has never heard of Andrew Carnegie. Has he not heard of Lord Nuffield? Perhaps William Morris is the name that he will find easier to grasp. The hon. Gentleman does a great disservice to the many wealth creators throughout history and today who have played a significant part as charitable benefactors.

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. Friend reflect on the fact that it was the Quakers in the mid 19th century, many of whom Opposition Members would admire, and who deserve the admiration of our generation, who built up both enterprise and the sense of genuine concern for fellow people? Frequently, it was the Quakers who set up businesses of the type that my hon. Friend mentioned. They were and they remain highly successful.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is right. Indeed, as a Scottish Presbyterian, I agree with what he said about the Quakers.

The values of thrift, enterprise and hard work are central to the small business culture. The Church has prospered on the back of the free enterprise system. The systems of government and the ideology to which Opposition Members are wedded have resulted in the destruction of the Church and religion in many countries, including the Soviet Union. But, of course, Opposition Members distance themselves from Socialism in practice. The difference is that we in the Conservative party can embrace capitalism in practice and point to the success of capitalist countries in meeting the objectives to which Opposition Members pay lip service.

I say to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary that we need to go further. We must make it easier for small business men to transfer capital and retain profits. I welcome the measures that have been taken — action on capital transfer tax in the Budget and the gradual reduction of corporation tax. I think it was my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, before she became Prime Minister, who said that capital transfer tax could destroy a medium-sized family business in two generations.

There are still some difficulties in getting self-employed status. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister will do everything possible to persuade his colleagues in the Treasury about the importance of taking action on that matter. We need a clear objective test for self-employed status. If we can increase the numbers of people who can be self-employed, that will enable employers to take on labour without having to worry about whether it will take them over the VAT threshold and about being locked into expensive and burdensome employment protection laws. It could enable hundreds of thousands of people to be employed at lower cost without lowering wage levels. That should be a priority.

I have no doubt that Opposition Members will refer to massaging the figures, but why, for goodness sake, when calculating the unemployment figures, is no account taken of the large numbers of self-employed people in Britain? They do not exist in the figures and that is a major disadvantage.

[Mr. Forsyth]

Self-employment in the United States is rising 50 per cent. faster than paid employment. We could mirror that success. In the United States self-employment accounts for one-tenth of new jobs.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield seemed amused when I mentioned Italy. He offered to conduct the remainder of his speech in Italian, but said that he did not want to be associated with the Italian experience.

Mr. Sheerman: I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not intend to misinterpret my remarks. I said that I did not look to Italy for an example of a country where women's rights have been championed and furthered. That is what I said, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands it.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I would not want to misquote him. I asked him if he would endorse the Italian experience of deregulation under which all firms with fewer than 15 employees are exempt from a raft of regulations and requirements concerning benefits connected with health and safety, and so on. The hon. Gentleman replied by telling me about women's rights. I wish that he had addressed the issue because Italy cannot be said to be under a Right-wing, free market Government. Italy has introduced deregulation to a greater extent than my hon. Friend the Minister. I urge the hon. Gentleman to embrace the Italian example to create the renaissance that we need for employment. The system has worked well for Italy.

At the risk of upsetting Opposition Members, I shall discuss the material signs of prosperity created by deregulation in Italy. Car ownership has increased from 6 to 242 per thousand population. Italy imports more champagne and whisky than any other European country. It has the highest ownership of second homes and is well ahead of any other European country in terms of the numbers of holidays taken. Its people save 24 per cent. of their income, compared with 13·5 per cent. in West Germany and 5·7 per cent. in France. A total of 28 per cent. of the Italian working population is self-employed, compared with 7 per cent. in the United Kingdom.

Why has that come about in Italy? It is the result of the stalemate in labour relations in large enterprises. The trade unions became so powerful that they fossilised the system, and enterprises are now contracting out to small firms so that they have none of the hassle, and costs are lower. Employers, by encouraging their employees to set up mini shops and small businesses within their own factories, have introduced flexibility into business.

As a result, in the depressed regions and areas far from the centres of economic activity there is a boom in small businesses — mini silicon valleys, producing high technology as well as traditional manufacturing products.

The hon. Member for Fulham talked about the Church. The Church has played a key role, not in making great speeches calling for greater public expenditure to repeat the mistakes of the past, but by priests helping to co-ordinate local cottage industries. That is what is happening in Italy.

Mr. Corbyn: I am delighted to see the hon. Gentleman's conversion to the radical priests' movement, and I am sure it will be welcomed throughout the world. However, will he temper his argument and reflect on what the churches' report "Faith in the City" said about the Government's policies on enterprise and deregulation and about unemployment in inner urban areas?

Mr. Forsyth: I thought that I had hinted at my view, but, so that it is clear to the hon. Gentleman, let me say that I regard our churches' approach to unemployment as wholly irresponsible. Like the Opposition, they have nothing to offer. They merely mouth the policies that have failed Britain in the past. I contrast their efforts with those of priests in Italian communities who have grasped the fact that free enterprise will be the salvation of their people and have helped in practical terms by assisting the establishment of businesses in those communities. If vicars in this country are prepared to do the same, we shall welcome that. I hope that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) will give them the support that the Socialist Administration in Italy are giving to their people.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East went to great pains to tell us about the need to do something for textiles and manufacturing industry.

Mr. Snape: I did not mention textiles.

Mr. Forsyth: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would have done so if he had had time. In Italy the production of textiles, clothing, shoes, furniture, tiles and electrical equipment — all the goods that the hon. Gentleman protested British people were buying in our shops — invariably takes place not in large companies such as GEC, but in firms employing 15 or fewer people. Is it not an extraordinary coincidence that that links up with the 15 employees that marks the limit on regulation, restriction and control in Italy?

Britain has the same reserves of people with the necessary skill in textiles and manufacturing industry, but they are either in the black ecomomy or languishing on the dole. They are not getting opportunities, because Opposition Members and others like them continue to support stifling regulation and control which is preventing employment from being generated and the removal of which has been so dramatically successful in Italy.

Perhaps we should leave Italy, because there is so much that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is beginning to achieve, though there is so much more that needs to be done.

Mr. Snape: What about the Mafia? That is a non-union firm.

Mr. Forsyth: The task of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is simple to define, but hard to deliver. If we make it easier and cheaper for small firms to employ people, they will do so. If we make it less burdensome and more rewarding for people to start firms, new firms will be created. If we make it easier and more advantageous to expand, firms will expand and grow.

The delight of the strategy on which my hon. Friend is embarking, which has already produced dividends, is not just that it leaves the Opposition with nothing to say — the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield proved that—but that it is not inflationary. The more new firms that are created, the broader will be the tax base and the lower will be the pressures on public spending. The supply side strategy of freeing firms to grow has the great advantage that it ends the idea of high inflation being the price paid for ineffective action on employment, which is all that the Opposition have to offer.

Of course, my hon. Friend's strategy will be long lasting and will create the wealth that we need to meet our obligations to the poor and the most vulnerable in society. In short, it enables us as a country not only to create jobs, but to create wealth—an aim on which the Opposition have no ideas of substance to offer the British people.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): During the 40 minutes or so in which we have listened to the Adam Smith Institute contribution to this debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) and I have been able to do a little research. We found that the majority enjoyed by the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is the same as the Conservative majority in Fulham in June 1983. Therefore, as a portent of things to come, the hon. Member for Stirling may have made a historical speech in the debate.

This debate is also a debate within the Tory party. It is a debate between the pre-industrial revolution Tories, such as the hon. Member for Stirling, and the land-owning classes. The hon. Member for Stirling's analysis of the industrial revolution is incredible. To claim that the movement of people from the land to urban centres resulted in an improvement in their living standards is to turn history on its head. One does not have to read a Marxist interpretation of history to discover the social conditions of the mid to late 19th century in all the urban centres. People were forced off the land by mechanisation and an increased grab for profits by landowners and into urban centres in even worse conditions than they had left in rural areas.

The hon. Gentleman should study a little history before coming here and giving us the garbled view that somehow deregulation and lack of any controls on the ability of companies to exploit individuals lead to a higher living standard. If he believes that he should go and look at the teeming tenements in Hong Kong and places such as the Philippines where capitalism is unbridled. There he would find dirt, disease, squalor, misery, short lives and high levels of infant mortality. That is where the policy that the hon. Member for Stirling has been expounding to the House would lead us.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I did study a little history, admittedly at St. Andrews, which the hon. Gentleman would probably write off. I do not dispute the fact that in Hong Kong and in 19th century urban Britain conditions were squalid. I was simply saying that conditions in Britain at that time were much better than they had been previously in rural areas. I ask the hon. Gentleman to address his attention to the conditions which exist in the squalid flats of Hong Kong, which I have seen, compared to conditions which exist in Communist China. The conditions in Hong Kong are much better by far than they are in the sort of society that the hon. Gentleman supports.

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman obviously did not do enough history at St. Andrews while he was enjoying the benefits of a publicly funded education. His analysis of Chinese history is as cock-eyed as his analysis of British history. He should realise that the appalling social conditions in Hong Kong are the result of deregulated unbridled capitalism. The conditions enjoyed by people in China now, compared to 1948, are immeasurably better. The country has pulled itself up without the assistance of anybody else, but by collectivising its economy, its efforts and its energy.

Starvation and poverty are not common in China as they were in 1948. Before the hon. Gentleman lectures the world on the way in which capitalism can improve living standards he should look at some of the countries which had to develop their own economies without the assistance of anybody else. I know that Conservative Members are now going on a "love China" spree. They should remember that the present prosperity in China is based upon a collective economy and not on an individual and market oriented economy.

Mr. Trippier: If that is the case, why do we not have people queuing up in Hong Kong trying to get back to Communist China?

Mr. Corbyn: The Government of both China and Hong Kong are looking after each other quite well. Hong Kong is the major port for China and it is also the route by which much foreign capital is invested in China. The Minister and the Government knew that very well when they negotiated the Hong Kong treaty.

I shall bring the debate slightly nearer to home because I believe that we are talking about enterprise and deregulation in this country. However, international comparisons are obviously important. The Government make much play of what they have done about employment and unemployment in this country. In June 1979 the number of employees was 23,157,000. By September 1985 it was 21,346,000. During that period the working population had increased from 26,609,000 to 27,669,000, a very large increase in levels of unemployment, as anyone can see.

Unemployment has more than trebled since the Government came into office, yet they still lecture us that somehow or the other the economy is on course and is more efficient. I can think of nothing more inefficient than having over 3 million people doing nothing with close on 1 million people on various schemes that are largely designed to massage unemployment figures rather than providing real jobs. They are trying to con people into believing that deregulation and lowering wage levels and living standards provides prosperity for the many. The Government's economic strategies have led to the highest ever levels of poverty in modern times, the highest ever levels of unemployment, and a feeling of desperation, desolation and hopelessness in the inner cities that has not been experienced since before the war. That is the effect of Government policies, but they tell us that we are turning the corner, and all that they have to do is a little more deregulation and then everything will be all right.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Member started his speech by referring to the connection between unemployment figures and election results, and has now turned to the question of the difference in the rate of unemployment between 1979 and the present day. He has tried to draw conclusions relating to the electoral consequences of that. I am not denying, as in my constituency, that the level of unemployment is higher than it was in 1979, although I was not a Member of Parliament at that time. By 1983, the unemployment rate had increased, but much of that was the consequence of the policies pursued by the Labour party when in government——

Mr. Raynsford: That was in 1979.

Mr. Cash: The consequence was fed through, to answer the point made by the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford). It is a tribute to the realism of the British people that by 1983, when asked, they returned the Government with the most massive majority.

Mr. Corbyn: What a curious view of history the hon. Gentleman has. I seem to recall the 1983 general election campaign being dominated, as usual, by a number of sycophantic newspapers with gung-ho chauvinism about the Falklands unprecedented in modern times, which resulted in a swing against the Tories. The election in 1983 was not a great victory for the Tory party. It had fewer votes then than in 1979. If we take the pattern of history forward, the hon. Gentleman may lose his seat, and we can look forward to having once again a Labour Member for Stafford.

I move now to the situation in Greater London and the effects that unemployment is having on inner urban areas such as that which I represent. The level of unemployment in the Greater London area as of April 1986 is 402,700 people. That is a regional number as high as, or even higher than, many other parts of the country, but this is supposed to be in the prosperous overblown south-east, the prosperous part of Britain. In fact, the number of people unemployed is higher than in Scotland and many other regions. It is a terrifying figure.

The structure of unemployment within London shows that in the inner urban areas the levels of unemployment have consistently been higher than the national average and there has consistently been a structural level of unemployment that has meant that older people have been unable to find more work when companies have closed and the number of school leavers out of work is higher. The level of wages in those areas is often considerably lower than for other places, yet Conservative Members lecture us about the connection between wage levels and unemployment.

Recall the figure of 402,700 people unemployed and compare it with the number of vacancies notified at the job centres, which in April 1986 was 26,600. For the community programme agencies the figure was 2,032. The opportunities for employment in Greater London, especially for young people and for middle aged people who have lost their jobs because of redundancy, are limited. On 10 April in my borough of Islington, 12,131 males and 4,908 females were unemployed. That gives a total in the borough of 17,039 people. Those people want work. They are prepared to work and see around them the possibilities for work which would be realised if money were pumped into the economy by way of public investment and enterprise.

I have here the figures for full-time education school leavers registered in benefit offices on 10 April. In Islington those under the age of 18 numbered 283; for 18-year-olds the figure is 181, and for 19-year-olds and over it is 1,118. That is a total of 1,582 people of school leaving age or near it who are unemployed in the borough that I represent. Those figures are a devastating indictment of the Government's policies.

The Manpower Services Commission report for April shows that unfilled vacancies at the employment offices at Holloway numbered 187. At the Islington office it was 420, and at the careers offices there were just 25 vacancies notified at the Barbican and 114 at the Holloway office. Any hon. Member who cares to compare those figures with the figures for unemployment that I have given will appreciate the misery and hopelessness felt by many young people. My borough council has done a great deal to try to promote employment in the borough. It set up and helped to fund a co-operative development agency and did a great deal through the GLC to open small factories. The Minister may laugh, but if he cares to visit Islington he will see how miserable life is for many school leavers, and he will see how his Government are detested because they are not prepared to do anything for young people.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong. As a Minister, I have officially visited Islington on several occasions, even within the last 12 months, and I saw much enterprising work going on there. If I were the hon. Gentleman I would not pay credit to the GLC for what it did in that area because the greatest constraint on business and enterprise in Islington was the substantial increase in rates.

Mr. Corbyn: There are two errors in the Minister's argument. Firstly, no Minister has been able to produce any serious evidence to show that the level of rates has anything to do with the amount of business enterprise going on in any part of London. He knows that perfectly well. Secondly, he also knows that the GLC did a great deal to build factories and small workshop facilities, and that it funded various enterprises in the inner London areas. The GLC created a large number of jobs and saved a lot of jobs in London. Presumably that is one of the reasons why the Government were so keen to abolish the GLC, why the London Residuary Body is not prepared to take on the functions of the GLC, and why the Government are so hostile to the Greater London Enterprise Board.

My borough council has tried to create jobs through co-operative ventures and through the provision of factories and workshop space. The cost of creating those jobs is considerably less than the cost of jobs created in enterprise zones, which receive an enormous public subsidy by way of low rates.

The Government talk endlessly about solving our unemployment problem through the creation of small businesses and deregulation. The fault of that strategy is that the facts are against them. There are no more than 600,000 extra people employed in small businesses or self-employed than there were in 1979. The Government know perfectly well that their other policy of not supporting major manufacturing enterprises leads to a cycle of decline.

A few weeks ago we debated the shipbuilding industry and its need for Government support. The Government are not prepared to support that industry, and that leads to a knock-on effect on the loss of jobs. The same thing applies to all the other large, basic manufacturing industries. If the Government wish to solve the problem of unemployment they will have to start by being prepared to create and, support conditions for success in our large, basic manufacturing industries.

Mr. Trippier: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to mislead the House in any way. He said that there was not an increase in the number of people employed in small firms. Indeed, I think that he suggested that there was a decrease.

Mr. Corbyn: I said increase.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman acknowledges that there has been a substantial increase.

Mr. Corbyn: There has been an increase of 600,000.

Mr. Trippier: It is much bigger than that. Where is the hon. Gentleman getting his statistics? I take it that he is not including the self-employed.

Mr. Corbyn: The figures that I referred to were for the self-employed, and I recognise that there has been an increase. I was saying that there has been no increase to compensate for the loss of jobs in manufacturing industry. It has not solved the problem and it will not do so. The figures come from the Minister's Department. If he wants to check them, he presumably has better access to statistics than me.

Mr. Trippier: It is the use of statistics.

Mr. Corbyn: If the Minister wants to say something, he need not mumble.

Mr. Trippier: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman is misleading the House. He was talking about the number of people in small firms. If he checks the record on Monday, I am sure that he will find that that is what he said. My hon. Friends have spoken continually of the substantial increase in the number of self-employed people and people employed in small firms. Nobody disputes the fact that there has been a shedding of labour in larger companies, but the hon. Gentleman may want to check the figures in regard to manufacturing industry. They may be for industry as a whole.

Mr. Corbyn: The figures that the Minister referred to come from his Department and they show that there were 1,903,000 self-employed people in June 1979 and that the projected figure for September 1985 is 2,651,000. He will find that there was a loss of 35,000 jobs in energy, 43,000 jobs in manufacturing and 35,000 jobs in construction between September 1984 and September 1985. There has been an increase only in service industries. My point is that the Government's policies do not solve the problem and nor can they because the problem is that the Government are not prepared to maintain the country's industrial base.

We must consider the misery of inner-urban areas where small companies go bust because there are no orders from larger companies. That means that there are extremely high levels of structural unemployment. Such levels have many effects. They lead to a deterioration of the local economy, a feeling of hopelessness and misery to which many Labour Members are accustomed, and to dangerous health problems for unemployed people. The death rate among unemployed people is higher than that among people in work, as is the incidence of mental illness. Unemployed people suffer feelings of insecurity and anxiety about being unable to make ends meet. That is a consequence of Government policy.

All that the Government can offer us is the prospect of deregulation. They claim that workers should price themselves into a job. To that end, they remove the guarantees afforded by wages councils. Why? The same Government have given massive increases to people at the other end of the scale such as to the chairmen of nationalised industries, judges and Army, Navy and Air Force officers. They apparently need an incentive to work, but, at the other end of the scale, people apparently need lower wages to force them to work. The two do not add up. The Government are trying to create poverty at one end of the scale and wealth at the other. That goes hand in hand with their taxation policies through which they have handed out £15 billion to people who earn more than £20,000 a year during the past seven years.

The Government are proposing a further round of deregulation. Deregulation does not necessarily create jobs, but it creates worse and often dangerous working conditions. The Government should ask themselves why some of the regulations exist and why workers have banded together in trade unions to demand safe working conditions, time off with pay to attend to other duties, and maternity leave. In the long run, the Government want to remove all those provisions. The Minister said that there were at present no plans to change the health and safety at work legislation. However, there is a tremendous shortage of health and safety inspectors, which can lead only to dangerous working conditions.

Unemployment can be defeated if the Government show a preparedness to direct and control investment, to support manufacturing industry, to ensure a shorter working week and earlier retirement, and to have, if necessary, a higher school-leaving age with more time in education. That could help to solve the problems of unemployment. We do not need the Government's nonsensical rush into unbridled capitalism with all that that brings with it.

In reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham), the Minister said last week that in the past five years those on lowest earnings had been underpaid by £12 million, and that the money had been retrieved by wages council inspectors. He thus accepted that there had been much underpayment in wages council industries. He then informed the House that only eight firms had been prosecuted for failing to comply with minimum wage laws. The Government's drive to get rid of regulations is entirely misplaced and is directed at the wrong end of the scale. Instead, they should support local government in its efforts to create jobs and support those who are trying to develop manufacturing industry. Above all, they should not rush headlong into removing all regulation. They should instead ensure that workers in small industries receive the protection that they need and so richly deserve.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Several points have been made about the situation in my constituency. A few months ago Newcastle university produced a report on a political and entirely objective basis, showing that there were 70 boom towns in the country. They were categorised according to certain criteria, such as the level of unemployment, the number of cars, the extent to which people were involved in different activities, and so on. Stafford came 53rd out of over 250 in all.

The figures also show that since 1979 Stafford has had considerable unemployment, as the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) has illustrated. I do not deny that unemployment has increased since 1979. However, the results of the 1983 elections and of the by-election that I fought in 1984 were considerably better than people might have expected. The work force and management in Stafford produce products of a very high quality. As a result GEC has won the Duandong contract in China and a contract has also been won for the Queen Mary. Contracts like that provide tremendous opportunities for employment in Stafford and other areas.

[Mr. William Cash]

Furthermore, the development of small businesses on the Raleigh Hall industrial estate, and so on, has shown that the spirit of free enterprise is very much alive in Stafford, with all its consequences for job prospects. Thus, the suggestion that the level of unemployment in Stafford is not complemented by that spirit of enterprise is entirely misleading.

The reality—this applies to all the matters that have been raised in the debate—is that, regrettable as unemployment levels may be, the crucial issue is how positive we can be in trying to get people back into work, when in truth most of the reasons why there is a high level of employment are those that are shared in all parts of the world. My hon. Friend the Minister and others of my hon. Friends have referred to the United States, Japan and European countries, including Italy. They have demonstrated the increase in the level of enterprise that has occurred in those countries. We must take account of overseas experience and be positive and constructive to try to improve prospects for our own people.

The Government take no satisfaction from the high level of unemployment that now prevails. We must look to the future and through measures such as those that are contained in the excellent White Paper entitled "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" to reduce the level of regulation to help those who are engaged in small businesses. We must help people set up small businesses and extend that help when they are in being. That is why I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the help that the Government have given with local enterprise agencies. I understand that there are now well over 300 and that they are performing an extremely useful task. The agencies, in combination with local chambers of trade and other bodies, are showing that enterprise is something that we are learning about and developing at a rate that is enabling us to provide more real small businesses and more effective self-employment. The figures and the arguments are well known to all Members, and we know that we shall not be able to provide free enterprise and small businesses without a great deal of hard work.

An article appeared in The Times on Friday 6 June which referred to the work of Mr. Francis Blanchard, the veteran director general of the United Nations International Labour Office. I am sorry that not more Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen are in their places to hear what Mr. Blanchard had to say. I hope, however, that they will take note of his remarks.

The view is taken by Mr. Blanchard that self-help is of the greatest possible importance for those who are living in areas where economic conditions are not as good as we would like them to be. The same general point could be made about Britain. Mr. Blanchard says, especially about the third world, that the "'informal' world of street vendors, repair shops, hoe makers and fish fryers should 'organise better the jobs they create themselves'. The road to a better life is not going to be via the factory floor."

His report asserts that

"to rely on policy measures, legislation and the promotion of proper standards would simply stifle the dynamism and creative abilities of the poor."

The comment is made that this approach

"breaks all the ILO moulds."

Mr. Blanchard argues that "it is time to recognise that the fight against unemployment and poverty is being lost" and that by inference there is a need to make changes in the direction of helping people to help themselves and to provide the environment in which they can become self-employed because the prospects for them to be able to gain employment with a large manufacturer are no longer there and are not likely to be available in future.

We owe it to ourselves to examine the American and Japanese experience. The cutting of taxes, which has been discussed over the past few months, is an approach that we should consider carefully. I include in that a plea to increase the VAT threshold to £50,000. Cutting taxation remains a central issue in the debate. No doubt the debate will continue within our party. The importance of it may be highlighted by the fact that in the 1920s, when America

I think that President Coolidge was in office—reduced the tax rates significantly, an enormous increase in employment immediately followed. In the 1950s, in Japan, Tashan Ishibashi reformed the tax structure. There seems to be direct correlation between tax rates and the propects for self-employment and the regeneration of enterprise and employment.

There are other matters, such as education, to which we should pay attention in such a debate. Children must learn practical business skills to be able to take advantage of the enterprise structure that we are trying to create. We must accept that some children are not academically minded, and have a tremendous difficulty with academic subjects. The reality is that, eventually, they must find jobs. We must give them the opportunity, through the education system, to acquire the necessary skills to do so. They must acquire the adaptable and transferable skills that are necessary for them to get jobs when they leave school. I believe that initiatives are taking place. I have already mentioned that in my constituency GEC is providing practical study courses for schoolchildren. I recommend companies in other constituencies to follow that move.

The 18 million additional jobs created in America started very much in the home. Self-employment lay at the root. Deregulation and the reduction in the amount of legislation in America ensured that 85 per cent. of the jobs created in the past few years started in the home. That important point is reflected in the White Paper. The change in the use classes order could have a beneficial effect in providing an environment in which people involved in high technology or the rural economy will be able to provide themselves with an opportunity to set up in business on their own without unnecessary restrictions.

When redundant agricultural buildings are converted, they must be put to the best possible use. I congratulate the Royal Society of Agriculture of England, the Country Landowners Association, the National Farmers Union and Rural Voice. I thank the Bishop of Stafford and Rural Voice in my constituency for the work that they have done in helping to provide better opportunities for those who work in the rural economy. With new machinery and increased overproduction in agriculture, which is discussed in the White Paper, there are opportunities and there is a need for us to help those who live in the rural areas. We must put the redundant agricultural buildings to the best possible use.

Regulations take time. Time equals money. Regulations take time to absorb and time to put into practice. The need to reduce the level of over-regulation has been accepted by the Government. The White Paper provides an intelligent framework within which the nuts and bolts needed to achieve our objectives can be found. It is one of the unstuffiest examples of "Dehumphrification" that I have seen in recent years. This first-class document deserves careful reading. It shows that we are committed not only to enterprise but to creating jobs.

A few years ago we introduced the Small Business Bill, which provided an opportunity for many people to examine the way in which to implement small business proposals. We in the Conservative small business bureau proposed a system of co-ordination between Government Departments to reduce the burden on small businesses. The Bill's opening words referred to the promotion of enterprise and employment — two crucial aspects facing this country.

Public services can be provided from private enterprise. Public services and public expenditure cannot be whistled out of thin air. We want to produce private enterprise on a scale that will dramatically increase over the next 25 years. We have a serious unemployment problem, but we are beginning to win through. The principles on which the Small Business Bill, the White Paper "Lifting the Burden" — which has now been implemented by the Government — and the new White Paper "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" are based provide the framework within which it is possible to start moving towards the fulfilment of the enterprise culture that we have discussed in this debate.

Reference has been made to trade unions and to the industrial revolution in the 19th century. I dare say that if I had lived in the mid-19th century I, too, would have wanted to stand up for the rights of workers who lived in appalling circumstances. My great grandfather, William Cash, was one of the first commissioners to deal with the treatment of coal workers on the London docks. He faced a big battle, which has been well documented, in getting the necessary legislation on to the statute book.

It does not follow that those of us who believe in free enterprise are necessarily antipathetic to the notion of trade unionism. We are concerned with the restrictive practices that have been built up around trade unionism, not its objectives. People from all walks of life need protection. It is equally important to ensure that we do not build up enormous monopoly interests, power centres and bases — whether in manufacturing, big industry or trade unions — which militate against the interests of the enterprise and the prospects for self-enterprise of the people as a whole.

Competition is part of deregulation. I was delighted to see the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry of a review of competition policy. I have called for such a review in previous debates. Some months ago, I tabled a question asking for a review of competition.

I should have preferred this debate to take place in prime time rather than on a Friday, and Friday the 13th at that. This is a central issue and the debate provides an opportunity for us to consider questions in a balanced way. Despite one or two altercations, this has been a helpful and constructive debate, conducted in a reasonable spirit.

We have a national job to do, and through the White Paper the Government have done an enormous amount to reduce regulation and increase the prospects for enterprise. I congratulate the Government on the progress that has been made. We are, of course, always impatient for more. I would rather see deregulation than White Paper, but I pay tribute to the work of Lord Young, the Paymaster General and my hon. Friend the Minister for their work in putting together the nuts and bolts that will lead to greater prosperity in this country.

It might be appropriate now to refer to Mr. Paul Twyman, head of the enterprise and deregulation unit, for his work during the past two years. I also thank the officials in the Department, many of whom are here today, for their hard work — which must not be underestimated — in putting together a package that will help this country to get off the ground and become more and more enterprising during the next 15 to 20 years.

Mr. Sheerman: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall not detain the House long.

There has been a sense of unreality about some aspects of the debate and I had to pinch myself when listening to some of the remarks from Conservative Members. The Government have been in power for seven long years. Indeed, the Conservatve party has been in power more often than any other party since the turn of the century, especially since 1945. If something is fundamentally wrong with the spirit of enterprise and the encouragement of new and small businesses, is there not something wrong with the catalogue of scapegoats put forward by the Government? The Government have an overwhelming majority and can obtain any legislation that they want, whether financial, industrial or trade. Yet, after seven long years, we are in the most pitiful position. We import more than we export and we have an appalling index of manufacturing production. For the period April to June 1975, it was 112·3, whereas, for April to June 1986, it was down at 102·3. Yet this country is devastated by mass unemployment unimagined by any Government since 1945. The Government are no longer committed to full employment——

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Rubbish.

Mr. Sheerman: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to some of his colleagues' speeches, he would know that that is a common feeling in the Conservative party, which is no longer committed to full employment. The Government want to talk not about unemployment, only job creation. Of course we must talk about job creation, but we must also talk about unemployment.

We want to get the answers right and we desperately want job creation to be more successful than ever before. No Government deserve to be elected if they do not believe in the successful creation of wealth, competition from markets and the ever-changing needs of society where technology is moving so fast. We in the Labour party are committed to meeting those challenges successfully. We are conscious that we want to spread the benefits of that wealth creation differently from the Conservative party. We want to spread them across our society, to all sections of the community. That is the real difference between Labour and Conservative Governments when in power.

I have to nail some other myths before the debate closes. There is a myth that the Conservative party would love to promulgate, and does promulgate. No one is better at it than the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth).

[Mr. Sheerman]

That myth is a belief that the Labour party is anti-enterprise, anti-business and anti-wealth creation. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I tell the hon. Gentleman and other Conservative Members that, as I go round the country, business men and managers say, "Please let us have a Labour Government again." [Laughter.] Up and down the country, manager after manager says that. Conservative Members may laugh at that because it is an uncomfortable fact. [Interruption.] They do not like it. It is something to do with the fact that most of the idle people representing the Conservative party in the House have less attachment to expertise or background in manufacturing industry than any House of Commons in the past 100 years. They are parasites—people who have never earned a decent living in manufacturing industry in their lives. There are so many solicitors, parasites, stockbrokers—people who have never ever got their hands dirty in British industry. That is why there is an enormous gap. That is why they are so out of touch with what manufacturing production is about—

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: I shall not give way.

The fact is that the Conservative Benches are the Benches of parasites—people who have done well out of the City and out of the cushy jobs in our society. That is not true of hon. Members on the Opposition Benches. We have more experience of British manufacturing industry.

I tell the Government that, unlike them, we in the Labour party are not totally blinkered by ideology. One of the things of which I am extremely proud is that the Labour party is a learning party. We say that we sometimes make mistakes and get things wrong. We listen to people, industry and the trade unions, and we go back and reform our policies and get them right.

The Minister asked us what we shall put before the electorate. Let me tell him. The Labour party believes in a new and invigorating partnership between Government and industry—a creative relationship. We shall have a very good relationship with manufacturing industry. We shall have a more aggressive or a tougher relationship perhaps with some other areas of British industry. I speak particularly of the City and the banking system. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) made this point, too. We need banks and institutions that invest in all our country—all our people.

In his speech, the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) wiped away the futures of many people—whole cities, towns and regions. They do not have to stay there any longer. They are in the wrong place. They set up home, brought up kids and invested their life and future in their houses in areas that are no longer relevant, so let those communities wither and die. Let all those people move down to the rich pastures of the south.

The hon. Gentleman talked much about his constituency. I have looked at the unemployment figures for Stafford, for Rossendale—and for Reading, because of the Whip who was occupying the Front Bench at the time. I recently visited Reading. My constituents believe that everything is all right in the south of England, that it is rich and has full employment. In Reading unemployment is over 11 per cent. That is a place with green field sites in a plush part of the south of England, but even there, despite its proximity to Heathrow and arteries linking it to the rest of the country, unemployment is high.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has made a number of unsubstantiated remarks. He made a series of general allegations about my speech which in no way reflected what I said. I said that I was deeply concerned about unemployment in my constituency, but that it was lower than the west midlands average, and that the Newcastle university report showed that, of the 70 boom towns in the country, Stafford came 53rd. I said that that proved the enterprise of the Stafford people and, furthermore, that unemployment was reflected in Stafford not by the negative, pessimistic view portrayed by the hon. Gentleman, but by a positive and enterprising attitude. I pay tribute to the people of Stafford for that reason.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Member for Stafford claims that I made unsubstantiated allegations. I mentioned the figures for the decline in manufacturing industry and GDP since 1979. They are incontrovertible. We sell less abroad than we import. The figures are on the record.

The Labour party understands British industry's needs. We understand the need to build a creative partnership between the public and private sectors better than the blinkered ideologues represented by the leaders of the Conservative party. That has not always been so because ideologues such as the Prime Minister, supported by the Secretary of State for Employment, have not always been there. A creative partnership between the public and private sectors can do a great deal for industry and enterprise. We believe that we can create, at national, regional and local levels, an enterprise infrastructure that can and will build on the emerging developments.

The Minister does not have to tell us that small business and small industry are important employers. We do not deny it. Indeed, wearing our constituency and shadow ministerial hats, we understand it only too well. We are in the business of creating a partnership for enterprise which will truly bring about positive enterprise throughout our country. That means investment in those parts of the country that some Conservative Members, such as the hon. Member for Stirling, have written off. We do not write off the west midlands, areas of Scotland or any part of our country. It is the Government's responsibility to create work and wealth for all our people, not just for those who live in the safe, soft Conservative heartlands. That is what we shall put our hands to after the next general election. We shall throw out many of the parasites in the Conservative party.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Waffle.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) should have been here earlier if he wanted to hear some vintage waffle from his hon. Friends.

This Government do not understand industry. They are unsympathetic to industry. Industry has been in decline since the Government took over. Manufacturing industry has declined by one sixth. The Government have done precious little to reverse that trend. They parade their excuses. We are told that local government has pushed up the rates and made local industry uneconomic. There is no basis of fact for that claim. No serious research has been produced to prove that that is the case.

The 6 June edition of New Society reports that there is no evidence that decent employment standards deter employers from taking on more staff. Another myth is exploded.

The hon. Member for Stirling gave a wonderful performance. He said that the reason for our economic decline was the terrible stranglehold of the trade union movement, yet he went on to say that the reason for the success of the Italian economy was the terrible stranglehold of Italy's trade union movement. It was a tortuous process by which the hon. Gentleman drew those conclusions.

Mr. Michael Forsyth rose—

Mr. Sheerman: I shall not give way. I want to give others a chance to speak.

The latest Tory flavour of the month is that we should make our economy like that of another country. The United States and Italy are often mentioned. I am always suspicious of simple, populist solutions to complex problems. The Government specialise in such solutions.

Rebuilding the confidence of British industry will be a difficult task and we shall get nowhere fast by saying, "Deregulation will do it," or, "See how the Americans and the Italians have done it." Societies have different histories and cultural backgrounds and they must work within those constraints.

Mr. Ashdown: I have listened with care to the hon. Gentleman's considerable diatribe against the Government on employment matters, but I remind him that the debate is, at least in part, about enterprise and small businesses. Will the hon. Gentleman, therefore, give us some idea of the Labour party's policy for encouraging enterprise and small businesses?

Mr. Sheerman: Unless the hon. Gentleman has selective hearing, he must have heard me say that we would take a firm line with the financial institutions and ensure that a creative partnership of private and public enterprise would bring investment in all our regions. I said that finance would be more easily available in the regions and that we shall produce a package for small business which is attractive and more relevant in terms of enterprise allowances and the other initiatives that a Labour Government will produce and build on.

I said that the Labour party is a learning party. I admit that, although there have been problems with the enterprise allowance scheme, it has been a success. The problems include the facts that the scheme does not go far enough and the limits are too low. The £1,000 requirement is too restrictive and the counselling advice and back-up are not good enough. We are producing and will produce policies to encourage enterprise and small businesses which will be more successful than the Government's policies.

We shall not restore enterprise by the ideological diatribes that we hear from the Government. A Labour Government will consider the problems and solve them in a way that will set the country free and liberate enterprise.

1.59 pm

Mr. Trippier: Before hearing the extraordinary speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and the way in which it was delivered, I would have said that the advantage of having debates on a Friday is that we usually throw more light than heat on our deliberations. If there has been any difficulty in the debate and perhaps on occasion tempers have been frayed, it is principally because Conservative Members are becoming increasingly frustrated by the fact that the Labour party especially does not go into any detail on what its future programme would hold for the small firms sector.

Mr. Snape: Who is in charge?

Mr. Trippier: I do not know who is in charge of the hon. Gentleman's party, but it is the responsibility of the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends to get that programme sorted out.

Mr. Snape rose

Mr. Trippier: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Snape: Stick to the brief.

Mr. Trippier: I shall show the hon. Gentleman the brief, as he mentioned it.

Let us look at the Labour party manifesto for 1983 "The New Hope for Britain". There is not one mention in it of small businesses, despite what the hon. Member for Huddersfield said. All I want is the simple connection of two words "small businesses" somewhere in that document. It has been double checked, and there is no such reference.

Mr. Snape rose

Mr. Trippier: I shall refer to the hon. Gentleman shortly. Perhaps he would like to intervene then. I must make my point, and I am sure that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) would not like to spoil it.

The Labour party manifesto for 1979 was exactly the same, in that there was not a single mention of small businesses. However, we have just heard from the hon. Member for Huddersfield that the Labour party is a learning party. It did not seem to learn between 1979 and 1983. It did not seem to alter its case. It now says that it will come clean and mention small businesses in the next Labour party manifesto. We cannot wait to hear about that.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield and I basically disagree politically, but we get on extremely well outside the House. However, we are both supportive of co-operatives. The hon. Gentleman has made a significant contribution to that movement and I pay tribute to him for doing so. He is in some difficulty with me, because he has found a Conservative Minister who supports co-operatives and believes in the developing and strengthening of the movement. We think that co-operatives are an important part of the small firms sector.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman is trying to be too kind. He must remember that I have to face re-selection next time. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that the Government have cut the budget of the National Co-operative Development Agency and closed down nearly all the local authorities which were doing most for co-operatives. That is the fact of the funding for co-operatives under this Government.

Mr. Trippier: It was my decision whether we should continue the funding of the co-operative development movement to the tune of £200,000 a year for six years. As I have said before in the House—I am anxious not to be deflected on this point — that contribution, contrasted with the £75,000 a year that we give to Business in the Community, is extremely generous. I believe in the co-operative movement and in the growth of co-operatives. However, for goodness sake, let us get things into context. We are talking about just over 1,000 co-operatives, compared with 1·6 million small businesses and 2·5 million self-employed. However important co-operatives are, they are only a small proportion of the small firms sector.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East and I have one thing in common, in that we both come from the finest county God ever gave to man and I suppose we share a sense of humour because we come from that county. However, I do not want to damage the hon. Gentleman's re-selection chances. He does have a sense of humour, and it is appreciated by me. By jove, he needed a sense of humour to deliver his speech today, and we needed a sense of humour to appreciate it. I have never heard so much tripe. The hon. Gentleman is familiar with that term. We are familiar with tripe in Lancashire as they are in Yorkshire, I understand. The hon. Gentleman's speech was absolutely unbelievable. However he did not explain to the House why, if the Labour party had the recipe for success, unemployment more than doubled when the Labour party was in office. The hon. Gentleman could not explain that and nor could his right hon. and hon. Friends.

It is wrong for Labour Members to suggest that they have a monopoly of concern at the level of unemployment. I heard the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn) and the concern that he clearly expressed, which is shared by me and by all Conservative Members. That the Opposition have the temerity to suggest that is diabolical. The funniest thing

Mr. Trippier: No, wait for this. I cannot resist saying this. When the hon. Gentleman said that he thought rates were a marginal cost, I wondered to whom he had been listening. That was very funny. Is he prepared to stand up in West Bromwich and talk to his chamber of commerce and say the same thing? It would need a good sense of humour to listen to that.

Mr. Snape: Neither of us is laughing about unemployment. The hon. Gentleman asked me about the Labour Government's record, although this is wearing a bit thin. In the borough of Sandwell, during the last eight months of the last Labour Government's term of office unemployment fell every month. In the period since June 1983, unemployment has risen in 78 out of 83 months. As to rates, the hon. Gentleman asked me from where I had got my idea about the marginal difference. The references to it are on the record. It has been said by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), who I am sure represents the Right-wing of the Conservative party, in debates here in the past few weeks.

Mr. Trippier: If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that rates are of marginal interest to industry, I am suggesting that he is out of touch with industry, because rates have a direct bearing and have a significant impact on small firms. If we are to hear from the Labour party that the increase in rates is only marginal, presumably we shall hear the same thing about the rise in taxes that it would impose as a result of its programme of increased public expenditure. The argument is the same if it feels that it does not matter by what amount rates are increased. The hon. Member for Huddersfield has come clean and said that there will be increases in taxation. Presumably he will next say that the increase will be only a marginal cost, in the same way as the increase in rates. The truth is that rates are an overwhelming burden on the people whom we are seeking to encourage.

Sir John Osborn: When my hon. Friend meets the Sheffield chamber of commerce, he will find business men who have been trying to keep business in Sheffield who will admit that because the rate burden for comparable premises within 50 miles of Sheffield is so much lower — for example, in Huddersfield or Halifax — they have left Sheffield. They have to make a decision, and they do not stay in cities such as Sheffield but leave because too heavy a rate burden causes an adverse cash flow that can be detrimental in the long term, let alone the short term.

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend is right. I am convinced that business is driven out of cities, particularly cities where rates are high, and there is no incentive for people who are trying to attract industry nearer or into the city if there is too high a rate burden.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister said that rates are an overwhelming burden on business. While I do not necessarily agree with those precise words, I am closer to his view of this matter than I am to that of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). If that is the case and they are a considerable burden on businesses, why did the Government take the decision to remove the rate support grant, which meant that in the shire counties, such as mine, rates went up by no less than 20 per cent. without a single penny of expenditure? That was the decision of the Government, not of anybody else.

Mr. Trippier: Yes, it was us, but the Government believe in good housekeeping. Several of us in the Chamber have had experience of local authorities, and have even been leaders. We know that it is not only the Government who must have responsibility for good housekeeping, but the local authorities as well.

I shall now try to cover in a less controversial way some of the other points made today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) referred particularly to the American experience. He spoke about the Northern Development Company, and several hon. Members spoke about the partnership between the public and private sectors. I welcome that, because it can unite us.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield may know that I was in Leeds just a week or two ago to launch a new initiative started by the West Yorkshire enterprise board. We did not deregulate that. It was started in partnership with local enterprise agencies from the whole of West Yorkshire. It has come up with a scheme that may appeal to my hon. Friends, in that it provides finance in the form of loans for up to £15,000. That may seem small beer, but we have identified a funding gap at that low level and West Yorkshire has chosen to close that gap. That enterprise board has a political content, and power is undoubtedly in the hands of Labour councillors.

The private enterprise agencies are probably split down the middle, with 50 per cent. being set up in areas where Labour controls the councils and 50 per cent. in Conservative-controlled areas. In some cases the Liberals may be in control, and that means that all the political parties are in this business. That combination will work, and I should like to see it replicated throughout Britain. What pleases me more than anything else is that that initiative started north of Watford. Speaking as a northerner, I am glad that happened because, like many other hon. Members, I get a little fed up from time to time hearing that everything happens in the south. It does not.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) for his kind remarks. I am pleased that he has played such a significant part in the development of his local enterprise agency. He was kind enough to invite me to open it a short time ago. It is important for me to say that, because the hon. Gentleman well knows that I am anxious to approach local enterprise agencies in a bi-partisan way, because without that they will not succeed. It is the same with Sandwell. We need councillors on the board who represent the different political persuasions, because they are the main influences in the community and nothing can happen unless we can get such representation.

I suggest to the hon. Member for Yeovil that all that we are doing for small firms is not a PR exercise. He suggested that that may be the case, and it may well be so in terms of trying to increase awareness about what is on offer to small business men, because there is still confusion about the help available. I have some sympathy for what he said about trying to pull the act together. I suppose that I shall fail today, but I shall keep trying to convince him that we must recognise that the one-stop shop that he spoke about must still be at community level. That is where we part company, because his party keeps pushing the idea of a county structure to pull all the threads together. That might be a slightly different interpretation of the sort of regional government in which the party believes.

Nothing could be worse. I have spent the last three years in government desperately trying to get everything down to community level. A definition of community is virtually constituency size. I have my doubts about the wisdom of taking something to county level, but perhaps I should have a closer look at the hon. Gentleman's pamphlet. I am prepared to do that, as long as I do not have to contribute to the Liberal party. I shall come back to him at the appropriate time.

Mr. Ashdown: I shall not read the pamphlet to the Minister, but for his information it is called "Growth From the Grass Roots". I share his view that this needs to be community-based. I am not hung up on the county idea, because this needs to be as close as possible to conforming to the nature of the community. My point is that there is a need for some kind of structure loose enough to allow a thousand flowers to bloom, but tight enough to be able to co-ordinate what is at present for the new business man starting up unhappily something that is full of muddle, confusion and duplication.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Member for Yeovil mentioned Business in the Community and all hon. Members have respect for the work that it has done. The stamp of approval has been placed on the enterprise agencies movement because His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has agreed to become patron and president of Business in the Community. His Royal Highness would not touch it if it was politically biased one way or the other. Some of us in the Government find that we have to stand to one side because the Prince of Wales is opening new enterprise agencies. This is a welcome development, and I can assure hon. Members that he can speak without notes for a considerable time about development agencies because he knows what he is talking about. That is a recognition of the growth and importance of small firms.

Because Business in the Community has a regional presence and regional directors, which it did not have some 18 months ago, it now has at least a regional presence. We would prefer them to be co-ordinators at regional level. I hope that we do not introduce another tier between the regions and the community. I still believe that that is the direction that we should take.

In a robust speech, my hon. Friend the Member of Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) mentioned what I said about additional Government spending and how successive Governments have manifestly failed to create lasting jobs. The Labour party is obsessed with large companies. It is over-paranoic about them. That is its greatest weakness.

My hon. Friend also talked about developing the enterprise culture. Athough I can agree with everything that he said about that, I do not want to get over-enthusiastic about Italy. This might be a surprise to hon. Members, but I spent some time in Italy studying small business programmes and schemes available there.

Mr. Snape: Did the hon. Gentleman go in a gondola?

Mr. Trippier: I have no doubt that that is an enterprise in itself, and probably an expanding one.

While I was in Italy, I found it extremely difficult to distinguish between firms which were in the white economy and those which were in the black economy. There seemed to be an enormous number of firms in the black economy which would go out of business one day and open up again the next, probably leaving a trail of debts in their wake.

I am aware of the argument which my hon. Friend advanced about deregulation and the suggestion that firms with fewer than a certain number of employees should not have to complete all of the forms. When I went round various Government Departments and visited small firms lobby groups in Italy, they all said quite strongly that the bureaucracy was still extremely heavy. Their bureaucracy remains far heavier than ours. I believe that we have more to learn from the United States.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I am sure that what he said about bureaucracy and the black economy in Italy is quite true. Was he impressed, however, that there were so many new enterprises with fewer than 15 employees which seemed to demonstrate considerable incentive in avoiding the burden of regulation? It was in that context that I was emphasising the Italian experience.

Mr. Trippier: To be honest, I was not as impressed as my hon. Friend clearly was. I was more deeply impressed, as my hon. Friend suggested earlier, by the growing number of self-employed people. I was also impressed by the changing attitude towards enterprise generally.

I do not want to deal with the speech of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) because I do not believe that that man understands anything about enterprise.

[Mr. Trippier]

I consider my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) to be something of an expert on deregulation. I am grateful to him for the support that he has given me and my right hon. and hon. Friends on this issue during the past two years. I am glad that he took this opportunity to pay a warm tribute to Paul Twyman, the head of the enterprise and deregulation unit, and the civil servants who work in that department. Contrary to some suggestions across the Floor of the House, they do not operate as a police force. The thought of Paul Twyman marching around in Gestapo-type uniform stretches credulity to breaking point. They are responsible and work extremely hard on a very technical subject.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Yeovil will have discovered that there are hardly any small firms lobby groups which can devote time to studying what should and should not be deregulated. We owe the Department a warm tribute. I am glad to take this opportunity to praise civil servants. It is something that my colleagues in the Government should do more frequently.

It is clear from the debate that the Opposition prefer to tell businesses what to do and what not to do, and to tell employees what is good for them, regardless of the employees' views, or even of whether controls would deprive them of their jobs. For example, Labour Members oppose changes in the rules of wages councils, which means that they would prefer young people to be unemployed than to let them price themselves into jobs at wages that business can afford to pay.

The Opposition talk of a national minimum wage, but they do not tell us what it should be. We want to pin them down so that they have to tell us in detail what the new national minimum wage is to be. I tell the Opposition that they will frighten the pants off small business men, because they would have to lay off many people. They would certainly not be able to expand their work forces, and many businesses would go to the wall.

It has been an interesting and, as far as possible, enjoyable debate. The Government will do all that they can to emancipate the entrepreneurs to whom so many Conservative Members have referred. We believe that it is only with the spirit of enterprise that we can continue to increase the number of people in employment, as we have been doing for the past seven years. We are anxious to free the air to allow them the chance to breathe and to play a significant and growing part in this country's future success.

Mr. Archie Hamilton (Epsom and Ewell): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Prison Officers' Accommodation (Right to Buy)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.20 pm

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I am glad to have the opportunity to raise a matter of some importance to a small but important number of my constituents. I refer to the right of prison officers to buy service quarters at discount prices.

Some time ago I was approached by several constituents who are prison officers at Standford Hill prison, which is located at Eastchurch on the Isle of Sheppey. I very much welcome the modernisation of Standford Hill prison and the construction of the new Swaleside prison. That will make the prison complex at Eastchurch even more important, both locally and nationally. It also involves a substantial increase in the number of prison officers and other staff on the Isle of Sheppey. I warmly welcome that just as nearly everyone on the Isle of Sheppey does. Indeed, the good relations that have existed between the community and the prison service are a tremendous asset to us all.

I very much welcome those developments, because they are an indication of the superb expansion of the prison building programme that the Government have carried through. The projects on the island are substantial and represent part of a quite dramatic programme that has been introduced by the Home Office. Thus I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the part that he has played in that.

The very fact that such developments increase the number of local prison officers emphasises the importance of the subject under debate. It is vital that prison officers should have the right housing arrangements. I am concerned, in particular, about the right of prison officers to buy their own homes and their eligibility for discounts. Until 1979 prison officers were required to occupy quarters provided by the prison service, but in 1979 they were released from that obligation. The Home Office and Ministers should take pride in the fact that two thirds of prison officers now live in private accommodation with the assistance of a housing allowance. Thus, there has been a tremendous change.

I believe that virtually everyone accepts that as a matter of fundamental principle those in public services such as the police, fire and prison services, the Armed Forces and others should be encouraged to buy their own homes. In the past many have suffered greatly by living in tied accommodation or public quarters for much of their careers. They have found themselves out of the housing market for most of their lives and have depended, in retirement, on the public sector. However, we have taken great strides forward, as illustrated by the changes that I have already mentioned, with regard to prison officers.

Thus any minor criticisms that I make must be seen in the context of a major improvement which, I hope, is recognised by prison officers as well as by politicians and the whole community.

As a part of that policy, the Government have already sold many houses in the prison service to prison officers at, I understand, full market price. The issue that I am raising is that of eligibility for discounts on the price of those homes for prison officers who are currently occupying homes which, by definition, could be or would be available for sale.

The principle of giving a discount is part of public policy and is an important plank of Conservative party policy. Discounts are offered by many public authorities in addition to local authorities. That means that in the public sector discounts of up to 60 per cent. can result. I understand that police authorities may at their own discretion—many exercise it—sell off any police houses that are surplus to operational requirements. I understand also that the authorities who do that operate the same terms and conditions as those that apply to local authority house sales. In other words, some police officers have been given discounts of up 60 per cent. I do not think that there is any dispute about the principle of selling houses, especially those surplus to requirements, and giving discounts to the occupants.

Unfortunately, the discount facility has not been available and is not available to prison officers. Whatever practical difficulties might face my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, I am sure that he will appreciate the feelings of my constituents and others who wish to buy their own homes. They are seeing other tenants in other sectors receiving large discounts when they have to pay the full market price.

I recognise fully that the Home Office needs to keep a stock of prison quarters to recruit staff and maintain staff mobility, and to provide for emergencies, but that is not the issue. By definition, we are talking about houses that are surplus to requirements. I understand that such houses are already available for purchase by their occupants. Once sold, whether at full market price or at a discounted price, they would cease to be part of the prison service's stock of houses. They would probably be sold, and what we are talking about is the price at which they would be sold. It is a matter of whether the occupants receive a discount, as many police officers are given a discount. In all equity, I believe that prison officers should be given a discount.

The Prison Officers Association raised this issue in 1983 and the Government responded with a package that provided for discounts, but it would have meant the end of prison officers' entitlement to the provision of prison quarters. That package has been rejected by prison officers in a number of ballots on a number of occasions. I am sure that the officers are not against discounts in principle. In my view, they were rejecting the package as offered by the Home Office. I must ask whether such ballots are the right way to approach this subject. If two thirds of prison officers already live in private accommodation and receive a housing allowance, they are most unlikely to accept a scheme that robs them of the valuable advantage of quarters entitlement, should it ever be necessary for them individually or collectively.

Perhaps it is not surprising that the prison officers rejected the Government's package, but the minority have been left in an unfortunate position. I do not think that the majority want the minority to be deprived of the possibility of a discount. Should we sit back and accept the results of the ballots as the end of the matter? I hope not. I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to ensure that the Home Office continues to search for some way of providing some form of discount to the small number of officers who wish to buy prison service homes which are, by definition, surplus to requirements.

This is not an open-ended proposition as the stock of houses is limited and the number of officers affected is, I suspect, relatively few. That should make it easier, not harder, to find a solution. I should like the Government to try again.

It seems that we have allowed a relatively simple matter of discounts to become unnecessarily bound up with other pay and allowance-related questions and with quarters entitlement. I suggest that that is not the best way to approach the matter. A courteous letter, dated 27 March, which I received from the Home Secretary said:

"Now that the question of discount sales has been settled"

I hope that it has not

"we are considering whether, while retaining quarters to meet present and future demand, we can find a way to give further encouragement to those who wish to own their own home."

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Mr. Moate: The letter continued:

"We hope to be able to make an announcement shortly."

I received a letter dated 11 April from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury which stated:

"The Home Office is considering whether any further encouragement can be given, and is looking into the possibility of an advance of salary scheme, similar to that currently available to Governors. As yet no details have been worked out and if an acceptable scheme can be put together, this too will need to be put to the POA membership for their approval before it can be implemented."

I welcome those statements. It is quite clear that my right hon. and hon. Friends are anxious to promote home ownership within the prison service. There can be no doubt that if we are to continue to attract people of high calibre and dedication to the profession, it is fundamentally important that they have an opportunity and an advantage in securing a place in the housing market. That is fundamental to anybody planning a professional career. Whether that can be done by some other means of promoting home ownership, such as giving discounts, or both, I hope that we shall take some encouraging steps to help prison officers.

I stress that it ought to be possible to find a way of giving discounts or assistance in terms of costs, such as moving and legal expenses, to that small minority of prison officers who feel that they are disadvantaged. If my hon. Friend cannot give me complete answers, I hope that he can give some hope to those affected.

2.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) is proud of his constituency's association with the prison service. He spoke warmly of the work that has been done in his constituency. I know, from my perusal of the files in my Department, that nobody has been more assiduous than my hon. Friend in pursuing the rightful interests of his constituents in the prison service. He has made it clear, by quoting from letters, that there is a history to the matter. He has for some time been a distinguished advocate of the policies he set out today. The Adjournment debate is merely the latest stage in what has been an appropriately vigorous campaign that he has waged.

I appreciated the warmth of my hon. Friend's tribute to successive Home Secretaries who have won resources for the prison service above and beyond anything contemplated for decades. Therefore, it is all the more sad that I suspect I shall not be able wholly to satisfy him this afternoon. Of course, I should like to be able to do so because his presentation was fair-minded and obviously committed to a common sense approach to the matters which we are trying to pursue, as he recognises.

To someone with my hon. Friend's commercial acumen and interest in the spread of wealth throughout the community, I can understand why he thought it was a straightforward matter for the Government to introduce a scheme to make it possible for the discount purchase of prison officers' accommodation. As my hon. Friend knows, although he was kind enough not to advert to it, it was possible in slightly different circumstances in 1981 to introduce just such a scheme for officers in Scotland. I appreciate why my hon. Friend feels that our position is a little exposed.

Our difficulty is that all of this is bound up, whether we like it or not, with long-established conditions of employment. We have to take the greatest care to ensure that any changes with major implications for the longer term are broadly acceptable to all staff. I understand the point made by my hon. Friend about all staff being consulted, but that is not so much a matter for us as one for the internal regulation of the Prison Officers Association which plainly sets great store by its accountabilty to its membership as a whole. In a broader context, we can understand why that is.

My hon. Friend has given an account of some of the alternative points that we have advanced. My Department, like every other Department, honours the Government's declared policy of encouraging home ownership. I take pride in the fact, as does my hon. Friend, that 62 per cent. of our fellow citizens own their own homes. There has never been such a high home ownership figure in our country's history. It is one of the Government's many major achievements. As the election approaches, the public will become aware of how much we have done and be all the more reluctant to make any changes.

My hon. Friend has gone into detail, and I should, too. For some time we have been involved in considering the conditions of employment of prison officers. All prison officers, other than auxiliaries and night patrols, are entitled to a free quarter if one is available. Until 1979 they were allowed to live in private accommodation with the benefit of an allowance only for as long as a quarter was not available. That was a restrictive rule. When a quarter was available, they were compelled to move into it or they lost their allowance.

In 1979, when the Conservative party came to office, we thought that that was not appropriate, so we negotiated a major change in conditions which gave prison officers a reasonable degree of choice between occupying free quarters and drawing an allowance to live in their own house. That was part of our policy of promoting the growth of home ownership. My hon. Friend has already said, but it bears repeating, that as a result the number of staff living out of quarters has increased over a seven-year period from one third to two thirds—a greater increase than the growth in home ownership in the community overall.

While operating against the background of increasing recruitment to the prison service, we have been able to retain sufficient quarters to meet demand. Where the new agreement resulted in a real and permanent surplus of quarters at a particular prison, and they were not needed by another prison within daily travelling distance, the surplus houses have been sold on the open market or to staff at full market price. About 2,500 houses have been disposed of in that way, most of them, however, in the valuable lower-cost sector suitable for first-time buyers and the like.

Apart from basic provision at new establishments, it has not been necessary to add to the general stock of quarters, although we are refurbishing some older properties, especially in the London area, to bring them back into use to meet a growth in demand. There is no doubt that some staff, particularly when they join the service and when they want to transfer, find quarters attractive as a condition of employment. Decoration and maintenance—internal and external—are carried out by the Department, and most quarters now have central heating and are of a good modern standard.

The conditions of employment of prison officers also include a notional addition to pay for pension purposes called the pensionable value of quarters. This addition is also taken into account in calculating rates of overtime and in fixing a percentage enhancement of pay called a shift disturbance allowance. The pay, earnings and pension of the two thirds of prison officers living in private accommodation with the benefit of an index-linked housing allowance also attract these additions. My hon. Friend will, I hope, understand that if a scheme for the discount sale of quarters had been agreed, it would have meant the end of quarters provision as a condition of service. We could not both retain an entitlement to a quarter and at the same time sell off at a discount, as we would have had to do, the very stock of quarters that enable us to make that entitlement a reality. The associated conditions of service would have no longer applied. This leaves on one side, of course, the operational and mobility problems which might be posed if no quarters were available, especially in view of the remote location of some of our prisons.

There have been considerable discussions and negotiations about discount sales with the Prison Officers Association from 1983, when the matter was first raised, and when my hon. Friend, quick off the mark, took it up. We have all been involved for three years. In 1980, when two thirds of prison officers still occupied quarters, consideration was first given to a scheme of interest-free advances of pay to help with house purchase by those who wished to exercise their newly-acquired freedom to live in private accommodation with an allowance. Unfortunately, a national dispute arose at that time, and until it was finally settled we were not able to offer that scheme to prison officers. It was, however, introduced for governor grades and chaplains in 1981.

In 1983, before the terms for the final settlement of the 1980-81 dispute were conclusively resolved, the national conference of the Prison Officers Association instructed its national executive committee to seek an offer of a discount sales scheme of some kind. I should emphasise that the initiative in this matter was taken by the association and that we made it clear from the beginning of the negotiations that then ensued that we could only consider a scheme of discount sales that recognised and dealt satisfactorily with the entitlement to free quarters and the various linked benefits.

The negotiations then led to an offer of discount schemes, an enhancement of pay and a lump-sum payment to staff to take account of the end of the entitlement. That offer was put to the 1984 annual conference of the POA and rejected, but there was sufficient interest in the matter for the POA to return to ask for negotiations on a different kind of offer. The main objection of the conference was to the lump-sum arrangement, and following further discussion a second offer was made, which included a larger increase in basic pay, which in turn fed through into rates of overtime and other payments. The POA put that matter to a national ballot of its members, but the result was against acceptance of the offer. The voting indicated, however, a continuing interest in an agreement, and after the 1985 conference we were asked to consider a further and final offer. Negotiations then led to two final and alternative offers, one of which provided for a residual allowance. These were again put to a national ballot by the POA, and this time the results were heavily against the acceptance of either offer.

We have since been asked about the interest-free advance of pay scheme, which has the advantage that it can apply either to the purchase of a surplus quarter or to a move into private housing. We are currently considering such a scheme for prison officers, although my hon. Friend will understand that the POA is currently in dispute with us over another matter, and the resolution of that is being given priority. We hope that that will soon be out of the way. We have, however, been told by the POA that the following motion was overwhelmingly adopted at the association's 1986 conference. I do not know whether my hon. Friend has seen it, so I shall read it. It states:

"This Conference is of the view that entitlement to quarters should remain a condition of employment for prison officers and that quarters disposal should be limited to those quarters which can be recognised as being genuinely surplus to foreseeable demand."

The passage of that resolution suggests that the offers made and the two national ballots have caused prison officers to look very carefully at the long-term value of a quarters entitlement and the linked pay, allowance and pension benefits, which are so tightly bound.

Before 1979, when prison officers were obliged to occupy quarters and could not easily get permission to live in private accommodation, quarters were seen as a mixed blessing, but when we changed the rules in that year to give greater freedom this major disadvantage was removed. Quarters seem now to be perceived as a valuable condition of employment, and this is borne out by the following second conference motion, which also attracted overwhelming support:

"Now that discount sale of quarters has twice been rejected by the membership this Conference authorises the NEC to negotiate with the Home Office for married quarters to be treated as a priority matter and sufficient quarters to be purchased to give a good living standard to all members who wish to live in quarters and that blocks of flats gradually be phased out."

I appreciate that that is the collective view of the membership of the POA, with the structure that my hon. Friend has suggested. I know that some members of staff would like to be given some sort of discount if they are allowed to purchase quarters. But our difficulty is discriminating in favour of an individual in a matter that is part of the conditions of employment of the whole group. That is why it has been impossible to recognise the distinctions that my hon. Friend made about the positions in which different people find themselves.

My hon. Friend was careful not to be parochial in his speech, for which I commend him, but some facts were looked out for me on Standford Hill prison. It might be helpful if I explain that about 15 vacant quarters there are being kept for staff at the new Swaleside prison, also in my hon. Friend's constituency, when it opens in 1988. If, as might be expected, some Standford Hill staff move into private accommodation between now and the opening of the new prison, that will release more quarters for incoming staff. Our current forecast is that all the Standford Hill stock of 54 quarters will need to be retained for use by staff of the two prisons. That is why it seems unlikely at this stage that any of those quarters will be released for sale.

I understand the disappointment of individual members of staff who have been placed in a position of uncertainty because of the protracted negotiations over the past three years. We have tried honestly and sincerely to get an arrangement that would be acceptable and would lead to a successful outcome to a difficult issue. But it has been conclusively demonstrated that the view of the majority of prison officers is against the change in their conditions of employment that a discount sales scheme would involve. In the light of that outcome, we believe that a scheme of interest-free advances of pay for assistance with house purchase, similar to that introduced for governor grade staff in 1981, is probably the best way forward.

Mr. Moate indicated assent

Mr. Mellor: I am glad that my hon. Friend agrees. That links us.

We think that is the most viable way in which we can give further encouragement to those who want to become home owners. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall explore that possibility with the POA in the coming months. We know that he will continue to take an interest and that we shall have to give an account of ourselves regularly, which we welcome, because there is nothing like interest from the House of Commons for stimulating officials and Ministers to keep their teeth in a problem, however thorny it has proved to be.

I hope that what I have said has not been too disappointing. The history that I have charted has shown that the matter has not been straightforward. If it had been, we would have resolved it. There is now a further window of opportunity, which we shall do our best to get through.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Energy Efficiency

1. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied with the arrangements made for the promotion of energy efficiency by British Gas and the area electricity boards.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): Yes. The gas and electricity industries have already organised over 200 events for Energy Efficiency Year. I am grateful to them and look forward to their further support in the next major stage of our initiative in the autumn.

Mr. Patchett: Will the Minister actively encourage British Gas to apply its huge surplus profits to improving customers' energy efficiency rather than the Government taking those profits to finance tax cuts?

Mr. Walker: British Gas has a vested interest to encourage the most efficient use of gas because, in competition with electricity and oil, it is an essential thing to do, and British Gas is doing that.

Mr. Bruce: What are the implications of the concession made in another place that, after privatisation, British Gas will have specific responsibility to promote energy efficiency over and above what was written into the Bill in this House?

Mr. Walker: In the other place we have recognised that certain things which would take place might as well be expressed as taking place, and there is no doubt that British Gas will be doing that.

Mr. Rowlands: Are not British Gas and the electricity industry in a unique position to promote energy efficiency and such things as home energy audits? Is there not a duty on those major energy producers to encourage and develop efficiency and energy conservation on a much broader scale than is taking place?

Mr. Walker: More is being done by both industries than has ever been done. My answer to the main question illustrates that. I am delighted at the collaboration that is taking place.

Energy Efficiency Year

2. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on progress with Energy Efficiency Year initiatives.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): My right hon. Friend's Monergy 86 initiative is fast becoming one of the most successful campaigns ever. Already more than 750 events have taken place, and we are well on the way to surpassing by a big margin my right hon. Friend's target of 1,000 events. We have issued 140,000 domestic, industrial and educational packs in response to requests generated by our advertising campaign, in addition to the millions of leaflets delivered to households across Britain. Over 3,000 top executives have attended the first six of our Energy Efficiency Year breakfast briefings.

Mr. Evenett: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply and congratulate him on the success of the project. Is he prepared to see an ever-increasing role for energy managers, and does he agree that they have an important role to play in promoting energy efficiency?

Mr. Hunt: I am delighted to confirm the important role played by energy managers in getting the monergy message across. My right hon. Friend set a target for doubling the number of energy managers. That has already been achieved, and we want to see a further doubling of that figure. I welcome the excellent job performed by energy management groups, of which the Bexleyheath management group, in my hon. Friend's constituency, is a fine example. Energy managers are the front-line troops in this vital campaign.

Mr. O'Brien: Is the Minister aware that there are still areas where there is a lack of knowledge about energy efficiency, especially in poorer areas? Will he ask energy efficiency boards to make a special effort to bring more knowledge of the improvements that are necessary for energy efficiency in areas of gross unemployment and in the poorer sections of the community?

Mr. Hunt: I am surprised to hear that, but I join the hon. Gentleman in wishing to see the monergy message distributed as widely as possible, especially to those sections of the community who most need help. My right hon. Friend has spearheaded a substantial increase in the grant to the neighbourhood energy action group, and there has been a massive increase in the number of groups which directly help in an efficient way those faced with high fuel bills who need to insulate.

Nuclear Emergencies

3. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will report on his Department's initiatives in the light of the agreement reached at the Tokyo economic summit recommending that an international convention be drawn up committing the parties to report and exchange information in the event of nuclear emergencies.

Mr. Peter Walker: The board of governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency at an emergency meeting on 21 May agreed, with the full support of the United Kingdom, an outline programme of action to improve co-operation in nuclear safety following the Chernobyl accident. This included the establishment of an expert group to draft a binding international convention on reporting and exchange of information on nuclear accidents with possible transboundary effects. The United Kingdom attaches the highest importance to this and will participate fully in this work.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that information. Does he agree that in all matters relating to civil nuclear power it is essential that agreements, understandings and exchanges of information should be organised on an international basis, not least for our country—perhaps my right hon. Friend will confirm this—as there are 13 foreign reactors within 100 miles of the shores of Britain and a further 14 within 200 miles?

Mr. Walker: Yes, it is very important that the subject is organised on an international basis, and I believe that the International Atomic Energy Agency is the right forum for that. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall give every support to its activities.

Mr. Barron: Does the Minister agree that, after the Chernobyl disaster, we should start looking at the situation at home in view of the discrepancies that emerged between the reports and diagnoses from the tests on the fall-out cloud that came over Britain? Does he agree that we should sort out our own nuclear industry so that people do not feel the present distrust?

Mr. Walker: I do not share the hon. Gentleman's view. I believe that careful study will show that the various organisations and services in this country acted very efficiently and well, but there is certainly a need for greater international collaboration.

Dr. Michael Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there should be an exchange of information among all countries operating nuclear power stations, not just when nuclear accidents occur, but at all times in the course of routine operations, so that experience gained in one country can be passed on for the benefit of others?

Mr. Walker: I very much share that view. That exchange has been taking place effectively between certain countries of the European Community for quite some time. Chernobyl showed the importance of doing that on an international basis.

Mr. Orme: As the Secretary of State will be aware, the CEGB is engaged in a detailed review on safety of the elderly Magnox stations. When will that review be completed, and will the right hon. Gentleman publish it so that the country can see all the details?

Mr. Walker: The review is being carried out by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, not the CEGB. The inspectorate has that task and the CEGB is collaborating fully. It is up to the inspectorate to decide what to publish.

Coal

4. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the effect of the current fall in oil prices on the demand for coal, with particular regard to the proportion of coal output taken by electricity boards.

Mr. Peter Walker: The current fall in oil prices is reflected in the successful discussions that the National Coal Board has completed with the CEGB. This agreement will enable the CEGB's coal demand to be maintained at its previously planned level and electricity consumers to benefit from lower prices.

Mr. Douglas: That was a reasonably interesting reply, but does the Secretary of State agree that we should be considering energy policy overall? Will he consult his colleague the Secretary of State for Scotland to see what effect the fall in oil prices is having on the coal burn in Scotland? Is he aware that if Torness comes on stream—I hope that the Government will review that in the light of the right hon. Gentleman's previous answer—it will imperil the jobs of about 2,000 miners and the coal industry in Scotland will be linked to just one power station, in the Longannet complex? Will the right hon. Gentleman take that consideration on board?

Mr. Walker: It is not Torness that is making the difference in Scotland, but the fact that there is a certain amount of oil firing where there are facilities for it. Talks are taking place between the National Coal Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board and I hope that they will be successful.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Does my right hon. Friend agree that as the oil price goes right down to $10 per barrel it will be unreasonable not to take into account the customers' wish for electricity at the cheapest possible price, bearing in mind a certain responsibility to the coal industry?

Mr. Walker: Yes, but it is also right for the CEGB to take into account the fact that oil prices have been known to rise to $30 as well as to fall to $10. Rather than relying on the uncertainty of that market, when we have an important form of energy of our own, which one hopes will become more competative through improved productivity, I am sure that for the long-term assurance of supplies it was right for the CEGB to enter into that important five-year agreement.

Mr. Mason: The fall in oil prices has already cost the NCB an average of £3 a tonne in its recent contract with the CEGB. To what extent will that cause the NCB to fail in its financial objectives next year, and to what extent does the Secretary of State envisage more pit closures as a result?

Mr. Walker: Obviously, if an industry suddenly loses £300 million a year of revenue, that will put pressure on it. I expect that that will make it difficult for the NCB to fulfil its financial targets next year as envisaged on the basis of the previous ruling price. Obviously it will put further financial pressure on the NCB.

Mr. Rogers: Is the Secretary of State aware that as a result of the CEGB agreement cuts have already been announced in south Wales of about 10 per cent. in manpower and more than £20 million in revenue to that coalfield? Is he further aware that during the past year the south Wales coalfield has come back into a profitable position and is making money, yet suddenly the goal posts are changed again? Why does the Secretary of State not intervene so that we may have a planned energy policy, instead of continually lurching from crisis to crisis?

Mr. Walker: If we had a planned energy policy such as the hon. Gentleman envisages and our competitors throughout the world did not have similar plans, if we were not careful we could cause a great deal of unemployment and hardship. The last time we had a planned energy policy was under the Labour Government who came in in 1964, and every one of their plans was violated and broken.

Mr. Favell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that recent events have shown how right Sir Ian MacGregor has been to drive for viability during his period as chairman? Will he take an early opportunity to wish Sir Ian well and to congratulate him on his well-deserved honour?

Mr. Walker: Yes. As a result of the improved productivity figures, the heavy capital investment in that industry is at long last showing some return.

Mr. Eadie: Surely the Minister must be aware that the understanding – it is not an agreement or a contract – with the CEGB on coal burn will mean more job losses in the coalfields in England and Wales? Indeed, the Secretary of State practically admitted that in answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). How many job losses will there be as a consequence of that? Can he explain to the House, when at present in Scotland the total coal production of some pits is going to stock, why the South of Scotland Electricity Board has never tried to have an agreement, a contract or an understanding signed before now? Is it because it is so busy trying to push ahead with the commissioning of Torness?

Mr. Walker: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman not rejoicing in the fact that in spite of the immense attractiveness of the present oil price the CEGB has agreed to enter into an agreement with the NCB which will guarantee that 75 per cent. of the NCB's production continues to go to the CEGB for some years to come. I am surprised that there is not more rejoicing on the other side of the House about that.

Mr. Kennedy: How can it be consistent for the Secretary of State to argue in this context that he welcomes the fact that the market is responding dramatically to the falling oil price and he sees it as clear evidence of the changed conditions, yet at the same time to argue that the falling oil price has not brought any significant change in the market which would encourage the Government to begin to look favourably on the pledge about incremental investment which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave in the Budget in March?

Mr. Walker: The Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear that he was going to study the position of incremental investment. The majority of oil companies recognise that if we have a fluctuation in the oil price which started only a few months previously the Government will not immediately change the taxation system. If the price moves in the opposite direction, I doubt whether we shall hear many oil companies suggesting that the tax change quickly in the opposite direction.

Combined Heat and Power Schemes

5. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about progress on combined heat and power schemes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I understand that the consortia who are preparing prospectuses for CHP in Belfast, Edinburgh and Leicester are making steady progress.

Mr. Hickmet: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply, but does he agree that if we fail to take advantage of those proposals we shall fail to maximise the energy resources that are available to us? If such schemes are adopted, will it not mean that in the end energy and heat will become cheaper? Is my hon. Friend aware that, leaving aside the question of power stations, my constituency could be heated with the power that is lost through the blast furnace at Scunthorpe steelworks?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend is right to highlight the Government's role. The Government have taken steps to encourage the development of CHP through the Energy Act 1983, which created a guaranteed market for the sale of electricity from CHP schemes and placed a duty on electricity boards to adopt and support viable projects, so we do want CHP district heating to go ahead wherever it is economically viable.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Will the Minister confirm that the thorny problem of individual metering for CHP for consumers has largely been resolved and there is no technological inhibition to its being introduced? Will the Minister give financial encouragement to local authorities to introduce it in their dwellings?

Mr. Hunt: I understand that the problem connected with individual metering has been resolved and I shall carefully consider the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Speller: Does my hon. Friend agree that the progress of CHP is laudable, along with all the other sources of alternative energy which Her Majesty's Government are now seeking to support? Will he give us an undertaking that they will continue to support those alternatives, perhaps in preference to other more old-fashioned energy sources?

Mr. Hunt: I cannot give my hon. Friend a guarantee in those terms, although he has been one of the leading Members of the House who have been pressing for renewable energy sources to be given their correct priority. I can assure my hon. Friend that, despite any other factors, renewable energy sources will continue to receive the high level of Government support that they have received in the past five years.

Mr. Barron: Does the Minister accept that the Government's response to CHP has been small when one looks at some of our competitors in western Europe? It may be years before a plant becomes operational in the three lead schemes. Does the Minister accept that if, over and above the present lead schemes, CHP schemes were to be introduced quickly, it would bring jobs to areas in need such as the inner cities and into the steel industry and other industries?

Mr. Hunt: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman understands the subject. The Government have helped to reduce uncertainties by making available financial help to local consortia to carry out the current work programmes. Surely the hon. Gentleman recognises that until those studies have been completed it is not possible to be specific about a way forward. However, I have clearly laid on the line the Government's intentions in that matter.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I represent the trial area of Leicester, which has been a great supporter of CHP. Can my hon. Friend give any estimate of the number of jobs that could be created, or the likely savings that will be of great benefit to consumers throughout Leicestershire? Surely this is a project from which other parts of the country will soon benefit as much as we have done?

Mr. Hunt: Yes, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's constructive approach. I also pay tribute to his perseverance in lobbying on behalf of the Leicester consortium. I was happy to visit Leicester to receive a presentation from the consortium recently. I understand now that it expects to be the fist to complete its work programme by autumn 1986 and I look forward to receiving its report.

Energy Efficiency Year

6. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he plans to brief local authority associations on the work of his energy efficiency office in Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government appreciate the helpful part played by the local authority associations, in advising the energy efficiency office on relevant initiatives, and in promoting the benefits of effective energy management to their members. My officials keep in regular contact with representatives of local authorities and their associations on a range of activities.

Mr. Haynes: I am not at all happy with that answer. When will the Minister pull his finger out? Local authorities can make a massive contribution to energy efficiency, yet here we are six months into Energy Efficiency Year and they are fiddling around while we burn energy inefficiently? Why does the Minister not wake up and get something done about it?

Mr. Hunt: I responded positively to the hon. Gentleman, but I remind him that a large number of major initiatives are proceeding at present and the evidence is that local authorities are responding well to the opportunities for energy savings, which were highlighted in particular by the Audit Commission, the local authority associations and many others.

Mr. Philip Oppenheim: If the energy efficiency campaign is the success that everyone expects it to be, could this not lead to a reduction in the use of coal in power stations and hence an increase in coal stocks? Would not one answer to that problem be the extension of the grant of concessionary coal to the many thousands of miners who were made compulsorily redundant during the 1960s and who did not qualify for concessionary coal allowances, even though they contributed coal to coal pools when they were in work?

Mr. Hunt: All the energy utilities have a great deal to expect from the public in terms of more efficient energy use. My hon. Friend asked about concessionary coal. I admire his perseverance in this matter, and we are carefully considering his further representations.

Mr. Rowlands: Has the Minister seen the energy efficiency chart prepared not only by local authorities but by a large number of other organisations involved in energy efficiency? Will he consider adopting that chart as a sensible pragmatic approach to energy efficiency?

Mr. Hunt: My right hon. Friend welcomed the constructive report by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, and much of its advice about energy management is echoed in the Audit Commission report, which cited the AMA report as a valuable reference source. I understand that my Department's energy efficiency office has agreed to a meeting to discuss progress, and I look forward to further progress being made.

Energy Audits

7. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to promote the development of energy audits targeted on low income households.

Mr. David Hunt: The energy efficiency office continues to work on the development of home energy audits at a price that householders can afford.

Mr. Lloyd: Is not the question of the price that householders can afford the whole point? As I understand it, the pilot heat scheme has not been a great success precisely because people on low incomes cannot afford to pay for the energy audit. If we are to recognise the problems that that will cause this winter of deaths and of people who suffer greatly, would it not be sensible if we were to offer a free energy audit under, for example, the home insulation scheme, or must we wait for more bad headlines this winter and a change of Government?

Mr. Hunt: That question gives me an opportunity to pay tribute to the enormous impact made by the homes insulation scheme and its importance to overall energy efficiency. Under the homes insulation scheme 90 per cent. grants were introduced by this Government in 1980 and have so far helped over 300,000 elderly or disabled householders on low incomes to insulate their lofts and tanks. I highlight for the hon. Gentleman's attention the recently published monergy guide, which can be used as a basic but comprehensive do-it-yourself home energy audit. As I said earlier, we continually stress the importance of voluntary sector insulation projects. They have already insulated over 170,000 homes and expect to do a further 60,000 by the end of 1986. This is a speedy and effective way to get through to the people who need such help most.

Mr. Michael Morris: My hon. Friend will know that the trial energy audit schemes were not a success. As this is such an important subject, is there not a strong case for trying to target on new private and public sector houses so that at least we can start something positive?

Mr. Hunt: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is sad that that heat audit was not a success, but I defend my Department's participation in it because it was important to monitor its effect. My hon. Friend is right: the major focus of attention must be on new buildings.

Refuse (Oil Conversion)

8. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the University of Manchester Institue of Science and Technology's project to convert refuse into oil.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department is arranging to have an independent evaluation of the refuse to oil process carried out by a firm of consulting engineers. This assessment will be put in hand shortly and should provide an up-to-date appraisal of the technical and economic prospects and of the major problems that remain to be overcome.

Dr. Twinn: I welcome my hon. Friend's reply. Does he realise that we have in Edmonton the country's largest waste incinerator, which is already producing and recycling waste and producing 158,000MW hours of electricity a year? Can he reassure the House that the Government will continue to look for uses for waste to make sure that we get energy from it?

Mr. Hunt: Yes. I agree with my hon. Friend. I know that the country's largest municipal waste incinerator, which handles 400,000 tonnes of waste a year, is located in his constituency. My Department puts a great deal of money into researching ways of ensuring that we make the maximum use of waste. My hon. Friend has previously used the slogan that the nation cannot possibly afford to waste waste.

Mr. Douglas: Can the Minister give us more details about the project? Do the terms of reference include an examination of scaling up and comparisons with other projects, including the deriving of oil of gas from coal?

Mr. Hunt: A study of the Greater Manchester council – UMIST project on the liquefaction of rubbish to oil was made by my Department's energy technology support unit last year. The indications were that while there appeared to be great potential in the project, a number of technical, economic and scale-up problems still needed to be overcome. The unit's assessment suggested that the process would provide less energy and at a considerably higher cost than direct combustion of refuse and would require a subsidy of about £22 per tonne to break even. However, following representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery), I have agreed to a further study being carried out.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Is my hon. Friend aware that I am most grateful to him for responding to my request to have the project reviewed? One of the leading exponents is Professor McAuliffe, who is a distinguished scientist and one of my constituents. Will my hon. Friend follow my example and visit UMIST to see the Manoil project for himself?

Mr. Hunt: I find my hon. Friend's request irresistible, particularly as he invites me to follow his example. I should welcome an opportunity of seeing the process for myself, and I shall make arrangements to do so as soon as possible.

Mr. Eadie: The hon. Gentleman must give the House more information, because he knows that Salford university's industrial centre carried out a feasibility study on that Manoil project and concluded that a commercial plant, at a cost of £12·5 million, would be feasible. How does the hon. Gentleman propose to fit that work into the remit of the independent consultant engineers? What will their review cost? The hon. Gentleman must also tell us why Harwell has so dramatically changed its mind.

Mr. Hunt: I reject the final point made by the hon. Gentleman, but surely he accepts that where we have a potential of this magnitude it is necessary to conduct the most comprehensive studies. I shall let the hon. Gentleman know the cost, and I accept his view that the study by the consultant engineers must have the widest possible remit so that we can look to the future and examine the potential of the process.

Energy Efficiency

9. Mr. Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the latest figure of annual savings in energy costs which have been achieved by industry and commerce energy efficiency schemes.

Mr. David Hunt: Action taken by participants in energy efficiency schemes supported by my Department is currently leading to annual savings of £500 million, but much more is possible. Improved energy efficiency in industrial and commercial buildings alone could save £800 million a year.

Mr. Stevens: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging reply. Does he agree that in view of the potential saving of £2 billion from the energy efficiency schemes they could play an important part in helping British industry to be competitive? Will he continue to highlight those schemes and the savings that come from them?

Mr. Hunt: Yes. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to highlight the fact that we cannot afford for a moment longer to allow £2 billion to be wasted in industry and commerce. We are talking about bottom-line savings, because they can feed straight through to making products and services more competitive. They also release more money for investment and, as well as releasing more money for profits, they can produce greater job security for the future.

Domestic Energy Saving

10. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether further resources will be made available for domestic energy saving.

Mr. David Hunt: This Government's Energy Efficiency Year already represents a massive step up in the campaign to overcome market barriers and to improve standards of energy efficiency in the home.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is it not true that the amount allocated for that purpose has not been taken up in recent years? Should we not have new incentives, such as grants for thermostats and more money for the voluntary sector scheme, which is working so well?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman is right to pay tribute to the way in which the homes insulation scheme has been successful in promoting the insulation of lofts and tanks. However, the history has always been one of underspend. The 1986-87 homes insulation scheme allocation is expected fully to meet total demand. That scheme is a crucial part of any campaign to introduce greater energy efficiency in the home. I shall carefully consider the hon. Gentleman's points.

Gas and Electricity (Standing Charges)

11. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the ending of the scheme for making refunds on standing charges for gas and electricity.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): Tariffs are a matter for the industries. As they made clear when ending the schemes, these had proved to be much more costly than anticipated and were largely providing help to those who clearly did not need it — for example, second home owners. The ending of the schemes was welcomed by the consumers' and consultative councils.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that it was right to end the scheme for second home owners who clearly did not need it, but that it was a tragedy to end it for small users, who were generally elderly pensioners or unemployed people who, to my own knowledge, saved on the use of energy in order to benefit from the scheme? Will he have talks with the industry with the intention of restoring the scheme for pensioners and those on very small incomes?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is uncharacteristically incorrect in saying that most of the scheme's beneficiaries were pensioners and those on low incomes. Standing charges cover unavoidable costs incurred by the industries in keeping supplies available, such as maintenance, meter reading, accounting and billing, and emergency services. Abolition would penalise many of the less well off, because lost revenue of £550 million for each industry would have to be recovered through increased unit charges. That would harm those with large heating needs, such as the sick, the disabled, the very young and the old.

Mr. Haynes: When will the Minister wake up to the fact that standing charges have been a backdoor method of increasing prices for long enough? As the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) asked, when will the Minister take note of pensioners and those on low incomes? Those changes are among the items from which they seek relief. Will the Government seriously consider abolishing standing charges altogether?

Mr. Goodlad: As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), there is no reason to abolish standing charges. The hon. Gentleman will realise that help to the less well off is best directed through the social security system. As he will know, the Government have done much to improve provision under the social security system. Supplementary benefit is up 6 per cent. in real terms, and more than £400 million was spent on heating additions in 1984-85, which is £140 million more in real terms than was spent in 1978-79.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I do not normally agree with the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), but standing charges cause great anxiety to my constituents, particularly the elderly. Should not the cost of the meter, and so on, be included in the tariff, so that one pays more the more energy one uses? Let us do away with standing charges. They are an unfair way of taxing the elderly.

Mr. Goodlad: As I have said, it would be disadvantageous to the elderly if the cost of standing charges was included in the unit rate, particularly for those who use a lot of energy as opposed to those who do not use much, but who give rise to certain charges to the industry.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Minister acknowledge that pensioners feel strongly about this issue and that those who do not qualify for heating allowances but who are on low incomes suffer the full brunt of the Government's pricing policy, which is to force up the price of energy? If the Minister is not prepared to abolish standing charges, which is what most people want, he should come up with an acceptable alternative that will benefit pensioners who do not get fuel allowances, and not just say that it cannot be done.

Mr. Goodlad: It would not be to the benefit of pensioners overall if standing charges were abolished. The hon. Gentleman is not correct to say that we have been forcing up the price of energy. In the three years 1982 to 1985, domestic electricity prices rose by only 6 per cent. Under the Labour Government they rose by 2 per cent., on average, every six weeks. Domestic gas costs the same in real terms today as it did in 1970.

Nuclear Power Industry

12. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he plans to raise the question of safety standards in the nuclear power industry with the European Council of Ministers.

Mr. Peter Walker: At its meeting on 3 June the Energy Council discussed the implications of the nuclear accident at Chernobyl. Member states of the Community agreed that internationally the appropriate forum in which to take follow-up action on nuclear safety issues is the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Mr. Pike: What recent reviews have taken place on the safety factors of our Magnox stations, and what future reviews are planned? Will information about the safety of those stations be published and fully discussed by the European Council of Ministers?

Mr. Walker: I am pleased to say that the Nuclear Inspectorate of this country has total control over nuclear safety. It is independent, and it constantly inspects and reviews all nuclear installations.

Severn Tidal Barrage

14. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received about proposals for a Severn tidal barrage.

Mr. Peter Walker: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations about the content and timing of the publication of the report by the Severn Tidal Power Group. We are now considering this report, and obviously these comments will be taken with consideration. The Severn Tidal Power Group hopes to release its report shortly.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the Severn Tidal Power Group's report has been held up by his Department? Will he ensure that the report is published sooner rather than later, in view of the intense interest in the west country in the barrage?

Mr. Walker: There is no disagreement between my Department and the power group about the date of publication. One must recognise that potentially the Severn barrage is the second biggest tidal barrage in the world and therefore an important consideration. The study group and the Government, who partly financed the study, are anxious to prepare the publication carefully, and I hope that the report will be published in the near future.

THE ARTS

Afro-Caribbean and Asian Arts

52. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what progress the Arts Council is making in directing 4 per cent. of its expenditure to Afro-Caribbean and Asian arts.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): Responses to the Arts Council's plan are now being received and will be discussed at the council's meeting in July.

Mr. Banks: I welcome the Arts Council's initiative, but is the Minister aware that no new money is involved and that therefore its impact will be somewhat lessened? Is he further aware that the Arts Council has just given a £100,000 revenue grant to the black arts centre at the Round House, which is now in a critical position because of its loss of GLC funding?

Will the Minister give £1 million capital grant towards the £8·5 million required to allow the Round House to flourish as a centre for Afro-Caribbean and Asian arts in London? Is he aware that the black community cannot raise that sum through the business community? The Minister may care to reply in the affirmative during the debate on the arts on Friday.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman asks two questions. First, the resources for the minority ethnic groups have to come out of the Arts Council's total budget. I think that it has made a sensible decision in deciding to set aside 4 per cent. of its total expenditure for that purpose. It will be distributed to areas where the ethnic minority groups are the strongest.

Secondly, the Arts Council has given £100,000 revenue funding to give the Round House time to decide, in conjunction with the London Residuary Body, how to deal with its redevelopment plans in the long term. The Round House is to be given transitional funding to enable it to decide on long-term planning.

Outturn Expenditure

53. Mr. Key asked the Minister for the Arts what he estimates the outturn expenditure of his office will be for the current year.

Mr. Luce: My cash limit for the administrative costs of running the Office of Arts and Libraries is £1·2 million in the current year. This is just a little over a third of 1 per cent. of my total programme of £321 million for the year. It is certainly my aim that the office should provide good value for money to the public and the arts.

Mr. Key: That is a substantial sum. Will my hon. Friend allay fears that the price of success in artistic and financial terms in the provincial theatre is a sudden cut in grant from the Arts Council? Will he come to Salisbury, to the Playhouse theatre, and see for himself the impact of his policy?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend might be interested to know that the deputy chairman of the Arts Council, Sir Kenneth Cork, is conducting a study on how to subsidise theatres and in the autumn will be producing recommendations on the policies that should be pursued. I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government's policy is to keep up overall funding for the arts.

I am aware of my hon. Friend's interest in the Salisbury Playhouse. I have visited it many times. I propose to go to Salisbury towards the end of July to visit the Playhouse.

Mr. Michael Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend anticipate that he may have a little more flexibility within his Department's overall expenditure as a result of the announcement made by our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Budget?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. The proposed Budget changes will provide a new era of opportunity for the arts world. It is for the arts organisations to take advantage of that. Clearly, they must be efficient in fund raising and as efficient as possible in marketing. I believe that the opportunity is now there.

Sadler's Wells Theatre

Mr. Pavitt asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the future funding of Sadler's Wells theatre.

Mr. Luce: I am confident that Sadler's Wells has all the resources for a full season in the current year and that prospects for the future are good. Arts Council grants for subsequent years are a matter to be determined at a later stage.

Mr. Pavitt: Is the Minister aware that Sadler's Wells is not only a centre of excellence for opera and ballet in this country, but has now become an international venue, visited by the whole world? We are grateful to the Arts Council and to the Minister for their efforts to preserve its short-term future, but is he aware that, because of its nature, it needs to have at least a three-year planning programme? It cannot stage an opera at the drop of a hat. Will the Minister negotiate with the Arts Council to secure revenue grants for at least three years so that forward planning can be effective?

Mr. Luce: I agree that Sadler's Wells is a great centre of excellence. Indeed, I was glad to be there last week for the 60th anniversary of the Ballet Rambert. Although Sadler's Wells is financially secure for this year, the fact is that the vast majority of its funding comes not from the Arts Council or central Government, but from a variety of other sources, including the box office and sponsorship. I am glad that Northern Telecom provided substantial sponsorship this year. In the longer term, Sadler's Wells must look not only to central Government but to a variety of sources.

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that recently I was besieged by members of a ballet class in my constituency, when 100 ballet dancers of all ages pleaded for the continuation of Sadler's Wells? I accept that it cannot have a long-term guarantee, but will my right hon. Friend assure us that he will not stand by and see Sadler's Wells go to the wall?

Mr. Luce: I imagine that that was a siege that my hon. Friend enjoyed. I assure him that the theatre workshop proposal that is being planned for Sadler's Wells is well on the road to being established, thanks to funding support from a number of sources. I am optimistic that that will help.

Mr. Chris Smith: I welcome the Minister's tributes to the work done by Sadler's Wells, but can he tell us, even at this stage, whether the same order of funding the £100,000 package for the touring companies that rescued Sadler's Wells this year will be available next year? If not, despite the frantic efforts of Sadler's Wells to obtain private sponsorship, it will be in serious financial trouble.

Mr. Luce: I know that the hon. Gentleman, who represents that area, takes the closest possible interest in Sadler's Wells. It is not possible to give a precise undertaking beyond this financial year, because the Arts Council does not know the precise figure that it will receive for next year and the following year, only the broad planning figure. I am confident that it will be possible for Sadler's Wells to continue and that the Arts Council will be able to continue its support.

Government Achievements

55. Mr. Murphy asked the Minister for the Arts if he will indicate the main achievements of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the Arts in the last seven years.

Mr. Luce: The main achievements include increasing arts expenditure in real terms, safeguarding the arts against the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan counties, accelerating a major museum building programme, introducing a new scheme to encourage museums to increase their receipts, beginning the major new building for the British library, introducing public lending right and the business sponsorship incentive scheme, creating the National Heritage memorial fund, saving many heritage items and improving the arrangements for acceptance in lieu. These are some of the achievements.

Mr. Murphy: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his brief synopsis of his achievements and those of his predecessors in honouring their commitments to the arts. Can he say where he thinks future expenditure will come from, bearing in mind the increasing quality and quantity of the arts?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The Government will maintain their support. The overall pattern should be that increased resources come from the private sector in a variety of ways. The Budget proposals should be a help in that direction. The business sponsorship scheme should be a help also. There are a variety of other measures that are designed to encourage extra money to be made available from the private sector. I see that as being the fuel for growth.

Mr. Freud: Despite his answer, does the Minister accept that there are now smaller audiences, greater unemployment among Equity members and more disenchantment amoung theatre administrators than there has ever been? If the right hon. Gentleman would like to be remembered as a caring Minister for the Arts, will he do what he can to stop the imposition of VAT on the living theatre, because VAT is the single greatest evil now to befall the theatre?

Mr. Luce: I know of the hon. Gentleman's interest, but he gives a poor reflection of the true picture in the theatre world. I accept entirely that there has been a reduction in theatre attendances in recent weeks and months, but over the past two to three years—the hon. Gentleman must know this — attendances have been extremely high. Theatre attendances are higher overall than attendances at football matches. That shows the amount of interest that there is in the theatre.

Mr. Cormack: I congratulate my right hon. Friend and his predecessors on their achievements. Has he assessed what the arts have achieved during the past seven years, especially in terms of earning currency for Britain?

Mr. Luce: I do not think there is any doubt that the wide range of facilities and excellence in the arts attract many tourists, not only to London, but to our other great cities and to many other parts of the country, and make a strong contribution to tourism.

Mr. Buchan: Will the Minister add to his expected lists of achievements the following? Does he accept that we have seen the disappearance of the best supporters of the arts the GLC and the metropolitan counties due entirely to the Government's actions? Will he add to his achievements the crisis into which he has plunged theatres such as Sadler's Wells for the future, despite the present position? Will he add to his list of achievements the fate of arts administrators, who have to spend their time, as they tell us, squabbling for alternative sources of funding as a result of Government cuts? Is it an achievement that our National theatre had to close one of its theatres and allow itself to be saved by the GLC? Is he aware that the director of one of our major museums tells us that for the first time he is running into the red? Is he happy that funding of the arts over seven years has collapsed by 4·7 per cent. in real terms if we use the honest indicator of the retail prices index?

Mr. Luce: I am astonished by the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question. When I first became Minister for the Arts 10 months ago, the hon. Gentleman was preaching doom and despondency as a result of the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan authorities. He said that there was a major crisis in the arts, yet there has not been. Thanks to the co-operation, not only of the Arts Council, but of the regional arts associations and local authorities, the arts organisations are surviving indeed, they are flourishing. Only last Friday the last outstanding problem on Merseyside was concluded with an injection of £1·7 million by the Arts Council and the local authorities into the region. That concludes the outstanding problems in all the regions following abolition. I think that the record is a fine one.

CIVIL SERVICE

Pressure of Work (Study)

66. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will initiate a comparative study of the pressure of work on civil servants in the various Government Departments; and what information is already available on this matter.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): Each Department is responsible for monitoring the work load of its staff and exchanges information as to how these issues can best be handled. I can assure my hon. Friend that Ministers and senior civil service managers attach great importance to making sure that work loads are right, and not excessive. Civil servants have responded well to the demands made on them as part of our drive to increase efficiency and achieve better value for money. I am glad to take this opportunity of paying tribute to the hard work and dedication found in all Departments.

Mr. Taylor: I agree absolutely with what the Minister has said about the character and calibre of the British Civil Service, but does he agree that there are some disturbing indications that the volume and pressure of work — for example, on staff dealing with DHSS problems — have reached an alarming level, especially in view of the increased volume of work and the problems in preparing for the social security review? Is there not a case for a comparative study to see whether there is a need for more resources, especially for DHSS staff dealing with the general public?

Mr. Luce: There is constant monitoring of the work load of civil servants in all Departments to see how they can cope with the work load, but there is flexibility in the Government's policy. My hon. Friend will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has announced that an extra 5,000 civil servants will be recruited to the DHSS to help cope with the extra work load. There is flexibility in the Government's policy where work loads appear to be excessive.

Employment Qualifications

67. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list the organisations, membership of which precludes employment either in the Civil Service as a whole or in particular posts.

Mr. Luce: No one is precluded from employment in the Civil Service because of membership of a particular organisation. However, no one may be employed on work vital to the security of the state who is or has recently been a member of a Communist or Fascist organisation or of a subversive group whose aims are to undermine or overthrow parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means.

Mr. Bruinvels: Recognising the loyalty to the Crown which is required of all members of the Civil Service, and paying tribute to the majority of them, does my hon. Friend think it proper that members or supporters of Militant should be allowed to be active supporters of the Civil and Public Services Association, such as the branch secretary, Tony Church, at Leicester's DHSS, and his chairman? Does my hon. Friend think that there is a conflict of interest when civil servants who claim loyalty to the Crown are involved in elections to an organisation about which Alistair Graham, the general secretary, has said, "Do not ever vote for Militant candidates"?

Mr. Luce: There are two points to consider in my hon. Friend's reflections. First, it is essential that, on security matters, we ensure that civil servants conform with the requirements that I set out in my answer. Secondly, in the pay and conditions of the service code, to which each civil servant has access, there is a requirement that he discharges his service and undertakes his duties loyally to the Government. That is another factor that must be borne in mind. We look to an impartial service. I believe that, in large measure, we have one.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister not concerned at the increasing politicisation of the public service? Will he undertake to consider the conclusions of the Widdicombe report, to be published shortly, to see whether they also apply to the Civil Service?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman may have noticed that the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service recently reported on its study of the responsibilities of the Civil Service and Ministers. I noted in the report, to which the Government still have to reply, that the Select Committee came to a clear view, that it did not believe there was politicisation — to use an awful word — in the Civil Service. I welcome the fact that the Select Committee came to that view.

Unions (Ministerial Meeting)

68. Mr. Soley asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met the Civil Service unions; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Luce: I have had no formal meetings with the Civil Service unions, but I did meet them informally on 25 March, and I attended the dinner of the First Division Association on 14 May. Topics of mutual interest were discussed informally.

Mr. Soley: When the Minister had an opportunity to discuss matters informally, did he raise the question of the uncertainty surrounding the future of the Crown Agents? Can he tell the House when a supplementary report will be produced and what will be in it?

Mr. Luce: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a specific answer to his question. It is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development. I shall draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware of the deep resentment within the Civil Service and among the Civil Service trade unions over the Government's pursuit of disciplinary proceedings against those who rejoined trade unions at Government Communications Headquarters? Is he aware that, to many, it appears to be a misuse of disciplinary proceedings as it implies that it is wrong to be a civil servant and a member of a trade union? Will he ensure that his right hon. and hon. Friends call a halt to those disciplinary proceedings before any punishment is meted out?

Mr. Luce: The GCHQ is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who has clearly explained our policy. I have noticed that the report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service has expressed the strong view that disciplinary proceedings should be enforced when civil servants abuse their code of conduct.

Admiralty Research Establishment, Teddington

69. Mr. Jessel asked the Minister for the Civil Service what discussions have taken place with the relevant Civil Service unions concerning the future of the Admiralty research establishment at Teddington.

Mr. Luce: The trade unions have been given the terms of reference for a review, which has recently begun, of the future of the Admiralty research establishment at Teddington and have been invited to comment. The Ministry of Defence stands ready to meet the unions and to consider any comments they may have.

Mr. Jessel: As the future of the Admiralty research establishment is of great concern to 237 staff and their families, will the terms of reference for the management review include a study of whether it might be more cost-effective for the Admiralty research establishment to remain at Teddington? Will my right hon. Friend ascertain how many of the scientific and professional staff might be lost to the Civil Service if there is a move from Teddington?

Mr. Luce: Although that is principally a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, I can answer in the affirmative to both questions.

Recruitment Schemes

70. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement on the operation of Civil Service recruitment schemes in 1985.

Mr. Luce: Seven hundred and sixty two recruitment schemes were conducted by the Civil Service Commission in 1985 to fill over 9,000 vacancies in the middle and higher grades of the Civil Service. Further information is given in the Civil Service Commissioners' annual report for 1985, which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Bowden: Are there any special incentive schemes to ensure that appropriately qualified professional, technical and scientific staff are recruited and retained in the Civil Service?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend on the importance of that matter. We are concerned about the recruitment, retention and motivation of scientists and people in the professional and technology groups. To that end, not only have they had a reasonable pay increase this year, but a more flexible system of pay additions has been introduced. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is considering ways in which we might improve the starting salary of graduates in the science group, with a view to helping recruitment.

Mr. Tony Banks: What is the level of black recruitment to the middle and senior levels of the Civil Service? Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied with the progress that has been made?

Mr. Luce: Obviously I cannot give a percentage figure in answering that general question. General recruitment is not bad, but specialist groups — whether scientists or accountants — are causing concern. That is why it is important for us to have a flexible pay system, which we are now evolving, to deal with retention and recruitment problems.

Rayner Reviews (Savings)

71. Mr. Key asked the Minister for the Civil Service what were the savings to the Civil Service in the last financial year attributable to the Rayner reviews.

Mr. Luce: In the 1985-86 financial year, savings of £300 million were attributable to the programme of efficiency scrutinies. Scrutinies have also led to improvements in the effectiveness with which the taxpayer's money is spent.

Mr. Key: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on that remarkable achievement. Does he accept that many loyal civil servants, especially in the industrial sector, are worried that efficiency in financial terms is being allowed to override the loyalty that they accord to their jobs? Will my right hon. Friend therefore ensure that it is a matter not just of numbers but of efficiency in the Civil Service?

Mr. Luce: The Civil Service can be proud of its achievements in implementing a large number of the efficiency scrutiny reports which have taken place over the past seven years and which have produced accumulative savings of nearly £1 billion, or £300 million a year. It is the Government's objective, in full co-operation with the Civil Service, to ensure that we use our resources most efficiently and get the best value for money. That is what our taxpayers expect and what our Civil Service is achieving.

South Africa

3.33 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary in Luxembourg, we understand why it has not been possible for a statement to be made today, but I take this opportunity to press the Leader of the House on the great desirability of having before the start of tomorrow's debate a statement by the Foreign Secretary on the report by the Eminent Persons Group, the crisis in South Africa and the result of his discussions with his colleagues in the European Council.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Biffen): Further to the point of order. The right hon. Gentleman raised this matter with me during business questions last week and I undertook to draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to his request. There have been some initial discussions through the usual channels about this. My right hon. and learned Friend will be able to inform the House about the response to the report from the Eminent Persons Group in his opening speech in the debate on South Africa tomorrow. If the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends would like a statement to precede that debate, perhaps we could discuss the matter further through the usual channels.

Contempt of Court

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to raise a matter that affects the rights of the House of Commons and the attitude of the Government towards those rights.

On Saturday, the press reported the success of my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) before the European Commission of Human Rights in Strasbourg. I know that hon. Members will wish to congratulate my hon. Friend on her vindication after a long struggle. Newspapers reporting the outcome of my hon. Friend's action were categorically clear about what the effect of that would be. The Guardian headline read:

"Change in law to follow Harman win in Strasbourg."

The Daily Telegraph stated:

"Contempt law change forced on Ministers."

Therefore, the press imply that a change in the law is to be brought before Parliament.

That being so, one would have thought that after the Government's almost six-year-long pursuit of my hon. Friend had failed, they would come before the House to make a statement about the outcome of the proceedings before the European Commission. Even more importantly, if the Government have now decided that the law of contempt is to be changed, the only place in which the law can be changed is Parliament, in the House of Commons and the other place.

Therefore, I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Government are treating the House in an extremely contemptuous manner by not coming before us at the earliest possible moment and letting us into the secret which the European Commission of Human Rights has announced to the world about what the Government intend to do in Parliament but which the Government do not think fit for Parliament to know.

Mr. Speaker: None of that is a matter for me. The Leader of the House will have heard what has been said.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for not giving notice before, but information has just come to hand. As always, the selection of amendments for tonight's debate has been fairly——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should raise his point of order with the Chairman of Ways and Means at the time. I am not responsible, as the hon. Gentleman knows, for the selection of amendments for the Committee stage of a Bill. The hon. Gentleman is a little premature in raising that point of order.

Hospitals

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.38 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the policies of Her Majesty's Government, which have undermined the capacity of the big city hospitals to provide care for all their patients, satisfactory training opportunities for doctors and nurses, reasonable working conditions for all staff or adequate facilities for research into improved care for patients and the promotion of good health.

On Friday 11 May in Perth the Prime Minister, speaking of her Government's record on the National Health Service, sajd:

"We have a marvellous record, which we should shout from the rooftops."

Before the month was out, staff at the Maudsley hospital in south London had been told that, for reasons of economy, they were to reduse the amount of jam used in sandwiches in the children's ward. Nothing could better illustrate the gulf between the isolated world of the Prime Minister and the reality of the crisis facing the big city hospitals in England, Wales and Scotland.

Skimping on the children's jam ration was not the only, or indeed the most important, damaging change that was being forced on the patients and staff at the Maudsley. All consultant and nursing posts were to be frozen. There was the weekend closure of the neurosurgery ward, so that patients who had had their heads opened up and undergone brain surgery were to be shifted from their beds to save the cost of weekend working. Closing half the beds serving chronically mentally ill patients, shifting the children from their special in-patient unit to a general hospital ward, closing the alcohol in-patient unit—all that and more at Britain's oldest psychiatric hospital, not because there were not the patients; not because psychiatric illness was on the way out; not because we did not need doctors and nurses trained in the best and most up-to-date techniques; not because we could afford to do without the research done jointly by that hospital and the Institute of Psychiatry, the funds of which the Government have also cut. The reason was that the Government would not find the money.

That hospital is, in theory, so important that it is run by a special health authority, reporting direct to the Secretary of State. I understand that there may be better news. Last Thursday, after this debate had been announced, representatives of the Maudsley met the Under-Secretary. They were told that they could overspend their budget this year. What a pity they had to divert vast amounts of energy and effort just to get a sensible level of funding.

However, several questions arise. Will the Government make up this year's deficit at the Maudesly, or will the hospital have to carry it forward and fund it out of next year's allocation? Will all hospitals in financial difficulties be allowed to overspend, or will it just be those that happen by chance to meet Ministers a day or two before a debate in the Commons? Those are important questions, because what is happening at the Maudsley is happening elsewhere. It is happening to the other special health authorities such as Great Ormond street and the National Hospital for Nervous Diseases.

The postgraduate research institutes associated with those famous hopitals — centres of excellence, of world renown in the struggle against pain and suffering — have seen their staff and work reduced, their capacity to teach diminished, their research curtailed. But it is not just those hospitals that are suffering. The Prime Minister may claim that she is spending more on the National Health Service than ever before, but it is not true. The extra funds do not match the combined effects of the increase in the cost of health care, the growing cost of medical technology and the increased health needs of the growing number of old and unemployed people.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Will the hon. Gentleman give way.

Mr. Dobson: I shall not give way just now.

Even so, the NHS might have just about got by with that level of funding if the Government had not added a further costly element to the equation. That element is change. The Government are demanding massive changes in priorities, endless changes in structure and management, massive redirection of effort and huge geographical shifts of resources. But change costs money. Surely Tories understand that. The cost of change has always been the bulwark of the case for Conservatism, if it has any case at all.

Many of the changes envisaged would command the support of most of those involved if, but only if, the time scale were extended and additional resources provided, at least during the transition period.

Let me give an example of what I mean. Hampstead health authority, which is responsible for the Royal Free hospital, wishes to close the old workhouse at New End and provide a better place for the elderly near Hampstead Heath. The Government will not give the authority the money to build the new unit, so it is forced to close New End, sell it and use the proceeds to build the new unit. That may sound fine, but the problem remains of the existing patients at New End. The suggestion is to turn over to the elderly the wards presently used for other purposes at the Royal Free until the new unit is built. Other groups of patients will suffer because the money for the new unit for the elderly is not available.

This is not simply a London problem. It occurs in every big city in Britain. In all our big cities, the NHS is suffering from reduced funds and demands for massive change. That cannot be done except at the expense of patients and staff.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Is my hon. Friend aware that one solution offered is for private American companies to build and run National Health Service psychiatric hospitals? Such a proposal is being considered in Birmingham. It is widely thought in Birmingham that that hospital will be a loss leader so that those companies can build private profit-making psychiatric hospitals in all our big cities. Would my hon. Friend comment on that?

Mr. Dobson: Yes, I shall comment on that point. My basic comment would be that I am dubious about any American company becoming involved in health care in Britain. I am especially worried about the idea of a psychiatric hospital run by a company which produces drugs used on psychiatric patients. There is bound to be a conflict of interest.

Mr. Favell: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that that American company is prepared to build that hospital at half the cost for which the district health authority would build it and will provide the same services? Is he interested in patients or in lining the pockets of those who support him?

Mr. Dobson: I am interested in the record of American companies in the United States. When the American commercial companies can ensure that adequate health care is provided for the 30 million Americans who have no health cover in the most powerful and prosperous nation in the world, they may be able to contribute something to health care in Britain.

Big city hospitals were built where they were by the Victorians, or earlier, because that was where people were poorest and sickest. The Royal Victoria in Newcastle, Manchester Royal infirmary, Leeds General infirmary, Bart's Guy's and St. Mary's were built where they were needed — and they are still needed. The communities that they serve are still among the poorest and least healthy. The common measure of the health of a locality is perinatal mortality. The big city figures are bad. Against the national average of 10 deaths per 1,000 Newcastle upon Tyne has 16, north Staffordshire — serving the city of Stoke on Trent — has 15·9, east Birmingham has 14·7, and Tower Hamlets has 13·7.

The big cities have more deaths from cancer and heart disease, but in addition to the old diseases, they also have the highest incidence of alcoholism, drug abuse and AIDS. They also have the longest hospital waiting lists: 22,000 in Birmingham, 14,000 in Bristol, 13,000 in Manchester, 11,000 in Sheffield, 10,000 in Leeds, 8,000 in Newcastle, 8,000 in Nottingham and 8,000 in Liverpool. In inner London, waiting lists are soaring. Small wonder, when £35 million has been cut from the budgets of the inner London health authorities.

One example is Lewisham and North Southwark, where hospital waiting lists increased by more than 1,000 in the six months between September 1985 and March 1986.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): The hon. Gentleman said that the waiting list in Bristol was 14,000. Can he confirm that? Information received from the chairman of the Bristol and Western health authority this morning gives the figure for 1986 as 7,944.

Mr. Dobson: I should have thought that a Member from Bristol would have known that that great city is served by no fewer than three separate health authorities.

I will give some more examples of what is happening in the big cities.

In Newcastle it is proposed to close an orthopaedic ward at the Freeman hospital although there are 855 people on the orthopaedic waiting list. A children's ward at Newcastle general hospital is to be closed and two surgical wards at the Royal Victoria infirmary are to go, as is the entire Fleming Memorial children's hospital.

[Mr. Dobson]

Demand for some of the services now provided in Newcastle may eventually decline after the building of the new district general hospital at Ashington, but that is scheduled for 1993 and Newcastle is being asked to make cuts now. So the patients will suffer – more than 900 urgent cases have been waiting more than a month for treatment.

Central Manchester health authority has suffered cuts of more than £2 million and is threatened with a further loss of £3 million in the next two years. Reductions in provision at the Royal infirmary are bound to follow and patients will be turned away. Poorer, less healthy people in Stretford and Old Trafford are being told that they will not be able to go to the Royal infirmary any more, although it is nearer and there is good public transport. They must wait until alternative facilities are provided in a few year's time in the southern part of Trafford, even though it is further away and not so easy to reach by public transport. There are also fears for the future of the Manchester foot hospital.

Proposals for improved facilities for Hope hospital in Salford for neo-natal special care for babies in Salford and other parts of the north-west have been denied funds. The consultants involved have therefore decided that their first duty is to Salford babies and that from the end of this month they will be unable to accept referrals from elsewhere.

In Cardiff, the University hospital of Wales has just closed and padlocked its first ward, and no doubt others will follow. No one could call that a rational response to a waiting list of 5,300 people.

The Greater Glasgow health board has just been told by its general manager that it must cut spending by no less than £20 million per year, involving what he described as "fundamental changes in the level of provision".
Few Scots believe that the intention is to level up, because levelling down is the message in the Health Service nowadays.

In Trent region, described as a major beneficiary of resource allocation changes, stands the famous city of Nottingham. These days the hard-faced sheriff is more in evidence than Robin Hood. The Government have robbed the regions that they describe as rich, but they still do not fund the poor. Phase 2 of the Queen's Medical Centre was completed as long ago as 1979, but it still stands mainly empty because the health authority cannot afford to run it. Indeed, things are getting worse. One existing ward for vascular surgery is to be closed and there is even a threat to reduce staff at the highly successful special care baby unit at the city hospital. The story is similar in every big city. At Guy's, which serves north Southwark and Lewisham, we discover from the Daily Mirror – because officialdom will not tell us – that life-saving heart operations for children have been stopped because the hospital has not the cash to nurse all the post-operative intensive care beds. It must be pointed out, of course, that cash for cardiac treatment at Guy's has suffered because no less than £376,000 of National Health Service money was spent subsidising heart operations on private patients, as the recent report of the Comptroller and Auditor General reveals.

In Bristol the health authority's plans are dominated by closures and proposed closures of small hospitals such as the Wendover hospital maternity unit and Ham Green hospital. However, experience suggests that it is no good big hospitals and fashionable consultants offering their smaller neighbours as human sacrifices. It does not work. In Kipling's immortal words:

"once you have paid him the Dane-geld
You never get rid of the Dane."

The calls for cuts will increase and the big hospitals will start to lose funds.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): My hon. Friend mentioned Bristol. While I do not wish to exonerate the Government from any blame, may I remind my hon. Friend that a great deal of the problem there has been due to the university medical school and private consultants concentrating on rebuilding on an unsuitable site? Nevertheless, I am not against teaching hospitals. From my experience at the Westminster hospital, I have nothing but praise and admiration for its care and treatment. Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that sometimes university teaching facilities override the needs of ordinary patients?

Mr. Dobson: There is something in what my right hon. Friend says. The big hospitals in Bristol, Leicester and elsewhere should regard small hospitals not as sacrifices, but as outposts. They should learn that the loss of those outposts exposes their central citadel to the next round of attacks.

Problems are arising all over Birmingham, but one example will illustrate what is going on. The Secretary of State wrote an article for the Birmingham Evening Mail entitled – would you believe it Mr. Deputy Speaker?

"Health crisis? What Crisis?"

The East Birmingham health authority is being forced to close three wards while central Birmingham is limiting the number of cardiac operations and closing a ward at its children's hospital. No wonder the Birmingham Evening Mail in an editorial on the same day contrasted what it called the statistics and the reality.

The Government talk about efficiency and improving the management of resources, but what is happening in big city hospitals is putting a premium on inefficiency. Careful studies show that closing wards in a hospital which remains open does not save much money. The gearing is all wrong. A 20 per cent. cut in services gives only a 4 per cent. to 5 per cent. saving in costs. Conversely, a 4 per cent. to 5 per cent. increase in investment would lead to a 20 per cent. increase in services. Needless to say, this penny-wise, pound-foolish Government choose the wrong option.

The most spectacular example of that was in my constituency when the Middlesex and University College hospitals were closed to ordinary admissions for one month — for the non-mathmaticians on the Tory Benches, that is one twelfth of the year. It was intended to save £450,000 on a budget of about £120 million. In the end, they did not even save that—but at what costs to patients turned away and lengthening waiting lists? Such cuts do not merely affect patients but reduce the capacity of hospitals to provide adequate training for the doctors and nurses of the future.

All the changes that I have mentioned are leading to imbalanced admissions of patients, which mean that student doctors and nurses do not encounter the cross-section of patients required for their proper training. That is only the start. Cuts in spending on trained nurses mean that there is now an overdependence on trainees at night. Trainees are working excessive night duty. At UCH, the English National Board noted that a registered sick children's nurse was not always available on children's wards where learners undertook night duty. That is a disgrace.

Cuts in support services are forcing nurses, both trained and in training, to take on tasks which were previously the duty of clerical, cleaning and portering staff. So much for the efficiency savings on ancillary workers which we have heard about. If the Minister does not like what I am saying, I issue this challenge: to publish the English National Board's reports on nurse training in the big city hospitals over the past few years.

It does not stop there. Junior doctors are also suffering. The only excuse for calling highly qualified hard-working doctors "juniors" is that officially they are still learning. Yet, because of cuts in budgets, they are being refused study leave to learn the new techniques essential for their next jobs. Without that study leave, the training posts they occupy may lose accreditation with the authorities and disappear, and so the cycle of degradation will continue.

The big city hospitals are also rightly famous for their research into the causes of disease, into improved methods of treatment and into ways of promoting better health — some in specialist hospitals, some in the general hospitals. All this is being reduced or threatened at the moment. In one year the Medical Research Council awards to medical students have fallen from 380 to 342, research studentships from 230 to 160, advanced course studentships from 100 to 70. Project grants have been cut by 4 per cent., programme grants by some 12 per cent. Government funds to help with general running costs of research units have fallen so low that, because they cannot afford the general running co[illegible] the research units are having to turn down projects which would otherwise be funded privately. That is not very efficient. Over 200 clinical academic posts have disappeared in the last few years. All this damages vital research, the related teaching and the treatment of patients which is also provided in the teaching hospitals by clinical academic staff.

All the work that is done in the units is intended to relieve human misery, the pain of sick children, the nightmare of psychiatric illness, the horrors of cancer. It is of worldwide renown. It is work of which the researchers and all of us in Britain can be proud. It is practical and purposeful. But it is not being properly funded by a Government who continue instead to pour millions of pounds into weapons research and nuclear power generation. I challenge the Minister or the Secretary of State to come with me to Great Ormond Street Hospital for Sick Children and see the patients, their parents and the staff, and tell them face to face why the necessary funds are not available for that famous hospital and for the Institute of Child Health.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): The hon. Gentleman keeps on about funding. The entire burden of his speech, as of the motion to which he is addressing his speech, has been critical and negative. Before he sits down, will he tell us something positive — in particular, what the Opposition would do if they were in power? What has happened to the commitment of a 3 per cent. increase in the payment to the NHS in view of reports in the medical press this week that the Labour party has reneged on its commitments?

Mr. Dobson: The Tories had better learn that there is nothing negative about defending what is left of the NHS. It is the most positive thing that an Opposition can do until they are in power. When we are in power we shall find the funds that are necessary to restore the NHS.

I hope that the Minister will not dismiss the examples that I have given as anecdotes. They are facts; they are what are called evidence in a court of law. They are certainly more truthful than the figures he and his colleagues keep peddling. The Government leave no figure unfiddled in their pursuit — fruitless, as it turns out — of popularity. We now hear they are to try to reduce hospital waiting lists, but they have done it already. First, they left off the day cases. They trumpet about day cases when they are talking about people treated, but they change the rules to exclude day cases waiting for treatment from the waiting lists. More recently they conducted an administrative cull, the object of which was to reduce the list by a further 10 per cent. The doctored list is 661,000 — 10 per cent. of that is, as near as damn it, 66,000. So comparing like with like the real total is 727,000. That is higher than it was during the industrial dispute in 1982 and even 29,000 higher than the first figures produced after the "winter of discontent".

Our concentration today on the big city hospitals does not mean that the situation in the NHS outside the big cities does not concern us. Of course it does. We need a new approach to the whole of the NHS — supportive and helpful. But the reason why we have concentrated on the big city hospitals is that they and the people that they serve are suffering most from the Government's policies. Of course, many of the people that they serve come from outside the big cities anyway. But it is on the areas suffering most damage that we must concentrate most effort.

Fortunately, between the Government and their objective of undermining the NHS stands one insuperable barrier — the British people. Our people treasure the NHS, which has served them so well. Whenever and wherever it is threatened, local people join the staff involved to resist. Whether in Leeds, Liverpool or London, Birmingham or Bristol, Cardiff or Edinburgh, people resist. They will not forget or forgive the Government's attack on their hospitals. The Labour party, whose proudest boast is that we founded the NHS, is involved in that resistance up and down the country. We promise to protect the NHS, to restore it and to improve it.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I certainly shall not.

But we promise more than that. We will change society and attack ill health at its source. We will reduce poverty by the introduction of a national minimum wage and increased pensions and benefits. We will tackle homelessness and improve housing conditions, we will improve health and safety at work, we will make healthy foods available at prices all our people can afford and we will turn back the sickening rise in unemployment. Here again, the communities in the big cities can expect to benefit especially from this investment in good health. We are confident that the people of this country will support us. We are confident that, with the help of the people, the big city hospitals will survive the current crisis. We are equally confident that this Tory Government will not.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"commends the Government on the increased resources it has made available for the National Health Service; congratulates the dedicated Health Service staff for their improved performance in delivering high quality health care; reaffirms the principle of equality of access to health care underlying the Government's resource allocation policy; and endorses the Government's decision to review the Resource Allocation Working Party formula under which the allocation of revenue funds is determined."

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), in an exaggerated and distorted account of the NHS, made no reference to the Labour party's plans except to say, in response to an intervention, that it would spend more — but not how much more. There was no sign at all of what increased resources would be made available, nor any real sign of where the money would be spent.

Those outside who follow these affairs will see that the hon. Gentleman's speech was nothing more than a distorted account of difficulties and problems, often exaggerated. There was no constructive element in the speech at all. Indeed, even when the hon. Gentleman talked about perinatal mortality, which is of vital concern to us all, he made no mention of the fact that the rate of 15·4 deaths per thousand which we inherited in 1979 had come down by 1984 to 10 per thousand. There was no reference to that significant improvement which resulted from the dedicated and devoted efforts of the staff involved.

Mr. Galley rose

Mr. Hayhoe: Nor was there any sign in the hon. Gentleman's speech that the NHS commands a high level of satisfaction from those who have personal or family experience of the vital services that it provides.

The latest poll commissioned by the National Association of Health Authorities and the Health Service Journal has shown that about 88 to 89 per cent. of people are satisfied, very satisfied or fairly satisfied with the quality of care and treatment. This level of satisfaction is probably higher than for any other institution or organisation in the country.

Mr. Galley: In contrast to what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, is it not the proudest boast of this Government that the health of people has consistenly improved during their tenure of office? There are now more kidney transplants, more kidney patients, more heart operations, more hip replacements and an improvement in the rate of perinatal mortality. Is it not also our proud boast that resources have consistently grown and have not been cut, as they were under the Labour Government? We may have curtailed growth in places but we have not cut the service.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making some of the positive and constructive points which, for reasons of time, I shall not be able to include in my speech. Of course constructive criticisms can be made of the present situation, but it is perfectly clear from the speech by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that I must await speeches from Government Members in order to hear responsible comment and helpful suggestions.

I welcome this opportunity to reaffirm the Government's record on the National Health Service and, perhaps even more important, to pay tribute again to the hard work, dedication and excellence of the hundreds of thousands of men and women who work in hospitals, clinics and day centres throughout Britain. By their efforts day in and day out, it is they, not Ministers or DHSS officials, who ensure that we have a National Health Service of which we can all be proud.

The Health Service does not exist in a vacuum. We can have a good Health Service only if we can afford to pay for it, and health services depend on a healthy economy. The basis of a healthy economy is the prudent management of financial affairs so as to ensure economic growth and low inflation. In 1985 the United Kingdom topped the league of EEC countries in terms of economic growth. Indeed, the 3·5 per cent. growth in 1985 was faster than in the United States, and the fastest rate of economic growth in this country since 1973. Our national income is at an all-time high and this is accompanied by an inflation rate of 2·8 per cent. which is the lowest since the 1960s. Lower costs are good for the Health Service and for its patients, just as they are good for other people in Britain.

The improvement in economic performance has been due to sound finance, an important element of which has been the responsible control of public expenditure. Within this overall control, priority has been given to the National Health Service. That is why Health Service expenditure has grown as a proportion of public expenditure from 12 per cent. when the Labour party left government to 14 per cent. now. That is why, when public expenditure generally has grown by 8 per cent. in real terms, spending on the National Health Service has gone up by 24 per cent.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is nodding, so there is no need for me to give way to him.

The Health Service has not only shared in the record growth of the economy, because health expenditure has increased its share of the GDP from 5·3 per cent. when the last Labour Government left power to over 6 per cent. now. If that is what the Opposition mean by undermining the Health Service, then words have simply ceased to have any meaning at all. Let me translate all this into what it means for the National Health Service. Spending is up from £7·75 billion when Labour left office to £18·75 billion in 1986-87. This represents a real increase after allowing for inflation of 24 per cent. If Labour's level of spending had been maintained, present spending would be £3·5 billion lower than it is now. Our record is hardly a record of neglect.

Capital spending to replace and improve the hospitals we have inherited and to provide new hospitals and community care facilities will be well over £900 million this year — that is £20 million worth of capital spending every week of the year. A total of 159 new hospital projects each worth over £2 million are presently being planned, designed or built in England alone. Perhaps this is what the Opposition, who cut the capital programme for the NHS when they were in power, mean by undermining the Health Service.

The foundation of a successful and developing Health Service is its staff. We are lucky that the National Health Service recruits so many of the very best people. Since this Government came to power, the National Health Service has taken on more than 60,000 extra nurses and midwives, 36,000 extra after allowing for the shorter working week that was introduced by this Government. We have 5,800 more hospital doctors and 4,000 more GPs than there were under the last Labour Government. Manpower generally is now under proper management control, with the result that far more of the staff are engaged in patient care. Doctors, nurses and professional and technical staff now make up 64 per cent. of total staff, compared to 58 per cent. in 1978. At the same time, the expenditure on management has fallen. Better value for money is just as important as spending more money on the NHS.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The Minister is obviously seeking to show his concern for National Health Service staff. Does he not accept that of late, in London, Health Services staff have been telling him that, although there has been an increase in finance, there has been a greater increase in need, and that the money is not enough? How can he answer a consultant orthopaedic surgeon in Guy's hospital who wrote to me only last week:

"Of course the problems are caused by inadequate funding of our unit, which is extremely busy and in great demand. It would help us all if somebody in your position could help to redress the gross imbalances in the Health Service"?

I am sure that letter is typical of hundreds that the Minister must know about. How does the Minister answer that person, a surgeon who is trying to do a job as a member of the National Health Service but who cannot cope because the money is inadequate?

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall say something about those matters in the course of my speech.

More money and more staff, together with improved efficiency, mean that it is possible to treat more patients and improve the service. The record speaks for itself. The Health Service in 1984 treated nine in-patients for every eight treated in 1978; three day cases for every two treated in 1978; and 11 out-patients for every 10 treated in 1978. That is hardly a service in decline or in retreat, as the Opposition and some trade unions would have us believe.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): I should like to make two brief points. First, will the Minister include the figure for repeat referrals for out-patients and in-patients? Because of efficiency savings, such people do not spend the right amount of time in hospital. Secondly, the number of patients to which he has referred includes a number of patients who come to hospital three or four times. Will he confirm that in his figures for the total number of nurses he is including for the first time 100,000 nursing auxiliaries?

Mr. Hayhoe: There is no justification for the first point made by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt). I well recognise his long and close attachment to and support for health issues. The figures I have seen would not support his contention. He is arguing about 1,000 in an increase of 58,000. If that is his case, there is not a great deal of difference between us, and the hon. Gentleman ought to be applauding the substantial increase that has been made.

The Health Service is a dynamic and developing institution. It is not a museum reflecting and preserving the past. I listened to the Opposition bemoaning any sign of change or progress, and I am sure that if they could they would attack us for the reduction in the number of leeches available in NHS hospitals. Britain is changing. Medical technology and practice is changing and if the Health Service is to provide the sort of first-rate health care that a modern people demands, it must change also.

Let me give some examples of those changes. There are now many more very old people. The proportion of people aged 75 and over has increased from 5 per cent. to 6·5 per cent. of the population over the past 10 years—an increase of 709,000, at a time when the population generally has remained relatively constant. Those numbers will go on increasing.

The population living in cities has declined. Between 1971 and 1981 the population of inner London fell by one sixth, from more than 3 million to 2·5 million, and the population of the former metropolitan counties fell by 500,000, while the population of the rest of the country rose by 1·5 million.

People want health services conveniently available where they now live and not where their grandparents used to live. The Health Service must change and adapt and adjust its service provision to the new realities.

However, the change in demography is not the only significant change. Medical techniques and medical practice are constantly developing. For example, one in every six cases treated nowadays is a day case, compared with fewer than one in 10 in 1976. The average length of stay in hospital for surgical cases has fallen by 20 per cent. over the past 10 years; that represents an advance in patient care. Opposition Members seem to wish patients to stay longer away from their families and to be maintained at a substantial cost to the taxpayer, simply to keep beds open. Here, as in other areas, Opposition Members are true to their Luddite traditions.

The Government are concerned not simply to provide more money, but to ensure that it is spent better. One element in that aim is a fairer geographical distribution of resources. In 1978-79, there was a gap of about 22 per cent. between the three most deprived regions and the three that were highest above their target. By 1986-87 that gap had been more than halved and is now below 10 per cent. For the first time ever, no region is more than 4 per cent. below its target fair share of resources.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Will my right hon. Friend accept it from me that, as one who opposed the Resource Allocation Working Party system from the time it was dreamed up by the last Labour Government and introduced by the present leader of the Social Democratic party when he was the Health Minister, I know that areas such as my own have suffered time and again? It is precisely because the centres of excellence—the big teaching hospitals—have been losing money to other places over the years that the scare stories that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) can trot out ad nauseam have partly come true.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who speaks on these matters with considerable authority.

The Government remain firmly committed to improving access to health services throughout the country, both at national and at local level. Nationally, that is done through the RAWP formula, which allows for age, morbidity and patient flows to produce a target for each region. At regional and district level, the emphasis shifts from the allocation of funds to achieving the real aim of the whole process — improving equality of access to services. In essence that means providing local services.

It is certainly right to concentrate specialist services at centres of excellence; patients are happy to travel to the city teaching hospitals and similar centres for specialist treatment. However, a wide range of services are best provided locally. Examples include the "bread and butter" acute services. Elderly people are the major users of those services, and helping them to return home is a crucial part of their care.

People rightly expect to have access to local maternity and children's services, but too many of our health services reflect population patterns of 50 or 100 years ago, rather than today's needs. It is right that health authorities should be planning to take acute services to the growing populations of the suburbs and shire counties and that they should be working for a better balance of services in the inner cities, where local people need good community services alongside the centres of excellence at the teaching hospitals.

None of that can be achieved by financial formulae.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister aware that there is hardly a health district in the country where some argument is not going on about local provision, its reduction and closures? Is he aware that Conservatives are involved in many of these little campaigns and they say that they do not understand why the Government have to cut taxes and cut services? They want to pay higher taxes and retain better services. How does the right hon. Gentleman reply to those Conservatives?

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government have made more resources available. I understand those who argue that even more should be made available and I shall comment on them towards the end of my speech.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will my right hon. Friend accept that some superb facilities have been provided in Lancaster and that will inevitably entail the closing of much-loved little hospitals such as the Beaumont hospital, which was a fever hospital in the first world war and cannot be remotely economic?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. She makes the sort of constructive and helpful comment which I said earlier was most likely to be made from the Government side of the House.

I make it clear that London must, of course, retain its centres of excellence, but London is more expensive and, because of recruitment problems—the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras referred to some of those problems — it is sometimes more difficult to provide services in London than elsewhere. So it makes no sense, as a long-term aim, to bring people into London for treatment that can be equally well provided for them locally. Local provision is also much more convenient for patients and their families.

A fairer regional distribution of available money is not enough. It is also important that that money is directed towards the groups that the Government have identified as deserving priority—the elderly, the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped. The increasing costs of acute medicine and the influence and status of those who practise it could mean that the weakest in our society come off second best. I am anxious to ensure that that does not happen and that the elderly, the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped are not disadvantaged.

Expenditure on the priority groups has increased by more than £400 million — a doubling in cash terms, from £1·3 billion to £2·6 billion — and that is in addition to the help given to elderly people by the acute services. Those priority services also benefit from the increased number of mental illness and mental handicap nurses, which has risen by 16 per cent. since 1978, even after allowing for the shorter working week.

It has been generally recognised for many years that, for historical reasons, inner-city areas have tended to be over-provided with acute beds. The London health planning consortium set up under the last Labour Government concluded that the number of acute beds in London needed to be substantially reduced. Patients in inner cities, such as London, are still more likely to go into hospital and to stay longer than are their counterparts outside the big cities. That is due, at least in part, to the historic pattern of care in the inner cities, with its emphasis on the provision of acute beds in teaching hospitals. Those hospitals include specialists' work in their case load, but in big city districts there are 50 per cent. more senior doctors per case treated than there are in other districts.

Although inner cities tend to be over-provided with acute beds, they tend to be under-provided with primary care, as the Acheson report found for London some years ago. High standards of general practice can make a major contribution to tackling the health problems associated with social deprivation in inner cities. Some outstanding work is already being done in that area and the Government have provided extra money, in the form of financial incentives to GPs to form group practices and 60 per cent. grants to improve the quality of practice premises.

Mr. Dobson: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us how many of the 114 recommendations of the Acheson report have been implemented?

Mr. Hayhoe: Not without notice.

Standards of practice are still variable in inner cities. That is why the discussion document on primary health care, which was published in April, lays particular stress on the importance of improving standards in inner cities.

Of course the challenges faced by the Health Service, such as the need to take account of demographic change and changes in medical techniques and medical practices, as well as the need to ensure a fairer distribution of resources between and within regions and between priority groups, can often give rise to problems. But the NHS is facing up to those challenges, and I pay tribute to Health Service managers and staff for the way in which they have managed, and are managing, the rapid rate of change that is necessary to improve Health Service care.

But inevitably problems and pressures come together in the city districts, where the job of readjusting to a new pattern of care causes particular difficulties. Very often, those districts must also adjust their education and training responsibilities while at the same time, for historic reasons, their hospitals are located in older buildings, which all have their passionate supporters for retention.

The Government are acting to ease the process of change on several fronts. First, they are improving significantly the capital stock of the Health Service. A listing of all the projects would take until 7 pm, so I shall just mention a few: the redevelopment of the Royal Victoria infirmary in Newcastle at a cost of £20 million, the Leicester Royal infirmary development costing £13 million, the new Good Hope district general hospital in Birmingham on which £12 million is being spent, provision in Manchester, expenditure on the Mayday hospital in Croydon, the redevelopment of St. Mary's, Paddington, phase 2 of the development at St. George's, Tooting, phase 1 of the Homerton hospital, and the upgrading of St. Thomas's hospital across the river. That hardly sounds like undermining the Health Service in inner cities or observing its collapse.

I am pleased to announce today that I have given approval for phase 2 of the Derby city hospital redevelopment at a cost of nearly £9 million, and that work on the construction of the new national heart and chest hospital on the Brompton site begins today. That adds to the long list of schemes that we have recently approved, many of which deal with patients living in our largest cities, or who would otherwise be treated there. The development at St. Luke's, Bradford, two schemes in Liverpool, the commencement of work in the south-east Thames region on three major new district hospitals, and the undertaking of further work on the new district general hospital at Milton Keynes in the Oxford region all represent increases in the capital programme. The Labour Government cut that capital programme.

Health services are improving in the big cities. Our statistics show that, for all large city districts, the number of in-patients treated rose by 11 per cent. between 1979 and 1984, with nearly 6 per cent. more out-patients treated and nearly 60 per cent. more day cases. It is absolutely moral humbug for trade union leaders to complain about increases in waiting lists, when they and their members were responsible for the damaging strikes of 1978-79 and 1982, which led to record increases in waiting lists and record lengths of waiting lists.

Another issue that is often used to whip up a sense of crisis is that of hospital closures. In any developing service, some hospitals are bound to close while others are opening. To look only at the closures makes as much sense as reading the deaths column in the newspaper and ignoring the births column, and thereby assuming that the population is dying out. Opposition Members have distinctly selective memories in that area. Although 227 hospitals closed in the first six years of this Government, 270 hospitals closed in the five years of the previous Labour Government. But what count are services, not hospitals, and patients, not beds. As I have said, under this Government services have continued to improve and the number of patients treated continues to increase.

The Government recognise that inner-city districts have particular problems in coping with change. But they must also look critically at their activities and resources. It is right that health authorities that have fared well in the past should re-examine the use that they make of expensive estate and the resources that they have tied up in non-clinical work. It is significant that the Thames regions' cost improvement achievements and plans have been significantly above the national average in every year of the cost improvement programmes. For 1986-87, the Thames regions plan cash-releasing cost improvements equivalent, on average, to more than 2 per cent. of their allocations compared with a national average of some 1·5 per cent. Those are not Government-imposed targets but the regions' and districts' own plans.

Since much of the clamour about a shortage of resources has come from the consultants in London teaching hospitals, it is perhaps worth asking whether those hospitals have looked carefully enough at the cost-effectiveness of the services that they are using to support their clinical activity.

Mr. Simon Hughes: They certainly have.

Mr. Hayhoe: Well, my Department's performance indicators show that, after making allowance for extra costs in London, many of those hospitals have higher catering costs, higher domestic service costs, higher linen service costs, higher operating theatre costs and higher pathology and portering costs. Is it not incumbent upon those who resist change and who demand extra resources to look carefully at whether existing costs need to be so high compared with other teaching districts and the rest of the country generally?

The Government recognise the particular problems of big city districts. I have already referred to the major capital programmes and to the review of primary care, but I must mention two other things that we are doing which should help the health services in the big cities. I turn first to the review of RAWP, which was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg). It has been suggested that, although substantial progress has been made in redistributing resources, the present RAWP formula needs to be refined to improve its measurement of need.

The Government have therefore set up a review of RAWP, which will consider among other issues whether proper account is taken of social deprivation and inner-city problems, teaching hospital costs and patient flows across regional boundaries. Those are all issues of particular concern to the big cities. I am anxious to see good progress on that review, and have asked the management board to report by the end of the year.

Secondly, the Government have recently added an extra £50 million to health authority cash limits in England, following decisions on this year's pay awards. Of that money, more than £16 million will go to the Thames authorities and to the special health authorities in London, £7 million will go to the north-western and Mersey regions, £5 million will go to the west midlands and over £3 million will go to both Yorkshire and the northern regions. Those are substantial additions for regions that contain most of the big cities.

That has been done in a year when we have already allocated some £650 million more to hospital and community health services in England. With the extra £50 million, we are talking about growth, in real terms, of 3·8 per cent.—the highest figure since 1980-81. In addition, health authorities, with their cost improvement programmes, plan to release a further £150 million this year, with further planned increases in activity and productivity within existing resources. Health authorities are also benefiting from the fall in general inflation brought about by the Government's policies. The reduction in inflation below that assumed when setting cash limits will be worth £20 million on non-pay expenditure.

Of course I am not suggesting that more could not be done, that no improvements could be made or that there are not problems and pressures. Health care generates demand upon demand. Its needs are never satisfied. But this Government have shown their commitment to the Health Service as a whole, and that is reflected in the improvement of health services in our cities. The Opposition's contention that we are undermining health services does not stand up to any critical consideration, and I ask the House to reject the motion and to support the Government's amendment and their efforts to improve health services for all.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The Minister is becoming quite a juggler. In the speech that he has just made he sounded almost as good as the Secretary of State for Employment with his figures showing conclusively that unemployment is spiralling downwards. The Minister's figures are questionable and designed to show that far more money is being spent on the National Health Service. People's experience belies the figures and contradicts the picture painted by the Minister of a growing and expanding National Health Service.

The Minister said that there was a high level of satisfaction with the National Health Service. People would laugh their heads off at such a statement. However, we discovered that the Minister is not really speaking about the attitude towards the Health Service as a whole. He was speaking of comments in the Health Service Journal in which the quality of care was being discussed. People do not like criticising doctors and nurses. They are only too anxious to pay tribute to them. Such a comment gives a false impression about what people really think about National Health Service provision, which is disastrous in many areas. The Minister fails to take note of the anxieties and very real concern expressed by thousands of people.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) spoke about the excellence of teaching hospitals in London and of the scare stories from some areas. He does not know what he is talking about. I support centres of excellence in London and elsewhere, but it is not scare stories that come from the regions.

I have a horror story to tell the House today which I hope to confine to 10 minutes. It is a horror story of what has happened in Stoke-on-Trent and in north Staffordshire. I emphasise my support for my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and others who want the centres of excellence to be assisted, but that must be done by giving new resources to those centres of excellence, not by sapping their income and transferring the funds to the regions. That is wrong.

My main concern today is to put the case for helping the scandalously deprived, underprivileged areas such as north Staffordshire, which has been deprived for a long time. The tendency is for the Government and the public to accept that deprivation with complacency. The appalling inequalities have existed for far too long.

I shall illustrate the massive disparities by referring to red alerts. A few months ago there was a red alert at a London hospital. My hon. Friend was the first to shriek and condemn it. The people of London agreed that it was disastrous. The red alert meant that only emergency cases were admitted to hospital. There was a stop on other admissions.

North Staffordshire experienced red alerts in September — that was not even in winter — from the first part of November until December, for over six weeks from January into February, from February to early April and from mid-April to 6 May. North Staffordshire experienced red alerts for almost the entire winter. There was a stop on admissions and only emergency cases were admitted.

One can imagine the suffering caused to the sick people of north Staffordshire by that interminable period of red alerts. It was not one crisis, but a perpetual crisis. I hope that the House will take note of that scandal. We must do something about it because the sick people of north Staffordshire are suffering. The medical staff are bearing a heavy burden.

The Minister referred to the resource allocation working party which is dealing with the reallocation of resources. According to RAWP, north Staffordshire is 12·5 per cent. below target. Planned progress for improvement has been extremely slow, even without interference with the RAWP formula, so that by 1990 north Staffordshire would still have been 9 per cent. below target — the third worst district in the west midlands region.

According to the DHSS figures published last summer on the value of National Health Service provision for people in all health districts, north Staffordshire is seventh from the bottom. The value of acute services received is only £58·45 per person. Those at the top of the scale — the first 15 — are all London district health authorities. They are receiving over twice as much as the people in north Staffordshire. The Minister cannot justify that disparity. He cannot deny the people of north Staffordshire. He cannot give them only half of what Londoners receive. That is wrong and cannot be justified.

I recognise that those figures are not a perfect measure of Health Service deprivation, but they are a significant indicator and should be taken into account by the House.

What I have described makes a mockery of the rhetoric in the Government amendment about reaffirming

"the principle of equality of access to health care."

I do not criticise the Minister on that score because he says that he intends to review RAWP, which I welcome. But I hope that he does not mean that resources will be cut so that deprived regions will suffer still further cuts.

The people of Stoke-on-Trent are suffering gross inequality in access to health care. That inequality is not vague or hypothetical; it leads to genuine human suffering. People who are desperately ill and in pain are suffering unnecessarily. The House should do something about it.

In Stoke-on-Trent people in severe pain because of an arthritic hip joint, for example, have to wait for up to 46 weeks for a first appointment with a consultant. There can be no justification for that. About 60 per cent. of people in my area whose cases are not regarded as "urgent" — that is a medical definition — as most orthopaedic cases are not, have to wait for over one year for an operation. Last December, overall in north Staffordshire, 3,336 people had been waiting for a so-called "non-urgent" operation for over a year. Such cases might be non-urgent in medical terms, but that phrase masks great human suffering.

Urgent cases, naturally, receive quicker treatment, but even that can be appalling. No less than 75 per cent. of "urgent" cases in general surgery wait for over one month.

One can imagine what it is like to be told, "You are very ill. You need an urgent operation, but come back in a month's time."

Because of the revelations about unfair allocation, together with pressure from myself, my parliamentary colleagues and officials of the district health authority in north Staffordshire, the West Midlands regional health authority has begun to move and has given a £10·5 million boost over the next five years, which I welcome and appreciate. That authority also has problems, but fortunately it is shortly to receive an additional £40 million. I regret that the boost for north Staffordshire is far from adequate and cannot possibly solve the problems, although it is a move in the right direction towards the RAWP recommendations. However, some people in the south-east are now suggesting that we drop or change the RAWP formula. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate spoke of scare stories in my area. They are not scare stories; they are true.

I conclude with this plea – that RAWP will not be invalidated in any way. If the Government want to refine it, that is all right – but please do not interfere with the reallocation of funds from the better-off south-east to neglected areas such as mine. I hope that the use of the word "review" will not be a euphemism for stopping reallocation. The Government must face reality – they cannot provide a fair allocation of resources and good health treatment if they do not increase the total resources available. The answer to the problem must be increased resources. Reallocation is important, but juggling with figures is no substitute for increased cash for the NHS. I hope that the Minister will win his battle with the Treasury to increase funding for the NHS.

5.2 pm

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I offer my apologies to the Opposition spokesman for not being here during the opening speech. That was due to circumstances beyond my control. It is unlikely that I shall repeat exactly what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, because I intend to devote my speech entirely to my constituency of Old Bexley and Sidcup, the borough of Bexley and the Bexley health authority.

It is many years since I made a speech in this House about matters concerned solely with my constituency – indeed, it must be more than 35 years – but I find the current position intolerable and I cannot remain silent any longer. Some of us have held our peace when believing that wrong decisions were taken, but it is apparent that the damage is becoming so great that the facts must be stated. I do not blame my right hon. Friend the Minister, who is a prisoner of the system. It is the system that must be changed. I am glad that there is to be a review of the system, but we cannot wait very long to change it because of the damage it is causing to Bexley.

This country apportions about 6·2 per cent. of gross national product to health services. The general figure for countries of comparable size and wealth is 8·5 per cent. That, therefore, is our first lesson. We must be prepared to devote more of our resources to health, both private and public.

Secondly, I do not believe that allowing the Health Service to go private is the answer, other than to a limited extent. Those who suggest that we follow the American system are urging something that is wholly unacceptable in this country. The United States, its President and Congress are large enough to ignore the fate of millions of their under-privileged citizens. We are not only unable to ignore it, but are not prepared to ignore it. That is why we cannot follow that system. By all means, let us encourage those who can afford it to indulge in private health care, but the great majority cannot afford it.

Thirdly, as I have said many times, the Government are wrong if they think that the first priority is to reduce taxation still further. I know that taxation is still much higher than it was in the years 1970 to 1974, but that is no justification for saying that it must be reduced still further. If I ask my constituents, "Do you want your taxes reduced?", they will say yes. Indeed, I would say yes. However, if we ask them, "Do you want your taxes reduced at the expense of the education of your children and the health of your family?", the immediate answer is no. Yet that is what is happening.

Bexley is part of the great city of London; it is not part of a declining inner city. The population in 1981 was 217,000, in 1985 it was 218,500, and it is projected that by 1996 it will be 220,000. It is an expanding population, with a great demand on services, especially health. Moreover, there is an increasing elderly population. In 1981 the percentage was 29·8, in 1985 it was 31·2, and it is projected that by 1991 it will be 32 per cent. Bexley, therefore, meets the requirements set out by the Minister that it should be an increasing, not declining, population with an increasing, not declining, proportion of elderly people.

As the Minister said, people expect to be treated locally, and I can tell him that the people of Bexley expect to be treated in Bexley. My right hon. Friend was wrong to suggest that people needing specialist treatment are willing to travel to teaching hospitals and for relatives to have to travel to visit them after a serious operation.

That is precisely the argument that has been taking place over the Brook hospital cardiac unit. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for over-ruling the regional committee and keeping the unit there. However, the argument took seven years. That is an example of the bureaucratic incompetence of regional committees. They can argue for a long time about such a major facility as the cardiac unit at the Brook hospital. Indeed, that unit has a better success record than the teaching hospitals, and the cost of operations is cheaper than in the teaching hospitals, for obvious reasons.

Yet the same argument is taking place about the neurological unit at the Brook hospital, and that, too, has been going on for seven years. We still do not have a settlement, review after review goes on, and that is just not tolerable. I hope that I have established that Bexley has an expanding population with a larger proportion of elderly people who want to be treated with the necessary facilities.

I shall now deal with existing facilities, which is the real point of the argument. Bexley has Queen Mary's hospital which was built just over 10 years ago. It was opened by the then Labour Minister for Health. It has 556 beds, an outstanding maternity unit, many effective specialised departments and a major accident unit. It is up to date. It is a modern creation, yet it is being damaged because it is being refused the money to carry out its services.

I fully support equalising health treatment throughout the country. After all, I spent a large part of my political life trying to obtain a better deal for Scotland, Wales and the north-east of England. As Secretary of State for Industry, Trade and Regional Development in 1963-64, I dealt with this matter in the context of north-eastern regional development. Alas, those policies have been abondoned by this Government. I am in favour of equalisation, but not at the cost of the nonsense of refusing to use the modern facilities that we already have. That cannot make sense by any criteria.

Surely the first priority must be to ensure that modern hospitals with all the facilities are used, and then go on to build additional hospitals that are required to replace the older hospitals. One problem with the present formula is that when an area has to build a modern hospital to replace, for example, two older hospitals, as is happening in north and east London, extra money is required to run the two older hospitals while building the new one. That is why Bexley is suffering from less money. We cannot make use of the modern hospital that we have. The system is based on a fallacy and the Government took a wrong policy decision.

The Bexley health authority found that for 1986-87 it was due to have a deficit of £750,000 and that in 1989-90 the deficit would increase to nearly £1·5 million. Bexley has been told that it must meet the deficit by cuts or increased efficiency. Queen Mary's hospital is proven to be well above the national average in terms of efficiency, the speed of its throughput is faster than the national and regional average, and the cost per patient is lower than average. What more can be asked of it than that? A stage is reached when it is not possible further to increase efficiency and make cuts of up to £1·5 million.

The Government say that they are spending 20 per cent. more on real resources for the hospital service, but we know that 70 per cent. of this spending goes on nurses' salaries. That leaves a much smaller sum to make improvements elsewhere in the country. As there are shorter working hours for nurses, the burden on them and the demand for nurses is much greater than it was. That cannot be taken into account merely by saying, "Greater efficiency."

I have often been accused of being a technologist who is keen only on management. I am interested in management, but I have never suggested that someone who is a good Army officer or good at running an electronics factory will be admirable at running a hospital. If I have to go into hospital, I do not want someone running the show who has only just left the Royal Air Force. Nor do I want someone in charge who is especially good at producing television screens. I would want a good matron, and on that basis I would know where I was.

As my hon. Friends the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) and for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) are present, I should say that the Bexley mental hospital, which has 907 beds, is affected by the Government's policy. Similarly, the Erith district hospital, which has 31 beds, is affected by the cuts.

In dealing with the Government's demands, cuts are being made. What is the result? One ward has already been closed at Queen Mary's hospital. That means that the modern facilities in which the Government have invested capital are not being used. That ward will remain closed. There was a threat that the ward for disabled young people would be closed. We have been able to avert that threat purely by blackmail. Bexley has said, "A great deal of private money has been provided and if you dare close the ward you will never get any more money for a hospital in Bexley." The ward has not been closed. Unfortunately, a general ward remains closed.

In addition, one operating theatre is to be closed. That will reduce operating capacity by 20 per cent., or 1,760 operations a year out of 8,800. That will happen and that will be the direct result of the Government's policy.

There is to be a reduction in the number of beds in the surgical wards because of the closure of one operating theatre. As a result, there will be a reduction in emergency admissions. That follows logically from the closure of the operating theatre.

Less than a month ago one of my constituents said, "I know that you can do nothing about this, but you should know that my wife was taken seriously ill. I called her doctor and he came at once. He told me that she must have an immediate operation. We rang Queen Mary's and were told that no emergency place was available. We telephoned Dartford and were told, 'There is a ward, an operating theatre and a surgeon; bring her over,' only to find that there was no bed available for her after the operation. We were told that Dartford could not accept her. Finally, she was taken to Gravesend." For someone living in Sidcup, that is a considerable distance to travel. That is an example of what is already happening, and that is why the situation has become intolerable. I must make it plain that that is so.

In addition, the family planning surgical service at Queen Mary's hospital is to be abolished. That is surely a loss. My constituents do not understand why cuts are being made on their doorstep when the Government say that many millions of pounds of extra money are being provided for the NHS.

The Bexley mental hospital is to be closed eventually. Twenty old ladies who are psycho-geriatric patients have been taken from their ward they were accustomed to it, as were those who looked after them and spread around the hospital so that the ward can be closed. That is certainly not a step towards perfection. That is not making the hospital more effective. To move patients in that way is damaging and should not be allowed to happen.

The operating theatre at the Erith district hospital is to be closed. All consultants' beds are to disappear, along with the loss of 15 general practitioners' beds in one ward. That is because the necessary money is not to be made available, and not because of inefficiencies.

The community services will suffer as well. Two clinics are to close. Three dental clinics are to close, and there is to be a reduction of dental staff. The number of family planning clinics will be reduced from 10 to four. When these things are happening, how can I say to my constituents that they are getting a better health service and better individual care? It is not possible for me to say that that is happening. If I were to say that it was, I would be incredible, and I do not wish to be incredible.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I support what my right hon. Friend is saying. Does he agree that, far from having too many hospital administrators in the Bexley health area, we have rather too few?

Mr. Heath: That is the case. My hon. Friend and I have spent a vast amount of time talking to hospital administrators, to the Bexley health committee and to the chairman of the regional health authority. It is easy to say that a reduction in the number of administrators will bring about the savings that are required, but a point is reached when it is damaging to the service to reduce the administrative staff.

The ambulance service will be cut because of the abolition of the GLC. Many chair cases will not be taken by ambulance and walking cases will have to find other means of transport to get to the hospital when required. This is happening already.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: I have taken too long already. I know the point that the hon. Gentleman wishes to make. We have sometimes been in agreement about the GLC.

I have outlined the facts with which we must deal. It is intolerable that Bexley should have its modern services damaged because new services are going to be made available in other parts of the country. New services can be provided only if we have an expanding economy and are prepared to use a greater share of our wealth to support the Health Service. If we try to take the opposite approach, we shall damage the new resources which have already been provided. That is no answer to the problem. If the Minister is bound to have the review of RAWP, so be it, but I ask him to ensure that it is done quickly. I would much prefer no review to be undertaken. It would be better if he took the action which he knows to be necessary, my colleagues and I having had long talks with him.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): My right hon. Friend may know that there are some who criticised the last part of his period in power on the ground that the money supply was growing too fast. Sterling M3 has grown over the past three months at an annualised rate of 39 per cent. What measure of growth would he like to see? By how much more would he like to see credit expanding?

Mr. Heath: I appreciate my hon. Friend's anxiety. The most recent figures show that M3 money supply is growing at one and a half times the maximum rate at which it grew between 1970 and 1974. It is natural that my hon. Friend is alarmed when we have a Government whom he supports, which was not the case with my Government. My hon. Friend is out of date on M3. He must listen to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who says that M3 no longer matters. My right hon. Friend has already abolished M3, M2 and M1. We are back to MO. Perhaps my hon. Friend will wish to follow him and to take up MO, which suggests that everything is all right. That will mean that we can have more money, which will stop the Government ruining a good service. That is why I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister not to waste a great deal of time on reviews. He has seen the problem clearly. It is necessary to let those of us who are fortunate to have modern resources to use them effectively and to keep them. We cannot justify to the electorate doing otherwise.

5.10 pm

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) described perfectly what is happening in every constituency. I am sure that if Conservative Members were willing to ascertain what is happening in hospitals in their constituencies they would find cases similar to those that the right hon. Gentleman described. The Select Committee has spent some time considering the problems. We have ventured into areas, as the right hon. Gentleman said, where there is considerable pressure on hospitals. I am not surprised that the Minister for Health did not refer in his opening speech to the catastrophe that has befallen him in the resignation of Mr. Victor Paige. Mr. Paige, who was in post for a matter of months only, was head-hunted at an enormous salary. He decided that he could no longer continue in the job. The Select Committee will probably want to pursue that matter in the near future.

Mr. Paige gave evidence to the Public Accounts Committee some two months before the Secretary of State for Social Services announced the resignation. In that session with the PAC, Mr. Paige listed his achievements. In 1985-86, there was a cost improvement of £150 million, of which £120 million was cash-releasing. Short-term programmes for the regions for 1986-87 also show a cost improvement of £150 million, cash-releasing — an increase of £30 million over 1985-86. Taking those figures back to 1984-85 and up to 1986-87, a total of £700 million cash-saving will be produced for the National Health Service. By the end of 1986-87, that will produce £400 million for the National Health Service on a recurring basis. When the 1987-88 CIP commences, a base of £400 million will be rolled on and repeated. Anything achieved then under cost improvement cash-releasing will be over and above the £400 million. That sounds absolutely marvellous. Hon. Members might say, "What are we worrying about? All that lovely lolly is available for all the development that we have not been able to fund." The challenge is, as Mr. Paige admitted, that savings must be made and retained to keep on improving services. Certainly, this year the regions are committed to delivering a cost improvement, cash-releasing programme of £150 million.

The other part of the package is that manpower savings must be made. Mr. Mills, from the Department, told the PAC that for every million pounds released by any region "we could expect to see at least 100 people being reduced from the payroll."

That is, in a full year. There is the rub. Those considerable savings are expected to be made, but they must not include the withdrawal of services or service reductions. The North East Thames regional health authority was examined and the board was satisfied that it was not trying to hide service cuts within a CIP.

However, the Select Committee discovered, in reply to questions on 4 June, that the volume of resources going into hospital and community health services has increased by only 6·3 per cent. since 1979-80 — about 1 per cent. per annum — and most of that was in the earlier years. Since 1980-81, the increase over five years has been only 3·1 per cent. In fact, in the three years since the last election the increase has been less than over half of 1 per cent. In other words, the purchasing power of the hospital service has been at a standstill for three years. That is where all the problems lie.

Hospitals, especially those in the London region and in all the large cities, are struggling with an increasing number of elderly patients, with finding resources to introduce and develop further medical advances. Ministers have generally agreed that we need a service growth of 2 per cent. per annum. That that is not forthcoming is a matter of acute concern to the medical profession — the nurses, the paramedics, and so on. That is what led the leaders of 12 teaching hospitals last Monday to describe the crisis they are facing after inner London had suffered cuts of £35 million last year. We cannot cut that amount out of a large city without damaging the fabric of the Health Service. The consultants, those responsible for delivering expert care and those who have academic teaching responsibilities have complained. Dr. Croft of St. Thomas' hospital has said:

"The crisis was a national disgrace, many useful and productive human lives have been lost and staff, including nurses, secretaries and porters are leaving because of their rotten pay. Beds are being closed and waiting lists increase."

We cannot overlook the effects of the review body awards to doctors, nurses, and other NHS staff. Morale falls when pay levels to all but the highest paid are well below the average. Whitley staff, in particular, have become very disillusioned.

The Secretary of State has the following questions to answer. First, can pay settlements be adjusted and cost improvements contrived, as far as he requires them to be, without harming patient services still further? If not, will he provide additional resources to maintain growth? Secondly, is he satisfied that the NHS management board's new accounting framework can properly assess, monitor and provide information about local value-for-money strategies? Thirdly, I ask what response he makes to Mr. Paige's reference in his letter of resignation to "the different perspectives, priorities, objectives and restraints of Ministers and the Chairman of the Management Board".

Fourthly, how is he facing up to the problem – which he and his predecessor embraced wholeheartedly – of the growing cost to community care of those patients discharged from long-stay hospitals and the effects of that both on NHS and local authority expenditure? The problem affects every region, large city and local authority. What is the answer to the question? The Select Committee has referred to it, but we have not had a satisfactory answer. Fifthly, it is generally agreed that we need 2 per cent. growth per annum. Will the Secretary of State tell us whether that will happen?

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) referred to the Institute of Psychiatry. The Minister will have read the letter that appeared in The Times on 27 May from Professor Griffith Edwards who runs an important and internationally known alcohol abuse clinic at the Maudsley hospital. The Minister will know exactly what was said in the letter signed by various consultants, some of whom are acting as advisers to the Select Committee in its inquiry into the prison medical service. We hope that in the not-too-distant future the results of the inquiry will be published. I can promise the Minister that the inquiry will show some serious problems that need urgent attention. I do not suppose that that will surprise him.

The consultants at the Institute of Psychiatry also wrote to me on the same day as the letter appeared in The Times pointing out that the work they do concerns important areas that the Government have said require attention as a matter of priority. They referred to the aspects which I have mentioned – mental illness and mental handicap – as well as to drug and alcohol abuse and caring for the elderly. They stated:

"the hospital's DHSS grant has failed to keep pace with inflation in recent years, and in consequence the hospital is underfunded by approximately £400,000 per annum and has accumulated an £800,000 deficit. The health authority's initial plan to recover this deficit involved closing our . . . Alcoholism Treatment Unit (directed by Professor Griffith Edwards), substantial portions of the Child Psychiatry Department . . . a neurosurgical ward, and part of the Mental Handicap Unit. Because of the public outcry the Special Health Authority has postponed these closures".

Unless the money is forthcoming, those closures will take place.

The dean, who wrote to me, said that the second reason for the institute's difficulties arose from the progressive squeeze on universities. He said:

"The Institute of Psychiatry receives approximately £2 million per annum from the University Grants Commission via London University" for its teaching responsibilities. It gets another £4 million from other sources, such as research councils, industry and charities. The institute's basic university income provides the salaries for those who seek the additional funds. The erosion of the university grant means that the institute is running a deficit of about £200,000 a year.

The squeeze on academic salaries adds to the problem. The Institute of Psychiatry has already lost three professors and five clinical posts, which is a serious loss for a teaching hospital. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will paint a more convincing picture than the Minister for Health.

5.21 pm

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) made a number of valid points but was rather selective in citing the statistics given to the Select Committee.

Mrs. Renée Short: One always has to select such statistics.

Mr. Galley: Of course, but by selecting statistics one can slant the argument in a particular direction. The hon. Lady did not fully recognise the enormous growth in resources and the improvements in the family practitioner service which inevitably have caused problems for expenditure on hospitals. She did not recognise that the increased pay for NHS staff, especially nurses and doctors, has imposed pressure on NHS resources, or that the squeeze on NHS revenue, pay and capital between 1974 and 1979 has caused a backlog which has since had to be cleared.

The implication of the Opposition's motion, which was so vividly portrayed by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), is that the big conurbations, which already attract disproportionately large resources across so many aspects of Government activity, should receive further preferential treatment. One accepts that there are problems, but, in round terms, that proposal should rightly be resented in smaller provincial towns. The previously bipartisan policy of the fairer distribution of resources has meant improvements in health facilities for smaller towns, such as the one that I represent. The Calderdale area health authority has still not reached its target under the resource allocation working party formula but has improved its position by more than 2 per cent. in the past five or six years. That has meant £500,000 extra to provide services. It is right and fair that there should be such an improvement in the provinces where there has been inadequate resourcing. The aim of the Opposition's motion is effectively to reverse that trend.

The Opposition may object to what I have said and say that that is not what they want and that they want to increase resources across the board—plucking funds, as ever, from the magical money tree. The unit costs of providing services in these urban areas often exceed the unit costs in smaller, more efficient hospitals. London receives a disproportionate share of resources for its population and, even taking account of London weighting, unit costs for the provision of particular items of service can be as much as 30 per cent. higher than in other parts of the country. In effect, the Opposition's motion is saying that the provinces should subsidise London and the other conurbations underwriting and ingraining those inefficiencies. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Of course there are particular problems, but, in general terms, that is what the motion seeks to do.

There will be additional resources during this financial year. Inflation will be significantly lower than projected. Oil prices have been significantly reduced. Those facts as well as prudent management in parts of the Health Service mean that there will be money for considerable expansion on a national basis. It may not affect every area, but in certain parts of the country there will be scope for considerable increases in expenditure. No doubt, given all the information that we have received in this debate, there is a case for a modest and carefully allocated increase in resources and for looking again at the formulae for teaching hospitals. No doubt, there are grounds for gearing allocations to take account of socio-economic factors as well as population changes. No doubt, the numbers of people who are working, but not necessarily living, in the cities is a relevant factor which present policies do not fully recognise. But essentially the problem is one of management. Some parts of the NHS are better managed than others. All of it could be better managed. We must not retreat from encouraging that improved management and stopping the subsidy of inefficiency.

When some services can be provided by the private sector at half the cost of the NHS, we cannot give up the fight for better management and more efficiency. When one hospital, for example, loses, as a result of pilfering, 25 per cent. of its linen budget each year, we cannot give up. When, for ideological reasons, health authorities lose the taxpayers' money by failing to co-operate with the private sector, we cannot give in to inefficiency.

The Opposition pretend that better management is not caring. They claim that inefficiency is caring. It is the reverse. The efficient use of resources—I do not claim that all the resources are used efficiently—allows more people to be treated, which means more, not less, caring. We do not want a health service that will be judged to be successful by the number of sick people in beds. We want one where success means more well people.

Ultimately, I become angry about the Opposition's two-faced hypocrisy. They are seeking to make political capital from people's suffering. The Labour Government cut the hospital building programme by one third, and for two consecutive years cut revenue spending. They did not curtail the rate of growth; they cut expenditure. I became angry that some consultants and some people in organisations such as the Royal College of Nursing aid and abet the Opposition when part of the problem is that they have had such a good deal, in terms of pay and conditions, from this Government, in stark contrast to the shabby way in which they were treated by the last Labour Government.

Mr. Tony Banks rose—

Mr. Galley: The struggle for better management will be long and arduous.

Mr. Pavitt rose

Mr. Galley: We need to stop the Health Service from being a political football and to allow managers to manage in a caring way. Radical steps may well be needed to achieve that. We should consider putting the NHS at one remove from political control and creating a quasi-nationalised industry concept. We need the NHS management board to manage. We should look again at health authorities and community health councils, replacing them with a more effective consumer voice.

Parliament and Government must be involved in health, but the day-to-day management of such a vast service with 1 million employees cannot be controlled centrally by Government. It needs to be effectively devolved with a more independent supervisory national board. Government and Parliament should determine the policies and the principles of the Health Service but leave the daily management to Health Service professionals. That concept has worked well with other services provided on a national basis and it can work with health.

Of course, funding would be a problem if independence was to be established. We would need to consider a devolved structure with perhaps a system of regional health charges on the lines of the community charges which are now proposed, so that people would know what they were paying for health and could monitor service improvements in direct relation to the increased taxation. There would always need to be an element of central funding to take account of special health authorities, medical education, specific circumstances and problems, but management and funding need to be devolved, in the interests of the patients in the hospitals, if our already successful Health Service is to meet successfully the challenges of the future. One of the greatest challenges to the Government during the next few years will be to take people's health and children's education out of the forefront of the political arena within the principles set down by Parliament.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). If I am correct in saying that he is the chairman of the Conservative Back-Bench committee on health, it augurs ill for the future development of Conservative policy on health. If the thoughts that the hon. Gentleman expressed this evening are typical of the thoughts and the new development of ideas in Conservative circles and in the Back-Bench committee, I fear for the future of the Health Service. I could devote my entire speech to responding to the hon. Gentleman's comments, but I had better resist that temptation.

I shall recommend to my Liberal and SDP colleagues that they should support the principal motion tabled by the leader of the Labour party. We are discussing an Opposite motion which contains the main elements of health care that worry us. Care for everyone, training problems for doctors and nurses, conditions in which staff work, research facilities and the promotion of good health are issues which also give us cause for anxiety.

I was deeply impressed by the speech made by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). I have rarely heard such a powerful exposition of local problems that demonstrated the challenges that face us nationally. The Government are obliged to take account of everything said by a right hon. Member of such experience and substance in the House.

I support the Conservative amendment to the motion in so far as it refers to the dedication of the staff. The staff of the National Health Service are under a pressure which they have never experienced before. I had direct experience of that pressure when I took up a challenge offered by the Nursing Standard to be a porter in an accident emergency unit in Whipps Cross hospital earlier this year. I spent a 10-hour night shift there and learnt a great deal about the pressure under which the staff operate. I hope that the Government will bring forward the review of the resource allocation formula. I hope that changes will be implemented soon after the review reports to the Department later this year.

I did not agree with the hon. Member for Halifax that money should be removed from London to fund the provinces. The difficulties in big city hospitals are caused by matters such as the extent of social deprivation, the teaching costs inevitably incurred in the big teaching hospitals and the cross-regional and cross-district flows. When the Minister for Health referred to the RAWP review, he mentioned those problems specifically. I hope that those matters will be urgently considered and urgently acted upon when the Minister receives the report.

The quality of care in the big city hospitals is under threat. The statistics that the Government frequently throw from the Dispatch Box do not face up to the difficulties of achieving and maintaining the quality of care. The statistics may show increased throughput of patients, but the statistics on the use of beds do not refer to readmissions and the damage that is often caused to patients by being chucked out of wards earlier than their medical condition would warrant.

I read an article in The Guardian this morning about waiting lists, which said that DHSS Ministers are to put up a stiff fight to try to get some extra resources from the Treasury to reduce the appalling level of waiting lists across the country and particularly in our big city hospitals. I would give the Minister for Health every support to try to obtain extra resources, not just as a cynical political guise to get him through a general election but because the need is there, and evident to all.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I wish to follow the hon. Gentleman's point about readmissions. There may be extra readmissions simply because of discharges made prematurely. The Minister said that the figures that he has seen did not lead him to consider the figures he was quoting differently. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be good for the public and for the House to know what figures the Minister was considering which led him to make that comment earlier this afternoon?

Mr. Kirkwood: I shall take up that helpful intervention. I ask the Minister to take notice of that point, take it back to his Department and consider writing to hon. Members who are interested in those matters, such as myself and the hon. Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), and give us the evidence used in the Minister for Health's statement earlier this evening.

I shall make some comments about the Liberal party's attitude to helping the plight of the big city hospitals. First, we must start — the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup made a powerful argument for this at the beginning of his speech — by devoting an increased proportion of our gross domestic product to the Health Service. Having considered the issues, I believe that an annual increase of at least 2 per cent. is required just to stand still in terms of funding the health budget. The Liberal party would commit itself to attempt that, as far as it was possible to do so.

In terms of the problems that exist, we would try to give more emphasis to the prevention of illness and community care. If more was spent on prevention and on community care, much of the pressure would be removed from the big city hospitals. Even such things as general practitioner hospitals in big cities and in rural areas could be used to give general practitioners the opportunity to practise in some of those smaller hospitals which Conservative Members are so keen to close in order to put people into huge palaces of high technology medical care. More could be done to save some of those general practitioner hospitals to keep some of our elderly people in acute beds closer to their families. An example of that exists in the border region where the Government are putting in a new district general hospital, which is small by national standards, but we are in the process, on a supposedly temporary basis, of closing Sekirk cottage hospital in the surrounding area as a consequence of lack of finance.

The problems of big city hospitals could be alleviated substantially by making proper and prudent use of some of the smaller hospitals and using them as general practitioner beds.

With regard to London, I underline what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras said about the Maudsley. That is an absolute litmus test of the Government's attitude towards those hospitals and institutions which have not only a national but an international reputation. The Maudsley does valuable work in the prevention of alcohol problems, drug abuse and adolescent problems. It is a litmus test of how the Government will proceed in future. If the Government do not provide the resources that that institution and others like it need, how will they manage to survive the financial pressures that they are under?

In terms of the problems outside London, I understand that the latest estimate is that about £1·7 billion needs to be spent on the fabric of our big city hospitals. One could not expect to achieve such a capital expenditure programme during one Parliament. However, I get the impression that the capital allocations mentioned this evening by the Minister do not meet the problems. They ignore the difficult new pressures, including AIDS, which face the institutions in our big cities.

The Government have not devoted anything like enough money to research into the prevention and cure of AIDS, nor have they devoted enough money to the provision of the intensive nursing facilities that are required to deal with the effects of the virus. Not only do the staff at St. Mary's hospital at Paddington deserve much more recognition for their dedication and their work; they require extra resources.

The problems are enormous and are exacerbated by poor housing and bad social conditions. The method of funding must be changed to take account of the underlying important root causes of illness and poor health, especially as they affect the elderly. The provincial services must be allowed to improve, but not at the expense of the major London teaching hospitals, many of which carry out important research into the prevention of disease. The staff must be properly motivated and rewarded for their dedication. I was especially upset to hear the hon. Member for Halifax say that nurses are well rewarded. If one visited any hospital and suggested that this was the case, especially against the background of the past two years—

Mr. Galley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kirkwood: No, I do not have time.

Last year, the nurses' long overdue and meagre increase was phased, and this year three months' worth of their increase was sliced off the top. If the hon. Gentleman considers that to be proper treatment, he and I define the phrase differently.

The aging population, increasing specialisation in surgery, new viruses such as AIDS, the abuse of heroin and alcohol, and tobacco-related diseases have created demands on our big city hospitals. Community care, prevention and education also create extra demands for resources. The need for these resources is urgent, and action is necessary now—or the hospital system may collapse.

5.42 pm

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): First, I should take up a comment made by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). I was surprised that he did not give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) in comparing nurses' real take-home pay. My hon. Friend did not refer to this year's award. He compared their real take-home pay under the Labour Government with the current position.

It is not surprising that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) did not refer to the achievements or failures of the Labour Government. He was not a Member of Parliament at the time and did not, therefore, have to suffer the tidal wave of complaints, which some Opposition Members may recall, from constituents because the Labour Government cut the Health Service.

I wish to quote the Labour Member of the European Parliament who represents Greater Manchester, North who wrote in her diary:

"All things bright and beautiful,
All projects great and small,
All things wise and wonderful,
Denis Healey CUTS them all.
Healey cuts the Old Age Pension,
Although he cuts by stealth,
And when he looks for savings,
Healey cuts the National Health."

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) made a series of calculations which bear careful consideration because inflation can be calculated differently for different areas of the economy. The hon. Lady came to the conclusion that in the past three years there has been a standstill in expenditure on the National Health Service. A Labour Member's calculations have thus laid to rest her party's accusations that there have been cuts in the NHS. The word was "standstill", not "cuts". I disagree with some of her calculations, but at least she made them logically and carefully.

As far as I can recall, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras also rewrote history in the House. He was the first Labour Member who made any reference to or acknowledgement of the winter of discontent of 1978-79. It is worth considering hospital waiting lists, which the hon. Gentleman dealt with in substantial detail. He tried to cover up the changes in hospital waiting lists. The figures that he used were provided in a written answer of 18 April at columns 536-37. The latest hospital waiting list is 674,000 people. When we replaced the Labour Government in 1979, they left a waiting list of 752,000 people. Therefore, according to those statistics, the Government have reduced it by about 80,000. The hon. Gentleman made a series of calculations claiming them to be fiddled figures. In 1974, the Labour Government inherited a hospital waiting list of 508,000. They managed to add 50 per cent. to the waiting list in their five years of government.

Mr. Pavitt: The hon. Gentleman forgets the consultants' strike of 1974 and the junior hospital doctors' strike of 1975. The increase in the figures was due to the backlog caused by the strikes. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the winter of discontent, but when the doctors went on strike no one mentioned it. The Tory party supported the doctors.

Mr. Hayward: That intervention was absolutely fascinating, because—

Mr. Robert Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): It was truthful.

Mr. Hayward: It was not truthful. There was a reference to the dispute of 1974. In December 1973 the waiting list was 508,000, in June 1974 it was 508,000, and in December 1974 it was 517,000. That first dispute, which the hon. Gentleman tried to identify as one cause of the increase, had no impact on the figures. The Labour Government managed to increase hospital waiting lists during a period without disputes. When they had the opportunity to run the NHS as efficiently as possible, they increased hospital waiting lists by almost 25 per cent. That was the Labour party's achievement, which we inherited. They now try to massage the figures to suggest that we have not reduced the waiting lists.

The latest figure is 661,000. There has been a further progressive decrease in waiting lists—

Dr. Marek: They have been going up.

Mr. Hayward: The hon. Gentleman intervenes from a sedentary position with the comment, "They have been going up." The figures given to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, which he did not challenge in his speech, show that for each half year since 1983 there has been a decline in hospital waiting lists.

Dr. Marek: If the hon. Gentleman read the figures for the past four half-yearly periods, he would see that waiting lists have been increasing. It is all very well to take selective figures at certain periods, but the special circumstances explain them. The net effect since the Government took office is that waiting lists have increased.

Mr. Hayward: The waiting list went from 752,000 in March 1979 to 674,000 in March 1985. It is a fascinating juggling of figures. I wonder where the hon. Gentleman obtained his degree if that is what he calls "going up." By anyone's calculations, it is a reduction of 80,000.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras attempted to give me a geography lesson on Bristol. I wish he had not tried. I intervened and queried the issue of the hospital waiting lists. He said that I should know that three health authorities cover Bristol. I am well aware of that and I can name them Southmead, Frenchay and Bristol and Weston. When he produced his cumulative figure, he failed to identify the fact that they cover not only Bristol but five other parliamentary constituencies.

The hon. Gentleman went on to mention Wendover hospital which was closed three years ago. He said that the Government are trying to close it, so he is obviously not aware of the fact that it has already been closed. That hospital is not even in Bristol; it is in Kingswood. It is outside the city to which he thought he was referring.

Even if the waiting lists for Bristol and Frenchay are combined, which would cover most of the city, the totals have gone down. The investment in the health authority is visible for anyone to see. The right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) made an intervention, if the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) can remember. The right hon. Gentleman referred to investment in the Bristol Royal infirmary and the Bristol eye hospital, both of which are university teaching hospitals, in which several million pounds have been invested. I believe that there is £4 million of investment in the Bristol eye hospital. Frenchay hospital, which is the other major general hospital on the eastern side of the city, has just announced phase one of a redevelopment programme, involving investment of £6 million, which will serve the eastern side of the city. There are not only those investments, but the continuing construction of the Weston hospital, which is a major new general hospital, and investments in smaller projects such as—

Dr. Marek: In The Guardian on 3 June 1986 there was an article which began:

"Most medical schools face budget deficits of between 2 and 11 per cent next year because of Government cuts, the British Medical Association said yesterday."

If that is the case and the hon. Gentleman's area is not having those cuts, I suggest that it is at the expense of even greater cuts almost everwhere else in the country.

Mr. Hayward: I was referring to capital expenditure, which was a point made in the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. The hon. Gentleman attempted to deny that capital expenditure was taking place. I was identifying investments of substantial size within Bristol and the immediate area.

If one looks at smaller projects, there are investments in major health centres, such as Cadbury Heath, and a new ambulance station at Sandwell. Projects of that type are going on all the time and are part of a major improvement in the Health Service which did not take place under the previous Labour Government.

I should like to raise one or two specific points which relate to my constituency. We have heard a number of contributions relating, quite reasonably, to the problems of the resource allocation working party. The right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) identified extremely well the problems faced by the provinces. We all know, if we are outside the main home counties, that there has been a gross imbalance, and it is not right that that should continue. It may be that RAWP has to be looked at to ensure that some of the anomalies identified by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) do not continue. However, it is not right that a constituent of mine can be told that he has to wait between 12 and 18 months for a heart bypass operation when, if he were in London, he would have to wait for only three months. We cannot continue to accept that.

Mr. Tony Banks: How long does the hon. Gentleman want him to wait?

Mr. Hayward: I would not want him to wait at all. There is a regional imbalance which we must recognise and resolve.

I deal now with expenditure in terms of management. There have been cases identified of odd or unnecessarily high expenditure. References have been made to linen contracts, catering contracts, and so on. People are still being asked to cut their services and to reduce the number of hours worked. At the same time they are asked what design of Laura Ashley wallpaper they should have in the wards around them. That is a gross misdirection of money, and we should address ourselves to such issues.

There is no doubt that the recent decision on nurses' pay has had a serious impact on morale. The award was intended to be over a full year. I think that all nurses and hon. Members of both sides will be extremely disappointed that it has not proved possible to make that award for the full year. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax said, the overall terms and conditions are improving and should continue to be improved.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I believe that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) spoke for every hon. Member. Anyone who has spent any time in the House can recall in some form or another the problems that he enunciated. I pay that tribute to him. It is the first time in 22 years that I have heard him make a constituency speech, and he spoke for hon. Members on both sides of the House.

In his opening speech the Minister placed great stress on the fact that they have reduced the rate of perinatal mortality and handicap. Hon. Members who have been here for some time will know that I fought that battle about 12 years ago. I take no great credit for it. It was brought to my notice by the Spastics Society which felt that, although it was caring for children with cerebral palsy, it should try to do something about prevention. James Loring of the Spastics Society started the campaign, and I suppose that I was the House of Commons postman. I delivered the parliamentary questions with the help of people such as Mary Holland, who is now the researcher for MENCAP, and Peter Mitchell, who is now the researcher for the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation. People gradually became aware of the problem. If one read all the reports on perinatal care and the prevention of disability from 1920, one would swear that the same man wrote every conclusion. The one thing that was common to them all was the need of special baby care units.

The perinatal mortality rate is down, but the Minister should not take too much credit for it because the campaign was started long ago. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) chaired the Select Committee which looked into neonatal care. One of the strange things that happened was that the Select Committee was allowed to take its evidence through from one Parliament to another. The Committee reported in 1979 and made the same observation — that we needed special baby care units and minimum standards of maternity care.

If the Minister wants to take credit for the decline in perinatal mortality, he must also take responsibility for the omissions. If special baby care units reduce perinatal mortality and, above all, reduce baby disabilities, then, in the long run, the Minister can save money. Imagine my feelings when I received a letter from two eminent pediatricians in my constituency at the Hope teaching hospital, men for whom I have the highest regard and who have great dedication, which said:

"In view of the Region's inability to support the modest capital development, we are unwilling to continue to accept the pressures which the provision of a Regional Neonatal Service entails and in the absence of a firm and early starting date for the proposed expansion, will be ceasing to accept neonatal referrals as of 1 July 1986."

If the Minister wants the credit he must face the reality. There is not a large sum of money involved and, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said when he talked about the problems of his constituency, that can be multiplied up and down the country. Special baby care units will reduce perinatal mortality and disability. In the short run, they will save considerable sums. If the Minister wants credit, he can have it. However, with the credit he must accept the responsibilty for Hope hospital unit and all the others involved.

Mr. Favell: Is it not a fact that as facilities improve elsewhere in the region, for example in my district of Stockport, there will be less demand for the excellent services given at Hope? Consequently, people will not come from Stockport to Hope, and there will be less demand there. Should not people cut back at Hope so that we can spread resources elsewhere?

Mr. Carter-Jones: I fear that the hon. Gentleman has missed the point. A special baby care unit cares for those in urgent need. One does not need a large multiplication of units. The units should be spread at reasonable distances so that the babies can be brought in quickly. If I had my way, part of the Royal Air Force helicopter training exercise would be to bring pregnant mothers quickly from distant places to the units. That is the key. We want more special baby care units, but they should be distributed so that they can be easily reached. That is the point. Indeed, I understand that there may be some developments in that area.

There is a distinct possibility that other hon. Members on both sides of the House wish to speak, so I shall be brief. Let me ask a few questions. There was a specially leaked news item in today's edition of The Guardian — [Interruption.] I am delighted that David Hencke got it right without the Minister having to be consulted.

Under the allocation of money to the Manchester area, and as Salford has teaching hospitals, will money be supplied to the Salford district health authority?

Ministers have given us a considerable lecture on Griffiths. Administrators from the outside world can bring great quality and skill to hospitals. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup had a thing or two to say about that. Will the Minister explain to hon. Members who represent constituencies in the north-west why the Department of Health and Social Security auditor has discovered that millions of pounds have not been spent on treating patients, paying nurses or looking after doctors, but have been wasted on buying a computer? The documents relating to the bids have not been discovered, according to up-to-date information from today's edition of the Daily Telegraph.

If people want to talk about care in the community, they should not pay lip service to it. If rehabilitation can be and is properly practised, they should make sure that those who are rehabilitated are not returned to the conditions that caused their ill health or suffering.

We talk about joint funding. This matter has been raised time and again with the Department. Mentally ill people from Prestwich hospital cannot be returned to the community because there are no facilities for them. That problem should be resolved. If we pay lip service to the concept of returning them to the community, but do not do so, that is no reason for running down the hospitals in which they have to stay. That should be borne in mind. If we are efficient in rehabilitating the elderly, as we are at Ladywell hospital in my constituency, we should not return them to the homes and conditions that caused the decline in their health.

I make one final plea for the regions. The Minister would do us all a favour if he had words with the Department of Education and Science about the way in which limited resources for the Medical Research Council are distributed. We are not morons in the outstations. All talent does not lie south of Cambridge, yet the Medical Research Council, in allocating its resources, employs about 1,500 people south of Cambridge and 150 north of it. When I draw the line north of Cambridge, as a former RAF navigator, I can swing it sharply down to hit the coast somewhere near Bournemouth, so one can see that 1,500 researchers are employed by the MRC in the area on the line from Bournemouth to Cambridge whereas the rest of England has 150.

I ask the Minister to have discussions with his colleagues in the Department of Education and Science to find out whether there can be a fairer allocation to the inner city areas and teaching hospitals in the north-west, the north-east, the midlands and the south-west.

6.5 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) may have reservations about committing himself, when he is not well, to a service run by the Royal Air Force, but I am delighted to follow an hon. Member — the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) — whose aspiration is that large numbers of babies should begin their lives thanks to the benevolence of the RAF.

The public should understand some of the statistics that are bandied about in the House. What my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health said about the proportion of the gross domestic product devoted to the NHS having increased sharply since the Government came to office is not only true, but should be understood. The amount of money being spent on the NHS in real terms has also increased sharply since the Government came to office. Those are important refutations of the campaign of misrepresentation which the Opposition have sought to spread over the country to denigrate the Government's achievements. But, at the end of the day, the public will not be very interested in statistics. They will be interested in the realisation that the problems of the NHS are not just of the past so many years, but were endemic from the day the NHS was brought into being.

The real problem is that, out of 1,000 people, about 750 will show a symptom, and of them 250 may go to a doctor. Of that 250, about 10 may get into a hospital, and of that 10 one may end up in a teaching hospital. Yet it is the teaching hospitals, looking after that minute proportion of patients, which still dominate the NHS and the sympathy of the public.

The 15 teaching hospitals in London were all built within a cab ride of Harley street. That mix of interests persists and still distorts NHS provision. I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary whether the time has come for a serious look at whether the persistence with the special teaching districts should now be done away with.

I spent 12 years of my life working in Health Service administration and teaching in Scotland. There are no special teaching districts in Scotland. The Scots took a decision from the beginning that the NHS in Scotland would benefit greatly from the inclusion of those centres of excellence in the general body of the NHS. The time has come to look seriously at whether the continuance of those extraordinary survivors is to the benefit of the NHS as a whole. I want to see centres of excellence elsewhere in the country. It is wrong to allow the great consultants' dependency on their private practices to slow down or thwart the transfer of teaching from the great cities to places where people live now.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was grossly unfair to the Government in much of what he said. However, he was absolutely correct on one point: where there are modern, up-to-date facilities of the highest standard, it is lunacy to insist that very expensive technology should be placed in Victorian hospitals where standards of cleanliness make it more dangerous to go into hospital than to remain outside. We want centres of excellence in modern facilities in other places spread around the country. If the facilities were placed where it was convenient not for the consultants — as they are presently organised — but for the patients, the consultants would soon move to the equipment rather than the people to the consultants.

Why should the Medway health district—one of the health districts in my constituency—which still has only 77·2 per cent. of its entitlement under RAWP, despite the Government's real assistance to the district, lose £3 million a year ferrying patients from Medway to London, through heavy traffic, to receive treatment which ought to be available in the district and which the district is keen to provide?

It is bad economics, bad health care and bad policy for people to be treated in high-cost hospitals, in densely populated areas, when they could be perfectly well treated in places where accommodation and bed costs are cheaper and where the standard of living of the staff would be higher. I am in favour of a review of RAWP and I support the Government's amendment. However, that review should not under-estimate the facts. Medway's population is 326,000 and it received £42·9 million this year. Lewisham and North Southwark has a population of 318,000 but it will receive £101 million this year.

It is a grave disservice to the National Health Service for people to bandy about sums of money to imply that we are damaging the Health Service. We are beginning slowly to move facilities to where people live now. My hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner) and my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) will support me on that issue. However, in this I believe that my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and other hon. Members were correct: that there comes a time when re-cutting the cloth may provide a more fashionable garment, it also provides a very short garment. We must now try to close the gap between the proportion of gross domestic product spent on health by many of our overseas competitors and the proportion spent here. It is a great credit to the Government that we spend so much more than we used to spend, but we must spend more.

Finally, there is in the National Health Service, as there is in education or the social services, a real problem of presentation in public debate.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman means that people do not believe him.

Mr. Rowe: I do not suppose that people would believe the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), whether he were speaking on his feet or from a sedentary position.

I expect that all hon. Members know of consultants who are on nine elevenths contracts but who put in fewer hours than that and use their juniors to cover for them. We all know of general practitioners who work perfunctorily or who issue certificates or prescriptions irresponsibly. We all know that there is no establishment more tightly knit or more protective of its powers of patronage than the medical establishment. Yet when Governments, as the Government have courageously begun to do, begin to move against these abuses, the robbery of the public —

Mr. Dobson: If the hon. Gentleman is so impressed by the Government's moves against fiddling by consultants, does he approve of the change in the consultants' contracts which used to give them a 10 per cent. bonus for working 100 per cent. of their time in the National Health Service but which now gives the same bonus for working only 90 per cent. of their time in the Health Service?

Mr. Rowe: I think that it is absurd to give anyone a bonus for honouring his contract.

When we try to do something about abuse, it is not the villains who are put up to scream foul. The exemplary consultants and model GPs, of whom there are many, appear in the media to castigate the Government for interfering with the Health Service. As a result, every time that a change is mooted or a check on malpractice is introduced, the most conscientious, caring and manifestly admirable medical team is put up to argue against the alteration. By a sleight of hand, of which the medics are becoming increasingly the masters, they turn the argument into one of a devoted Health Service profession fighting for its life against a crude, unfeeling Government. That is balderdash in most cases. That is an attempt to con the public that any attempt by the Government to break open cosy cabals of incompetence is an assault on patient care.

The Government's record with the Health Service shows that the service is safe in our hands. I also believe that a great deal more can be done. There should be more resources for the Health Service, but I want to ensure that the increased resources do not go to bolster up Victorian distribution of resources when account should be taken of regions such as mine.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): On 27 January 1981, I had an Adjournment debate in which the former Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security conceded the argument for the necessity of concentrating the acute facilities in Bolton on one hospital site. It was estimated that the first phase of the hospital should start in 1984-85. Since then, the programme has consistently slipped. On 5 April this year, the regional planning team and the Bolton district team argued that a start could be made in 1988. However, within weeks, the programme was again held back for 18 months.

I would like to describe that programme to the House. It is disgraceful for any Government to allow this state of affairs to continue. The programme involves the main base for acute treatment in Bolton. The programme called for 148 acute beds in phase 1. The hospital is based on an old poor law hospital, and much of the facility must be demolished before the new facility is built. Of the 148 beds requested, 54 will replace beds in wards that will have to be demolished.

It was hoped that, with that provision, the children's facility would be allocated on one site and that was extremely necessary. It was also argued that the positioning of the accident and emergency unit on the same site as the medical emergency unit would use nursing power and medical resources to the best effect.

At present there are no day beds on the main site. It was proposed that phase 1 should provide 17. It is an outstanding disgrace that there are no intensive care beds on the site of the main hospital in Bolton. Eight were to be provided under phase 1, which would still have been five fewer than the number required. Phase 1 also provided that, as six coronary care beds would be lost through demolition and other factors, eight such beds should be included. X-ray facilities are extemely important. Concern has been expressed by consultants and by the Health and Safety Executive about the facilities at Bolton. It is a disgrace that the chest X-ray machine dates from 1956 and cannot be maintained even by the manufacturers after December this year.

Those are some of the problems that we have faced as a result of the holding back of the new facilities. An increasing worry is the lack of confidence among medical staff about whether phase 1 will ever take place. Consultants are being encouraged to leave the authority area due to lack of resources and facilities. Under phase 1 it was hoped to locate the department dealing with AIDS in buildings now occupied by the Bolton Royal Infirmary. At present, it is accommodated in the basement of a building leased from the local authority. The incidence of AIDS is increasing, especially in inner-city areas, and we are lucky to have people of reputation dealing with it in Bolton, but how can we attract consultants of stature if we fail to plough in the resources needed to maintain this essential service?

The district authority told me this morning that, due to the 18-month delay on phase 1, necessary holding measures must include an ophthalmic theatre adjoining Kitchener ward at the royal infirmary at a cost of £80,000. That would normally have been encompassed in phase 1. The refurbishing of D block at Bolton general hospital covering four wards will cost £600,000. There is also a need to create a dental laboratory. Without this we shall lose royal college registrar status and the ability to take postgraduate students. The total cost of holding operations necessitated by the delay is between £830,000 and £1 million. That is not good bookkeeping, even for a Government and a regional authority who seem to put money before patients. The essential point is not the increased amount spent but the amount required to be spent to meet need. Human suffering and medical need cannot be categorised in terms of a balance sheet.

I challenge the Minister to come to Bolton with me and to meet the district health authority and the consultants. Let us have a little less talk in the House and a little more meeting of minds where it is required. I hope that the Minister and the regional authority will see fit to create a system in which those who allocated money to the National Health Service must say whether they are members of private health schemes, which seem to be milking the Health Service dry in Bolton and elsewhere.

We are asking for health for the people of Bolton. Year after year we have been bottom of the regional allocations list. To judge from the Black report, Bolton is the best place to go if you want an early death. We require health for our people. I issue an outright challenge to the Minister to come to Bolton and defend his policy with the people who have to use the hospitals there, many of which are out-dated, lacking in facilities and with departments divided between two sites. We thought that we had convinced the previous Health Minister — now Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction — but the Government's appointees on the regional health authority clearly regard Bolton and its people as of no consequence. I hope that the Minister will accept this request on behalf of my constituents. Incidentally, the people of Bolton also elected two Tory Members. It might be in those Members' interests if the Minister came to Bolton and showed that he was not content merely to view our problems from afar.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): The National Health Service involves three main interest groups. First, the Government — by courtesy of the taxpayer — provide the wherewithal. The second is the 1,250,000 people who are employed by the Health Service. Thirdly, and most important, there are the patients. We hear constantly from the Opposition about the crisis in the National Health Service, but for which of the three groups is there a crisis? We have heard from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health that the vast majority of people — about nine tenths — are satisfied with the Health Service.

Mr. Tony Banks: Has the hon. Gentleman seen the advertisement on the front page of The Guardian today? It says:

"You may well be waiting months — even years — for non-urgent treatment under the National Health Service. Simply because it is over-stretched and can't cope with the demands made upon it."

That came from Health First, a private medical aid company.

Mr. Favell: I heard about that advertisement, although I did not read it. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will deal with that. I shall have something to say about waiting lists in due course.

Some people are of course dissatisfied with the National Health Service, but they are very rarely dissatisfied with the treatment that they receive. They are dissatisfied at having to wait for it. Waiting lists have been reduced since the Government came to power and since the winter of discontent, but there is still much to be done. More often that not, however, extra money is not the answer. There are wide variations in waiting lists between districts, often with identical resources. Why should that be? I shall return to that, too, later in my speech.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman does not have that long.

Mr. Favell: I have three or four minutes.

If the patients do not recognise a crisis in the National Health Service, is there a crisis for the Government? There will be a crisis for the Government if I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health is listening if we do not get our message right. We have a good message, and a good record since 1979. Even the Shadow Chancellor does not dispute that there are 58,000 more nurses, 10,000 more doctors and dentists, and 73,000 more in-patients and 3 million more out-patients being treated. That is all very good news. Moreover, spending has risen by one fifth since 1979.

Mr. Banks: Why does the Prime Minister go private, then?

Mr. Favell: I have mentioned the patients and the Government. What of the 1,250,000 employees? Are they satisfied? Clearly Mr. Victor Paige was not, because he resigned. Mr. Freddie Lucas, the central Birmingham district health authority general manager, resigned following his one and only report to his health authority because he had been rendered impotent by politically motivated pseudo-general managers. He listed a number of improvements which he wanted to make to the authority. He pointed out that there was an £80,000 taxi bill, that £52,000 was paid for 100 private telephone lines which bypassed the switchboards, that £500,000 was being spent on a sterile fluids production unit which had not been in use for two years, and that £5,500 was being spent on a mural. What was the result? He got the elbow.

Many people in the NHS are absolutely appalled by such reports. They want to see, not waste, but money put to good use. They realise that, when money is wasted, lives are lost. Mr. Lucas also pointed out that a private company, admittedly an American company, which had to operate at a profit could build a psychiatric hospital at almost exactly half the cost which the health authority could, and give identical service. Dedicated people in the NHS are appalled at that news. They want money to be directed to saving patients' lives.

It is a question not merely of spending more money, but of making better use of resources, and many people know that. Many people can contribute to saving resources. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) criticised consultants — and, indeed, many deserve criticism. They should examine exactly what they do. When they have a long waiting list, do they refer patients to colleagues who do not? Recently I came across two orthopaedic surgeons operating in the same district health authority, one of whom had a waiting list of almost a year and the other who had none whatever.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): There may be a reason for that.

Mr. Favell: There may be a reason, but the orthopaedic surgeon without a waiting list was highly popular with his patients, and highly unpopular with his colleagues.

Do consultants consider referring patients to other parts of the region which have shorter waiting lists, as they are entitled to do? People can even go to Scotland. As my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) knows, 25 per cent. more resources are available to the Scottish Office and the waiting lists are not so long in Scotland. Why should people not be referred there or to other parts of England?

General practitioners should ensure that patients are referred to consultants who do not have long waiting lists, and when consultants have long waiting lists they should consider how much time they spend on committees, how often they attend conferences and how often they deliver papers.

Are nursing sisters looking to see where savings can be made on wards? Do they find out whether there are empty beds? Are they ensuring that consultants make full use of the beds available, and that half of them are not standing empty? Do they ensure that nurses are not hanging around because consultants have not referred patients to beds as they should?

Last week I visited a kidney dialysis unit in Carmarthen which is operated by private enterprise. The patients there were highly delighted and the district health authority was also highly delighted because the number of kidney patients going without treatment in Wales has been reduced substantially since that unit opened. The Government should also be delighted because those patients are being treated at £12,000 a year each, whereas in the Yorkshire regional health authority, for example, it costs £16,320 a year each.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Favell: No. I must finish in just two minutes.

Why are those savings being achieved in the private sector and not in the NHS?

Mr. Tony Banks: The private sector does not have the same costs.

Mr. Favell: The reason is that the private sector minimises its administrative overheads and has flexible staffing patterns. The NHS should offer that sort of service. Then there would be no private sector to talk about and Opposition Members would have nothing to bleat about. Many people within the NHS, indeed the vast majority, wish to offer that sort of service. They know that saving money saves lives, as has been proved during the past two years by that wonderful kidney dialysis service introduced in Wales.

The NHS exists for patients. It does not exist for those who work in it, as is recognised by 999 out of each 1,000 people who work there.

6.34 pm

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): In the presence of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), I should like to repeat what has been said on many occasions during his absence. On one historic occasion a voice below the Gangway said "Speak for Britain." The right hon. Gentleman need not have apologised for speaking about his constituency, because it reflected what is happening in almost all constituencies. The House is grateful for his contribution which has been the most important in the debate so far. It epitomised the problem in all constituencies.

To apply a commercial bureaucratic mind to the NHS is crass stupidity and complete nonsense. Neither the Minister nor the Department realise that there are inter-relations between big city hospitals and others, between departments within hospitals, between medicine and surgery, and between community medicine and hospitals. The Department is compartmentalising each sector so that it is considered separately. As a result, all sectors, including teaching hospitals and their relationship with district general hospitals, are being eroded to such an extent that there is chaos on admissions.

The rationalisation that is going on applies to industry, but not to the NHS. If a department or a ward in a teaching hospital or if a geriatric hospital is closed in my constituency two are facing closure it has an immediate effect on other hospitals. In industry one can close down two factories, sack some workers, produce fewer goods and make a profit. The object in the NHS is not merely to save money. One can save money only at patients' expense. At present health authorities are, in effect, selling furniture to pay the rent.

I am eternally grateful to Westminster hospital because it excised cancers from my wife and from me. It is now under threat from the salami-slicing attitudes of this Administration. They do not close a hospital. A chunk of a hospital is closed and then another chunk is closed. Westminster has already lost ophthalmology. I envy the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, for when he was fighting for the Brook cardiac unit, I was fighting for cardiac surgery at Westminster. I wish that I had taken lessons from him, because he won and I lost. Cardiac surgery was closed to save £100,000 but it has not been saved. This year's figures show that that money has again been paid for Westminster patients treated elsewhere.

The radiotherapy and oncology departments are now threatened with closure. That is the biggest nonsense under the sun. If those departments are closed, the hospital will close because patient diagnosis, haematology, pathology, diagnostic X-ray, general cancer surgery, and the department of medicine and nursing will be affected. I plead with the Minister to save those departments, especially as a new computerised cancer machine, costing £1,200,000, has just been installed. The concrete roof alone cost thousands. If that department is closed, what will be done with it? Will it be sold for scrap? That would be complete nonsense in terms of managerial efficiency.

Outer city areas, such as Bexley, affect the teaching hospitals. Recently a patient from Bexley wanted emergency treatment. Thirteen London hospitals were asked to take the admission and the last one, St. Bartholomew's, was able to admit the case. There has been a rationalisation of acute beds, but, as acute beds are closed in one area, they must be provided elsewhere. If there are no beds, the big city hospitals must find beds for emergencies.

There is a shortage of nurses. A number of letters from Hammersmith hospital and elsewhere has shown that acute beds are unoccupied, because of the shortage not of money but of nurses. I am sorry that I do not have more time to devote to that subject. The Middlesex hospital is likely to lose its nursing school and Bart's has 32 places for students which will be unfilled this year.

I know that the Minister never pays attention to newspaper reports, but will he deny the existence of a bonus for managers who close hospitals? Will he deny that the bonus rate for regional managers is £1,660 a year 5 per cent. of their salary and for district managers £3,160 a year for closing hospitals? The Government may think that the NHS is safe in their hands, but I hope that when the Minister replies he will refute that and say that it is just newspaper talk. For the Government to pay a premium for shutting down the NHS is even bigger nonsense than most of the other things that they have been doing in recent years.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): This has been an important debate, as has been evidenced by the number of hon. Members in the Chamber and by the number of those who have wanted to speak. I am sorry that several of my hon. Friends have been unable to make their important contributions to one of the vital aspects of the country's life.

I do not have much time, but I want to mention one or two points which have emerged from the debate.

Mr. Tony Banks: Take it all.

Dr. Marek: It would not be fair to take it all.

When the Minister replies, I would welcome it if he admitted that the 24 per cent. increase in money for the NHS is not what it seems and that there are differences between the NHS now and in 1979.

The Minister for Health said that we were getting older as a nation, that medical techniques were developing, and that just to stand still the NHS must have extra finance and resources. However, it is a great pity that the Minister did not continue that list and talk about the Clegg award. Five or six years ago the Labour Government were heavily criticised by the Conservative party for making resources available to the NHS in order to lift the morale of its workers. We were heavily criticised for setting up the Clegg pay review body, whose recommendations had to be implemented by the Conservative party in government. Five years later we hear nothing of that. The Government subsume those increases and take credit for them. The Government would never have implemented those recommendations if the previous Labour Administration had not organised them.

It is a great pity that the Minister said nothing about the huge increase in unemployment and the resulting extra sickness. I hope that next time he speaks he will put that right.

It is a pity that the Minister did not say that the medical retail prices index is much higher than the ordinary retail prices index. At certain parts in his speech the Minister talked in cash terms. A few months ago Government figures showed that hospital spending would rise by 6·7 per cent. this year when inflation would be only 4·5 per cent. The Government made great play of that. What had to be forced out of them was that half of that money had to be found by the health authorities themselves from greater efficiency in the use of resources. What type of arithmetic is that? The Government say that they are providing extra finance, but through the back door health authorities have to provide part of that finance from their own resources by extra efficiency and savings. If the Government challenge that, let the Minister say so when he replies so that it is on the record.

[Dr. Marek]

It is true that over the past year hospital waiting lists have gone down, but there was a huge increase between March 1982 and September 1982. I have a chart, which clearly cannot go into Hansard, but it shows that there was a sharp narrow plateau of high waiting lists during the winter of discontent — no one would want to get away from that — but since 1982 waiting lists have on average reached an unparalleled high level. [Interruption.] I have the figures here and hon. Members can see the plateau.

The hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) tried to pretend, using three selective figures, that waiting lists were low, but let us look at the figures. I quote from a pamphlet entitled "Health Expenditure in the UK," published by the Office of Health Economics. Let us look at the waiting lists per available bed for the years from 1975. I shall not be selective; I shall read them year by year. They are 1·4, 1·5, 1·5, 1·7, 1·8, 1·7 — that is in 1980, the first year of the Tory Administration — 1·7, 2·0, 1·9 and 2 for 1984. Those calculations show a high plateau in recent years.

What we can draw from that is that it is easy to prove one proposition or another with statistics. But the Government will never fool all the people all the time. My hon. Friends have given concrete examples of hospitals and wards that are closing and of patients who are being turfed out early. We have also heard that in responsible speeches from not one but many Conservative Members who are genuinely concerned about what is happening to the NHS.

If Ministers came down from their office blocks at the Elephant and Castle and went into hospitals and spoke to some of the people within the NHS, a different story might emerge. The Government stand condemned on their handling of the NHS not only by the House but by the public. I urge the House to pass the motion that has been tabled by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I start with two points of agreement with the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). First, it has been an important and interesting debate, and, secondly, it is important that Ministers with responsibility for health should visit hospitals. That is why I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health and I spend so much of our time visiting hospitals. My average at the moment is about three hospitals a week. I would be surprised if what we have heard this afternoon suggests that Labour Members visit hospitals.

Certainly, we welcome the debate and I hope that the Opposition will continue to give up their Supply days so that we can have more debates on the NHS for the opportunity that that will give us to nail the lies that Labour Members trail around the country. I also welcome the opportunity that the debate gives for us to pay tribute yet again to those who recorded such an impressive list of achievements in the steady development and modernisation of our Health Service.

It is entirely natural that parties in opposition should attack the Government's stewardship in most, if not all, areas of our national life. That is the stuff of democratic politics. It might even be expected of the Social Democratic and Liberal parties, although it has been a particular feature of the debate that not for a second has a member of the Social Democratic party been present and no doubt that is something that they will explain to the electorate. But even for the Social Democratic and Liberal parties it has been more difficult to justify this sort of attack on an intellectual basis when their main, and, indeed, most would say their only, stock in trade since their existence has been to suggest that they have somehow discovered a magic elixir which lifts them above the mere sordid dogfight of party politics. However, the harsh realities have now broken in.

I understand the sensitivity of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) in the absence of his former hon. Friends, given the present state of relations. But now that they accept the realities of party politics, they can indulge in the sort of parliamentary politics that we have seen among Labour Members and attack the NHS. If those attacks are to have any validity, two requirements must be fulfilled. First, the Opposition must be able to show that the Health Service is in decline. This they have manifestly failed to do either in this debate or elsewhere, and they have been unable to do so because the Health Service is now treating far more patients more effectively than it has ever done before, with better funding and better management. Secondly, they would need to offer some evidence that they would be able to achieve greater progress should the Health Service ever again come under their control.

Their record when in government both for the conduct of the economy and of the Health Service — and I refer to the record of the Labour party and the record of those absent friends the hon. Members of the Social Democratic party who cannot escape their share of responsibility for the failures before 1979 — leaves no room for optimism. They would have to show that they have discovered policies which would create an even stronger economic recovery than has been achieved under this Government, and thus produce an economy which could divert still more resources than we are diverting to the National Health Service. For the Opposition to seek to make such claims would be an unusually sick joke even by the extraordinary standards of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and his happy plans to increase public spending by no less than £24 billion.

My right hon. Friend the Minister has already effectively reminded us of the sorry record when Labour and the present Social Democrat leadership were last in office. Health expenditure then represented only 5·3 per cent of the national income, whereas now it is 6 per cent.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Minister has not yet answered a single question.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire spoke for 10 minutes demanding more expenditure and giving no answers. He spoke about the need to deal with AIDS and totally ignored our expenditure on that illness. Under the policies of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues in the Social Democratic party when it sustained the Labour party in office 5·3 per cent. of the national income was spent on health care. We are spending 6 per cent. on health care. If the hon. Gentleman does not think that 6 per cent. is enough, how much does he suggest should be spent and how much will his party produce? The policies advocated by the Opposition parties would take us straight back down the inflationary spiral from which we have so painfully but successfully recovered, and they would destroy all hope of funding the National Health Service in the way in which, no doubt, all of us wish to see it funded.

Given such unconvincing Opposition parties, we must look for other and perhaps more substantial causes for the concern which undoubtedly exists among many people about the state of the National Health Service. Certainly there are pressures, most if not all of which are also being suffered by other countries. The acknowledgement of these pressures seemed to come as some surprise to the hon. Member for Wrexham. My right hon. Friend the Minister made a point which we consistently recognise: that an ageing population makes greatly increased calls on the medical services. There is also the pressure of medical advance with its new and costly techniques which are providing great improvements in patient care.

As services develop and expand, expectations and aspirations increase even faster, putting the Health Service under still more pressure. For example, total hip replacements in England increased from just over 18,000 in 1979 to 25,500 in 1984, and more elderly people now hope and expect to receive this treatment. Priority has been given to new treatments for life threatening diseases. For example, the number of patients receiving kidney treatment has risen from 5,400 in 1978 to over 11,000 in 1984 in the United Kingdom. Understandably, this creates new demands on doctors and patients alike and waiting lists grow for treatments which were simply not available a few years ago. Set against the overall decline in waiting lists, that is an impressive record.

Most of the pressures are to be welcomed as manifestations of a successful Health Service, but they have to be set against financial realities from which no one can escape. That is a proposition which Opposition parties often seem determined to ignore or not to comprehend. There are also the pressures of pay settlements in the NHS. Like other employers, the Health Service needs to ensure that the pay of its staff is sufficient and rewards hard work and merit. The pay of nurses has risen by a third above the rate of inflation since 1979. Like other employers, the NHS cannot cast aside the responsibility for funding settlements and give carte blanche to the negotiators. But we have this year provided a 6·7 per cent. increase in NHS funding, against an inflation rate which is now much less than half that, and have just announced a further £50 million to help with the impact of the review bodies' pay award for doctors, nurses and others.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry, I have no time.

Mr. Kirkwood: If the Minister will not answer me, perhaps he will reply to his right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath).

Mr. Whitney: If the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will allow me, I shall go on to speak about that. Problems about funding health services are not specific to the United Kingdom, but we do have specific problems about the cities. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said, there are certainly problems, as my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health has recognised, in connection with the impact of the RAWP formula.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was unable to be in the Chamber during the speech of our hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) but I hope that he will consider the points that our hon. Friend made, because in the time available I shall not be able to go into those in detail. The points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent about the impact on the health services in the south-east Kent region are worthy of my right hon. Friend's consideration.

The Government have accepted the need for a review of the operation of RAWP within the general framework of RAWP principles, but it is important to understand that we must continue to apply discipline. I recognise that some of the features that have developed in Bexley are unfortunate, but some of them have been coming for two or three years and some of them can be attributed to a failure to come to grips with the problem. Bexley's record and the record of other health authorities on competitive tendering suggests that more could be done.

Mr. Heath: It is acknowledged in my hon. Friend's Department and outside that the services which I described in my constituency are way above the national average and have increased in efficiency. We are closing down the most modern facilities in the south of England. That is nonsense and what reason can my hon. Friend give for doing that?

Mr. Whitney: The services are constantly being improved.

Mr. Heath: They are being closed down.

Mr. Whitney: The resources are constantly increasing. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup should bear in mind the new facilities that are being created. If he does that, he will understand that Health Service resources are being wisely used. My right hon. Friend suggests that the 6·2 per cent. of GNP which we devote to Health Services should be increased to 8·5 per cent. That is the inference of what he said, and that would imply spending about £7 billion or £8 billion more.

Nothing that I or my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health have said should be misrepresented or misunderstood as an assertion that the Government are satisfied with the present state of the NHS. However, we take pride in the substantial real increases in resources that we have been able to devote and generate Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House commends the Government on the increased resources it has made available for the National Health Service; congratulates the dedicated Health Service staff for their improved performance in delivering high quality health care; reaffirms the principle of equality of access to health care underlying the Government's resource allocation policy; and endorses the Government's decision to review the Resource Allocation Working Party formula under which the allocation of revenue funds is determined.

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee.

[Sir PAUL DEAN in the Chair]

7.13 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On a point of order, Sir Paul. We appreciate that, as always, the Chair has selected the amendments with great care, but is there any chance of debating amendment No. 47? The section referred to is the only one that deals with the common agricultural policy, and under section 25 of the Act there is a requirement on the Commission to bring forward proposals for a major change of the various funds, including agriculture funds. As that is a major issue, and there is to be no debate on any aspect of the CAP, despite the fact that it accounts for 70 per cent. of EEC expenditure, could we discuss either amendment No. 17 tabled by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) or amendment No. 47 tabled by me?

That would provide us with the only opportunity to make any reference to the CAP. As the proposal in article 23 of the Single European Act is fundamental, and instructs the Commission to make a major reappraisal of the CAP, a brief debate on that amendment would be helpful. I should make it clear that the amendments have been selected superbly. This is the only change that I would wish to make.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to that point or order, Sir Paul. I do not know whether you had the good fortune yesterday, as I did, to watch the tail end of the farming programme on television, but it revealed that the prognosis for agriculture is very gloomy indeed. I must support my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), because the farming community—and many of us have a lot of farms in our constituencies—would be somewhat outraged if this matter was not debated, as it is of great importance.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): I am sure that the Chairman of Ways and Means will wish to consider the points raised by the hon. Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). However, their points refer to matters that may arise later, and it is fairly unlikely that we shall reach that stage today. Nevertheless, I give an assurance, without any commitment, that the issue that they have raised will be considered.

7.15 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Sir Paul. I wish to raise a lengthier but important point of order regarding the long title and the potential selection of amendments thereto. I understand that the long title has four objectives: first, to add certain provisions in the Single European Act to the European Communities Act 1972; secondly, to extend the powers of the court; thirdly, to enlarge retrospectively the functions of the European Parliament; and, fourthly, to "approve the Single European Act". May I therefore assume that, apart from those objectives, the purpose of the Bill is to ratify the Single European Act treaty? Once Royal Assent is given, the House will be responsible for enacting any matter that is in the treaty but that is not being transferred into our domestic law by virtue of the Act.

If the purpose of the Bill is partly to endorse the totality of the Single European Act treaty, its scope encompasses anything that is directly relevant to the treaty. In Committee, we shall have to bear in mind whether anything has emerged after Second Reading that should change the minds of hon. Members on Third Reading. Whether one should vote in favour of giving the Bill a Third Reading thus depends on one's views on the merits of the treaty. The first article in the Single European Act treaty refers to the solemn declaration of European unity which was passed in Stuttgart in 1983. Indeed, that appears in the objectives of the preamble. Its terms do not appear directly anywhere in the treaty, although it is mentioned in the first article.However, when the Single European Bill was passed, Ministers put their signature to a decision at The Hague. Indeed, I think that the Minister of State was one of the signatories. It brought into effect another international treaty, known as the decision of the Ministers. That is printed in appendix B to the report of the Select Committee, published today. That international agreement runs parallel with the solemn declaration of European unity. Any comparison of the text will show that one gives effect to the other.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) tabled amendment No. 50 in order to add that decision treaty to the list of treaties covered by the European Communities Act 1972. Given the nature of that Act and the importance of the treaty that the Minister signed, one would have thought that it was highly relevant to the debate, as it is part and parcel of the execution of the legislation under discussion.

You have decided, Sir Paul, that the amendment should not be called at this stage. In view of the considerations that I have placed before you—I do not press my point too hard now—I ask you to examine what I have said. If my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) retables his amendment at another point in the Bill—perhaps at the end of clause 1, since it can sit at the end just as well as at the beginning—will you reconsider the selection of that amendment?

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Further to that point of order, Sir Paul. Since reference has been made to the Single European Act, may I inquire on a trivially simple point—is the Single European Act on the Table?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Yes, it is on the Table.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) for giving me notice of his point of order so that I was able to consider it. I can assure him that when the First Deputy Chairman made his selection earlier in the day he considered the point and he was satisfied that amendment No. 50 was out of order because it is outside the scope of the Bill.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's final point, if the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) cares to table an amendment, it will be considered carefully. Again, I shall be surprised if we reach that stage this evening.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful for that answer, Sir Paul. Perhaps you can help me once more. The point of order that I raised was of considerable significance to the purpose of the Bill in approving the Single European Act. If you can confirm that that is one of the purposes of the Bill, because the Single European Act itself requires constitutional ratification by the relevant national organisations, surely anything which bears upon the merits of that Act, particularly its context, must be in order so that we can discuss the matter and thoroughly explore the merits of the treaty.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I shall not try to deal with a hypothetical case. If amendments are tabled, they will, of course, be considered by the Chairman in the normal way.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Further to the point of order, Sir Paul. The Foreign Affairs Select Committee report, which was published recently, states in paragraph 11:

"Questions relating to the scope of the Bill, and consequently the admissibility of amendments at Committee and Report stage, are of course matters for the Chair in Committee and in the House."

Am I right to infer that the reason for the non-selection of my amendment No. 48, which seeks to state

"Nothing in this Act . . . shall derogate from the sovereignty of the Parliament of the United Kingdom", is that it is assumed that nothing in the Bill shall derogate from the sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament? Does the fact that my amendment was not selected mean that there is no question of that sovereignty being impaired?

The Second Deputy Chairman: The hon. Gentleman's amendment was not selected because it is outside the scope of the Bill and therefore out of order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to use his ingenuity when we discuss other amendments which have been selected for debate to make some of the comments that he was hoping to make on that amendment.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Further to the points of order, Sir Paul. In view of your ruling on the point raised by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), will references to the preamble, which has been shown to be of great importance and relevance in interpreting the Act by the Foreign Affairs Select Committee report, be in order in relation to the amendments that have been selected?

The Second Deputy Chairman: We had better see how we go. The selection is generous and covers a wide range of issues. I shall listen carefully to the debate and I shall allow the hon. Gentleman and any other hon. Members to say anything which is in order.

Mr. Marlow: Further to the point of of order, Sir Paul. I hope that my point of order will accelerate our business. The House of Lords has said that the power of the United Kingdom Parliament will be weakened by the Single European Act. It is referred to as the "Final Act". Some of my hon. Friends are worried that it might be the final solution to the powers of this Parliament. There is one possible safeguard—the Luxumbourg compromise, or the right of Her Majesty's Ministers, supported by this Parliament, to veto matters outside the interests of the United Kingdom and on fundamental issues of national interest. We are not sure where we stand with the veto.

The House of Lords Select Committee report believes that the Luxembourg compromise is not likely to be affected under the terms of the Single European Act. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister believes that it will be, and the Minister believes that the Luxembourg compromise is unchanged by the Act.

If we were persuaded by a statement from the Minister that the Luxembourg compromise was still healthy and hearty and could be used by Her Majesty's Government, it would make it much easier when considering later amendments to allay the concern felt by many hon. Members.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has already answered his own question. He said that he hoped that the Minister would be able to enlighten him. It is a matter for debate, not a matter of order for the Chair.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Sir Paul. I am suggesting that the Luxembourg compromise would apply throughout. I do not know when the Minister will make her remarks, but she certainly will not make them before the debate has begun and perhaps not until we reach the third or fourth group of amendments, because she might believe her remarks to be more apposite later. If the House could have the benefit of her remarks and the opportunity for cross-examination at an early stage, many of the points that right hon. and hon. Members might like to make would be no longer necessary.

The Second Deputy Chairman: This is a matter for the Minister, not for me.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I have three separate points of order. I have given notice to the Chairman of Ways and Means of a point of order which I shall seek to make later, since it does not relate to the first group of amendments. I shall also wish to raise a point of order when we come to the second group of amendments. I shall not go into detail now but I shall wait until the appropriate time.

I reinforce the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) about the need for an opportunity to debate article 23 of the Single European Act, which allows reference to the common agricultural policy and the structural fund. I realise that this matter is to be considered later, but it is important.

I accept the Chair's wisdom and discretion in the selection of amendments. Some of the amendments relate to the declarations which are part of the Final Act but not part of the Single European Act. I am aware that the Single European Act is covered by the long title and that the Final Act is not. Some of the declarations are linked with clauses in the Single European Act. If we were to pass the Single European Act without the declarations, it would be like having a dog and leaving the tail behind. A dog without a tail is not a pleasant sight.

If we did not embody in British law those declarations which are directly relevant and legally linked to articles in the Single European Act, we should do ourselves a disservice and an injustice. I shall give one example. On page 24 of the Single European Act it is stated:

"At the time of signing this text, the Conference"— that is, the conference of Heads of Government—

"adopted the declarations listed hereinafter and annexed to this Final Act."

Declaration No. 4 applies to article 100A of the EEC treaty. That declaration reads:

"In its proposals pursuant to Article 100A the Commission"— that is, the EEC Commission—

"shall give precedence to the use of the instrument of a directive if harmonization involves the amendment of legislative provisions in one or more Member States."

That is a clear statement of the way in which the Community is proposing to proceed on a matter which will affect the law of Britain if the Single European Act is passed as a result of the Bill.

I therefore put it to you, Sir Paul, that this matter should be considered again. I entirely appreciate that the declarations are not part of the Act and are not, therefore, prima facie covered by the long title. However, in view of the peculiar nature of this Single European Act and the fact that it is a dog with a tail that is outside it, I hope that further consideration will be given to that point.

7.30 pm

The Second Deputy Chairman: I gladly assure the hon. Gentleman, although without any commitment, that I am prepared to ensure that the points that he has raised are fully considered.

I now propose to call amendment No. 1, with which are grouped amendments Nos. 4 and 38 and the Question that clause 2 stand part.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): On a point of order, Sir Paul. You have indicated that the Question that clause 2 stand part is to be taken with the Questions on the other amendments that you mentioned by number. It is always unwise, Sir, to chance one's arm and say that any particular matter is unprecedented, but I think that I would be within the knowledge of the House in saying that it is unusual for the Chair to indicate in advance its intention not to allow a separate debate upon the Question that a clause stand part of a Bill.

I appreciate that the Chair has unrestricted discretion to do that, and to do so without cause shown, but I submit that the Chair decides that after having heard the debate, and only when satisfied as a result of that debate that it would be superfluous to debate the Question that a certain clause stand part. I hope, Sir Paul, that you will suspend judgment on the Question that clause 2 stand part until you or other incombents of the Chair have had the opportunity to hear the debate upon the other amendments. There is another Question that it might be convenient to put now, which relates to the grouping of amendment No. 4 with amendments Nos. 1 and 38. I submit that the subject matter of amendment No. 4, although concerned, like the other amendments, with the proposed new courts of justice, is essentially different in that amendment No. 4 creates a power of delegated legislation in the Council of Ministers. Perhaps more accurately, it creates a power of delegated treaty-making in the Council of Ministers. That is a matter of principle that is separate from the decision whether one or more additional courts should be set up under the provisions to which amendments Nos. 1 and 38 relate.

I submit that it would be advantageous and for the convenience of the Committee if it were permissible to take amendment No. 4 separately from the other amendments with which it is your proposal to group it.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his point of order, which has enabled me to consider the matter.

As the right hon. Gentleman said, there is a connection between all the groupings, and having reconsidered the matter I am not prepared to alter the selection. Of course, when we reach the appropriate time, if he wishes to have a separate vote on amendment No. 4 that will be sympathetically considered.

With regard to clause stand part, I fully understand the right hon. Gentleman's point. If it appears to the Chair that there has not been adequate debate on all the matters that come within clause 2, the position will certainly be reconsidered at the appropriate time.

Mr. Spearing: Further to that point of order, Sir Paul. The complexities of this point are considerable because, as I understand it, the base statute is the European Communities Act 1972 and the amending legislation is clause 2 of the Bill that we are discussing, which puts into effect at least one, two or even three parts of the Single European Act. In fact, the jurisdiction of the court to which the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) referred rests on no fewer than three principal pieces of treaty and primary legislation.

We may well have an exhaustive debate—although I hope not exhausting—on the principle of the court, but in the ensuing debates on the remainder of clause 1, and before we reach clause 2 stand part, issues may arise relating to the suitability and competence—even the wisdom—of the court in dealing with some of the issues that arise in that debate between now and then.

When we reach clause 2 stand part, I hope that it will be possible to put to you, Sir Paul, the possibility of having another, shorter debate on the points that have arisen, rather than having a straight vote in the order of sequence of events. I hope that I can have your assurance on that.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I thought that I had made it clear in answer to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that we can consider that point. Without giving any commitment, I can say that the Chair will be prepared to consider that matter when we reach the appropriate stage.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: On a point of order, Sir Paul. Am I interpreting correctly the notice in the name of the First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means, who has made specific mention of clause stand part only when it is taken in conjunction with amendments? In the provisional selection list there is no mention of a debate and vote on clause 3 stand part. That cannot possibly mean, can it, Sir Paul, that there will not be a debate and vote—I raise this point for the elucidation of the House—because it is not being taken in conjunction with any amendment, and so does not appear on the list? It is not the intention to go against the normal rules of Committee stage and not have a debate and vote, is it?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I can assure the hon. Gentleman and the Committee on that point. The only reason that clause 2 stand part appears on the selection list is that it was thought proper for it to be debated with other amendments. Of course, as the Committee well knows, the usual procedure is that, assuming that all the matters on a certain clause have not been discussed on the amendments, a debate is allowed on clause stand part.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I am most obliged, Sir Paul.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Sir Paul. Perhaps you could help me in anticipation. I notice that the second group of amendments has amendments to do with clause 1 and clause 3. Were you telling my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that there would be a debate on clause 1 stand part, that there would be a debate on clause 3 stand part and even, perhaps, on clause 4 stand part? Can you say at what stage those debates will take place?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I cannot guarantee that; it will depend on the course of the debate. When we have disposed of the amendments relating to a clause, the Chair then has to decide whether the whole of that clause has been fully aired and discussed. I cannot anticipate the decision of the Chair; we must wait until we reach that stage.

Mr. Dealkins: Further to that point of order, Sir Paul. It is an important point about clause 3, although I do not wish to raise it now because it does not arise until we reach the second grouping of amendments. However, on the more general principle, may I strongly emphasise that the amendments to clause 3, such as they are—there are about half a dozen, some of which are in my name—do not exhaust the possibilities of clause 3 and its serious implications for this House and the people of this country?

If one were not certain that there was to be a debate on clause 3 stand part, hon. Members—myself included—might be tempted to make rather lengthier speeches on the individual amendments on the basis that otherwise we would be deprived of the opportunity to make the general points of principle that do not arise on specific amendments.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I cannot anticipate that, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman realises. I understand what he is saying and when we have dealt with the amendments to clause 3, the Chair will consider sympathetically a request for a clause stand part debate. I think that he will appreciate that I cannot go further than that at this stage.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): On a point of order, Sir Paul. May I ask you two questions? I appreciate that the European Single Act encompasses many amendments to the treaty of Rome and to other treaties of the European Communities, but can we take it that these amendments are tabled for the purposes of the debate? Secondly, the Government have published a document which is of considerable relevance to the debate on the entire subject with which we are concerned this evening. They have produced a strategy document on behalf of themselves and the Governments of Ireland and Italy. This has been given some exposure in the press and apparently it outlines the Government's objectives during the presidency of the European Council, which Britain will take over in two weeks' time. That will be a subject of considerable substance during the debate on the Single Act.

Despite the fact that the document has been given press coverage, no copy of it has been deposited in the Library, nor is it available in the Vote Office. How are Members to assess the position of the European Council if we do not have available a document of such importance? As I understand it, it outlines the Government's major strategy during their presidency of the Council of Ministers. Can you help the Committee on whether the document can be made available before we start our consideration of the Bill?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I shall make inquiries about the document to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I remind the Committee that we are debating the Bill and the amendments to it. It will be much easier to judge what is in order and how we should proceed if we start the debate. It is a complicated Bill and there is a complicated series of amendments. I think that it will be appreciated that it would be most unwise of me to try to make judgments on hypothetical cases. Let us see how we get on.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): On a point of order, Sir Paul. There is no one in the Chamber who can match the length of service of that of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), but I ask you to assist the Committee further on the selection. In my short time in the House of Commons, I have never seen a selection by the Chair that states that certain amendments shall be discussed with a particular clause standing part of the Bill. I have never seen a selection which suggests that there should be a stand part debate in advance of the Committee considering the clause in question. Is it a precedent that the Chair shall decide that there will be a clause stand part debate before the Committee has engaged in debate on the amendments that are before it?

If I understand the selection which has been made of the groups of amendments, it is that the Committee is to consider whether clause 2 should stand part of the Bill before any possible debate, which would be in your discretion, Sir Paul, on whether clause 1 should stand part of the Bill.

The Second Deputy Chairman: I believe that there are precedents for the selection including a clause stand part debate. Its presence in the selection is intended merely to convey to the Committee that there is a strong connection between amendment No. 1 and clause 2. It is intended to guide and assist the Committee on the course of the first debate. I repeat my assurance that the fact that the clause stand part debate is grouped with the first batch of amendments will not prejudice the possibility, at the appropriate time, of a debate on whether clause 2 should stand part of the Bill, if the Chair judges that all the matters directly relevant to clause 2 have not been considered fully.

Mr. Gow: Further to that point of order, Sir Paul. I am most grateful for your ruling, but it may have occurred to you during these points of order that, although the inclusion in the first group of amendments of a clause stand part debate was intended to assist the Committee, it has resulted in some confusion.

The Second Deputy Chairman: If that is so, I apologise to the hon. Gentleman and to the Committee. I hope that I have clarified the position. The inclusion of the clause stand part debate in the first group of amendments was intended to be helpful to the Committee. There is a direct connection between amendment No. 1 and clause 2. As I have said, a further discussion on whether clause 2 should stand part of the Bill will not be prejudiced if that appears to be appropriate at the appropriate time.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Further to that point of order, Sir Paul. I am sure that the Committee has been completely reassured by your statement. I am sure also that no one doubts that you will not allow the Committee to miss an opportunity of having the fullest possible debate on whether clause 2 should stand part of the Bill and on the amendments. The concern of some of us is whether this procedure is creating a precedent. Surely it is unusual on a paper described as the provisional selection of amendments to incorporate a clause 2 stand part debate. You have said, Sir Paul, that this procedure is well precedented, but many of us would find it hard to remember when it was previously done. It would be a matter of general concern if a procedure were adopted — one intended undoubtedly to assist the Committee — and it were seen as a precedent that could be more widely used by other Chairmen in other circumstances, who might be less generous and concerned for the fullest possible debate than you are, Sir Paul.

I should like to know whether it is normal procedure to include a clause stand part debate with a list of amendments. If it is precedented, can we establish clearly that it is not expected to be a normal procedure that is to be widely adopted, which might cause great concern?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Each Bill is considered as a Bill. As I have said, there are precedents for a selection of this sort. I have made it clear more than once that the selection will not prejudice the Committee by denying it the opportunity of debating whether clause 2 should stand part of the Bill if, when we reach that stage, such a debate appears to be appropriate. I think that we should get on with the amendments.

Clause 1

Extended meaning of "the Treaties" and "the Community Treaties"

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert
'but not Article 4 of Chapter 1 thereof'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following: Amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 13, after 'Communities)', insert
'but not Article 12 thereof'.

Amendment No. 38, in clause 2, page 2, line 7, leave out 'any' and insert 'the'.

Clause 2 stand part.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to you, Sir Paul, for selecting the amendment. When hon. Members read it and what is obviously a vital Bill, they will wonder why they are bothering to discuss the amendment at all. The amendment addresses itself only to whether a new proposal in the Single European Act to set up some new courts in addition to the European Court of Justice should be incorporated in the European Communities Act 1972. It must be abundantly obvious to those who have read the amendment and the Bill that whether or not we incorporate such an amendment in British law will not make much difference. If something incorporated in European law is not incorporated in British law, it can still be upheld in the British courts as though it were incorporated in British law. It is sad that what will happen to this amendment will happen to all the other amendments.

We cannot amend the treaty, which has been signed on our behalf. It is open to us to reject it, and if we took that course we should have to wait and see what happened. I understand that, even if the House of Commons voted against the treaty, it would still be relevant and legally binding. That makes many of us wonder whether we have any rights whatsoever to scrutinise, debate and examine in detail any aspects of the important constitutional matter that is before us. That is disturbing.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is an expert on such matters. Surely he is aware that the institution of the treaty depends on ratification by all sovereign Parliaments in the Community.

Mr. Taylor: I accept that that is the pivot of ratification. I think that my hon. Friend, who is also knowledgeable on such matters, has established that laws which have been pressed by the Community in accordance with various provisions are implemented in national states irrespective of members' views. The point I am trying to make is that there is no way we can seek to amend the Act. There is no way we can take out one part and insert another. If the amendment secures nothing else, it will get across to hon. Members the simple fact that on this vital and important issue our powers of scrutiny and of amendment are virtually non-existent.

Mr. Spearing: Perhaps we can get straight a point I raised earlier on a point of order. Article 33 of the Single European Act treaty — I always call it that because it might get confused with a British Act of Parliament — states:

"1. This Act will be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in accordance with their respective constitutional requirements."

As I understand it, because of the peculiarly unwritten constitution of this country and the royal prerogative which the Minister of State signed — I do not know whether it was proper for her to do so as she is not a Privy Councillor — all the Committee is doing now is ratifying the Bill holus-bolus with amendment. The Government have said that the Bill, when it becomes law, will ratify the treaty. The hon. Gentleman is quite right in saying that we cannot amend the Act.

Mr. Taylor: I am trying to put across to hon. Members — I hope that they and the public appreciate it — that we can amend Acts on water charges, taxation, the rights of mothers to allowances, nitrates and water supplies, and so on. Our constituents can write to us and suggest changes; we can have meetings with Ministers; and we can put forward ideas and get things changed. Otherwise, our duty as Members of Parliament would be quite irrelevant. We would be wasting our time. We are dealing with a major Act which enormously changes Britain's rights and the rights of the British people, but there is no way in which we can amend one part or clause of it. We cannot take out a comma. There is nothing we can do, except reject it at the end of the day. I hope that people will appreciate, when we consider Common Market legislation and the form of such treaties, that Members of Parliament can do nothing, apart from saying no to the whole package.

It is appalling that we did not take part in discussions on what should be included in the treaty and what powers Britain should surrender to the Common Market. We have no power at all. If the Committee stage achieves anything, it will get across to the British people the simple fact that on such matters of detail Members of Parliament have no powers whatsoever.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a great responsibility on the media in this country to take note that this is a game not of draughts, but of chess. It may be a glazed-eye subject for some, but it is a matter of the greatest possible importance to our economic and industrial future. It would be helpful if they took it seriously and commented on it.

Mr. Taylor: I agree with my hon. Friend. There are signs that the British people are beginning to wake up to it. We have seen correspondence in The Times on what most newspapers regard as a dead subject. That comment has been helpful. Views have been expressed. People have said to me and to others, "Is that really true?". My hon. Friend had a superb article published in The Times this morning. It is quite clear that people are just beginning to wake up to the realities of the position.

Many other issues must be discussed. Sadly, all we can decide is whether the reference to a new European court should be put in British law. Obviously, it does not matter all that much. However, because of the kindness of the Chairman's selection and the way in which the short title has been drafted, we have the opportunity to ask the Government certain questions about the Bill. We have the right to make an amendment which would have strange consequences for the treaty. I hope that we can get across the basic point that my hon. Friend has rightly pressed. There is no doubt that the amendment will make people realise that there is a need to change the way in which important decisions are taken.

Some people say, "It does not matter very much. We are moving, step by step, towards the great European federation. It is going to happen anyway, and there is nothing much we can do about it." The British people are entitled to know where they are going and what is involved. I doubt whether Mr. Average in Britain knows what the Bill will do for him, for his rights and for the rights of his Member of Parliament to look after his interests.

The Bill proposes a new and additional European court of justice. We already have a court. The European Court of Justice was originally designed to interpret the treaty of Rome. Most people felt that that would be a basic and limited task. However, like all outside courts, once the court was set up its powers were extended enormously by its own decisions. Because of the volume of work, additional courts have been set up to deal with points of law and matters of first instance which are explained in the Single European Act.

One of the reasons for extending and creating a new court is to deal with additional work. The Act itself will impose a great deal of additional work on the court. [Interruption.] The Minister is shaking her head. Perhaps she means that the answer is no. She will save a great deal of time if she answers the question. A clause in the Single European Act places an obligation on member states to harmonise VAT, excise duties, and so on. In other words, we must harmonise, for the purposes of the completion of the Market, our rates of VAT and excise duty.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is it not a matter of harmonising not only rates but applicability?

Mr. Taylor: I was astonished, when I read a written answer, to ascertain that every Common Market country except Britain levies VAT on gas. Every Common Market country except Britain levies VAT on electricity. Every member state, except two, including Britain, puts VAT on food. If we harmonise on VAT, the people of Britain will have to pay VAT on gas, electricity and food.

When we have raised the question with the Government they have said, "Do not bother about that, because that is one of the few areas where we still have unanimity and limited power of veto." /Interruption./ The Minister is moving her head up and down. I think she means that the answer to that question is yes. It will save a great deal of time if the Minister answers whether, once the measure goes into the Single European Act and becomes part of the treaty, it is likely that the Commission, if it felt that our interpretation of harmonisation was not in accordance with the terms of the Single European Act, will initiate proceedings in the European Court and say, "Britain is not harmonising as we think it should in terms of the Single European Act". Is that possible?

The Minister has nodded twice. I shall give her the opportunity to say yes or no. Earlier I asked whether the court would be faced with additional work. Will the court be able to consider an application from the Commission that Britain is not harmonising? The Minister will save a great deal of time if she stands up and says, "No, it could not." I do not see any response from the Minister. She is not nodding her head sideways or up and down. She is looking straight ahead.

Therefore, I must consider that there is some doubt about the issue. My reading of it is absolutely clear. When the Bill becomes law, an enormous additional burden will be placed on the European Court, because it will have to consider applications to the Commission about whether member states are implementing various provisions. The harmonisation of VAT is only one.

8 pm

Mr. Marlow: No doubt my hon. Friend is aware of proposed article 99 under article 17 of the Single European Act. Referring to

"the harmonisation of legislation concerning turnover taxes, excise duties and other forms of indirect taxation," it states:

"The Council shall, acting unanimously".

Surely, if my hon. Friend the Minister of State were on the Council and her view was such that the Council was not unanimous, that should be the end of the matter. We should not, therefore, be confronted with a threat by the European Council.

Mr. Taylor: It was my understanding, on the basis of the Government's assurances, that that was the position. Having taken the best legal advice available to me, my reading of the treaty is that, if there was not unanimity and if Britain were out of step and the Commission took the view that Britain had not harmonised to the extent it thought was justified—even though our Chancellor or Prime Minister believed that we were doing as much as we should—the Commission could take us to the European Court.

Mr. Spearing: In raising the question of the jurisdiction of the court, the hon. Gentleman has perhaps ensured that the Minister gives us an answer to a question which will certainly arise later. My understanding is that directives passed in 1978, which related not to the Common Market but to the enforced harmonisation of VAT, would circumvent this provision, even if the Ministers were unanimous. If a case were taken to the European Court under those provisions, which were made many years ago, we would be told that we would have to harmonise. That is what the Government have been doing in the past few years on alcohol taxes.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman has raised a slightly different issue. He referred to the obligation of Ministers to act in that way. My argument is that, even if we did not agree and used our veto, the court would have the additional work of interpreting all these articles in the Single European Act. The Commission, or, so far as I understand it, the Leader of the Opposition, could take us to the European Court, saying that we were not truly implementing the various provisions of that legislation.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Does the hon. Gentleman recall the evidence given to the House of Lords Select Committee by the right hon. and learned Member for Dover (Mr. Rees)? He said that the harmonisation of VAT on take-away food had proved politically sensitive and that the Council of Ministers might not be a good institution to obtain that harmonisation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman suggested that the European Court would provide a far better vehicle. He gave the example of the infraction proceedings taken against the United Kingdom over the alcohol taxes. He explained that that was why Britain had held down the increase in duty on wine and increased the duty on beer. He said that, if there were a general principle in the basic EEC treaty, which there was, and the court were prepared to hand down judgments, as it was, that would be the best engine of progress for the harmonisation of VAT.

Mr. Taylor: We shall debate harmonisation of VAT later. My point concerns not harmonisation but the fact that the court interprets the treaty of Rome as it is now. Under this measure it will have extra points to interpret, and the Commission will be able to take action to force the United Kingdom to do things that this Parliament might not want it to do.

In some instances, we have the protection of veto on policy decisions, but we do not have that right on matters that are incorporated in the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that the law to which he refers is given legal force in the United Kingdom by section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972 and therefore has precedence over prior British law under the tag lex posterior derogat priori, which in effect means "If you do not do what we tell you to do, you will get a kick in the behind"?

Mr. Taylor: Yes. These Common Market debates used to be attended by one or two hon. Members who were obsessed about the subject. I welcome the fact that hon. Members with legal knowledge and experience, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), are waking up to the fact that something damaging and dangerous is happening. That is an encouraging sign. Those who read the splendid evidence by the chairman of GEC to the House of Lords Select Committee will appreciate that people in business and commerce are beginning to say, "Wait a minute. What is happening to our democracy and our rights as a nation?"

Will not this extra court have the job of interpreting additions to the treaty?

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my hon. Friend warn the business community that the courts in the EEC take a view about their powers that is very much wider than that taken by British courts? European courts often not only take into account what the mere statute or directive says but give it a gloss saying what they believe the EEC's policy is or should be.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend is right. People must appreciate that European courts differ totally from British courts. Our courts consider the law as it is. I refer, for example, to the recent case decided by the European Court on a matter relating to British Customs and Excise. Customs and Excise was adamant that it had taken certain powers in stopping the import of various goods. Customs and Excise went to the European Court confident that it could not lose, but it did.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) said, European courts take a different view from British courts. I shall give details of what was regarded by some as a flippant matter, although not by those who are concerned with the moral character of our nation. Customs and Excise took it upon itself to ban the import from Germany of rubber inflatable dolls used for purposes of sexual gratification. It took the view that it was entitled so to do.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Entitled so to do what?

Mr. Taylor: It took the view that it was entitled to block the import of those rubber inflatable dolls into the United Kingdom. A British company, Cohengate, took Customs and Excise to the European Court of Justice, which deliberated in great detail upon this matter. It decided that Customs and Excise had no such right. These dolls are now being imported.

Mr. Deakins: Surely there is a provision in the treaty of Rome, from way back in 1957, that a free market in goods does not take away from national Governments the right to prohibit imports on the grounds of "moral welfare" or some such words; I cannot remember the particular provision. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the court went against the spirit of that provision?

Mr. Taylor: It did not go against the spirit of the provision. The court said, "Customs and Excise has stopped these goods entering the United Kingdom through the provisions of the Obscene Publications Act. Although we accept that Customs and Excise based its judgment on what applied in the United Kingdom, the British obscene publications law is unclear. It refers merely to goods that are regarded as "offensive". It is not specific. Britain does not have a specific law that bans the manufacture or sale of those goods.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Were not those articles manufactured and on sale in the United Kingdom? Therefore, the court's ruling was that, until their manufacture or sale were banned in this country, it would be unreasonable to ban their importation.

Mr. Taylor: Indeed, I shall come to that point. I have a letter from the Solicitor-General which explains the matter in detail. I understand that it was nothing to do with manufacture in Britain. The court said that Britain did not have a specific law that prohibited the manufacture of that specified item. It had only the rather loosely worded Obscene Publications Act. The court said, "Unless you have a specific law that prevents the manufacture or sale of these items, it is wrong to prohibit their import."

I do not believe that people are fully aware that the European Court, which was set up to interpret the treaty of Rome — to determine what was right and wrong in that important treaty — is concerning itself with matters such as rubber inflatable dolls. That is only one of a series of examples which I could give in a wide area. The Minister will accept that the courts, like the other courts, have extended their jurisdiction because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford rightly said, they do not take the same view of the law as do the British courts.

Mr. Budgen: It is also because they refer to the treaty of Rome. The treaty does not give specific instances of what may be done in relation to rubber dolls; it speaks in terms of general principles. I could say for the sake of argument that the importation of rubber dolls is necessary to enhance free trade in the Community. It is almost impossible to anticipate the nature of any decision because the judges usually refer to wide but conflicting principles. They then take what is essentially a political decision in deciding which of those principles they prefer in the circumstances of a given case.

Mr. Taylor: I have no reason to try to trivialise the discussion. I shall mention one example which my hon. Friend may regard as most significant. Many of us will have received deputations at our surgeries recently

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Before the hon. Gentleman leaves that point, may I suggest that it is slightly bizarre that he should criticise the law on the continent or in other parts of Europe as being "different" from British law, when it is generally recognised that Scottish and continental law, being based on Roman law, has great similarities. The hon. Gentleman may have noted that when he represented Glasgow, Cathcart.

Mr. Taylor: I do not wish to become involved in Scottish law and English law. I am trying to develop an important point of principle. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who is always obsessively putting forward the merits of the Community, will at least accept that this is a valid point — and a point which his constituents in Inverness should be as worried about as my constituents in Southend.

Mr. Budgen: The hon. Gentleman raises a good point. Allowing the Scottish legal system to continue was a recognition that the two traditions were different and that they could not be satisfactorily mixed. The recognition of the separate tradition of the Scots was necessary. It would be much better if we could honestly recognise differences rather than fiddle and fudge along, as we do at present in relation to the EEC, pretending that their system is the same as ours.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. We must get back to the amendment. The hon. Gentleman is spending much time discussing the merits or demerits of the existing courts. I remind him that this amendment deals with new powers and new courts. I hope that he will come to that.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Sir Paul. Is it not necessary to discuss the law in the existing courts in the EEC before the House can decide whether it is wise to extend those courts and to extend the jurisdiction of that law?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I am prepared to allow some discussion on that, but it would not be in order to discuss at length and in detail the merits or demerits of the existing court. Mr. Teddy Taylor.

Mr. Taylor rose

Mr. Marlow: I am afraid that my hon. Friend seems to be seeing everything in an unfortunate vein. Everything seems to be against us today. My hon. Friend is rightly concerned with the moral aspects as a father of young children. If he looks at the back of the Single European Act, he will find under the general declaration of articles 13 to 19 of the Single European Act the following statement:

"Nothing in these provisions shall affect the right of Member States to take such measures as they consider necessary for the purpose of controlling immigration from third countries, and to combat terrorism, crime, the traffic in drugs and illicit trading in works of art and antiques."

If Her Majesty's Government were to make it a crime to trade in those commodities, the existing court, and perhaps the amended court, would have to prevent their import into the United Kingdom, because it would be a criminal offence to do so.

Mr. Taylor: I merely want to read out the following paragraph from a letter I received from the Solicitor-General:

"As to the conduct of the case, the Government have appeared and argued that the Customs authorities were entitled to act as they did. The Customs authorities, in all the three domestic courts which dealt with the case, and the United Kingdom Government before the European Court of Justice, argued strenuously that the import ban was compatible with Community law. Written observations were made to the European Court of Justice, and the Government were also represented at the oral hearing to reinforce their arguments. Unfortunately the Court of Justice came to the conclusion that the import prohibition is unlawful, although only to the extent I have outlined above."

8.15 pm

That extension of the power of the European Court provides us with two alternatives. We either do as provided in clause 2 and make more courts, or we say, "Hold on a minute. Let us try to find whether, by restricting the number of courts, we may put some restriction on the ever-increasing role of the court in deciding British issues, which should be decided by British courts." Most of us — I am sure you, too, Sir Paul — have received visits during the past few weeks from our constituents representing animal welfare. They are worried about something called the LD50 test; we try new drugs on a controlled group of animals, for example 100 monkeys or 100 rats, and stuff them with the drug until half of them die. Some people consider that to be a very distasteful test and they object to it. They ask hon. Members what we can do. I have seen a written answer from the Minister saying, "If we tried to ban this we would be taken to the European Court. It would be contrary to the Treaty of Rome to do so because it is a European law."

The European Court is extending its jurisdiction, not just into weighty matters of law between nations but into matters which are decided by domestic Parliaments or by domestic courts.

What will be the powers of the new court of first instance? We are told in the Single European Act that its powers will be related basically to points of law. I wish to ask the Minister about the wording of clause 2 of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, which puts no limit on the number of new courts. Clause 2(b) states:

"In sections 3(2) and (3) and 11(1) (which as regards the European Court, provide for judicial notice to be taken of its pronouncements, for proof of its judgments and orders, and for the trial and punishment of persons who in sworn evidence before it make statements which they know to be false or do not believe to be true)."

Is it the Government's intention to introduce an Act before Parliament which will give to the European Court the power to punish and try persons from the United Kingdom? If so, what is the range of the punishments? If they will be put in prison, to which prison will they go? I see, perhaps wrongly, in clause 2(b) a major extension of the court's jurisdiction, in that, in the court of first instance, it will be possible for persons to be tried and punished not by domestic courts, but by the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): My hon. Friend has made a strong case warning us about the problems of the extension of the powers of the court. I draw to his attention a warning which the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs has highlighted in its third report at paragraphs 12 to 14. It stated that, whether or not there is a change in the powers of the court, the preamble could lead to variations in the implementation of the treaty. That was a response to a specific request made by the Foreign Affairs Select Committee to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Since the preamble makes it clear in paragraph 2 that the work undertaken on the basis of the treaties establishing the European Communities and to transform relations as a whole among their states into a European union is an important element of the Single European Act, there is a strong danger, to which we should be alerted, that provision in the Act may be interpreted by the existing courts without any extension of its power along lines which are contrary to the views which Britain has hitherto expressed. Does my hon. Friend consider that that is a serious danger and would he invite my hon. Friend the Minister to give us some reassurance?

Mr. Budgen: We do not want reassurance. We want the truth.

Mr. Lawrence: There is no question of the preamble being interpreted by the court in terms of a European union when deciding any of the specific terms which would be contrary to the wishes of Parliament.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): The hon. Gentleman and his well rehearsed cast of supporting players are making our flesh creep miserably with tales of the horrors that will be perpetrated by the courts. Is the hon. Gentleman maintaining that a complex system such as the European Community can possibly be made to function to the benefit of the United Kingdom without an effective court and that the court of first instance is designed to make that court more effective? He makes our flesh creep with tales of inflatable dolls that will be imported. Were it a question of other countries seeking to prohibit imports of Scotch whisky on the ground that it was damaging to the health of their people I have no doubt that he would be taking a very different view about the necessity for the court to be able to police the operation of the treaty.

Mr. Taylor: If I was to get involved in discussions of that sort I would be here all night. It is my experience, which may be the result of prejudice, that we do not seem to do well when there are disputes. I can think of a local firm which is virtually being put out of business because of the way in which the inner German trade agreement was working. We have been to the Commission and the court time and again but it never seems to work to our advantage. That is another point.

Whether the court is fair or not is a matter of political judgment. My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) supports his view with great sincerity, but I am sure that he will appreciate that surely the people of Britain are entitled to know what is happening and that there is a huge increase in the kind of decisions

Mr. Butterfill rose

Mr. Taylor: Before I give way, will my hon. Friend confirm that he is not one of my supporting acts?

Mr. Butterfill: I am happy to confirm that I am not one of his supporting acts. I should like to correct what I think is a misunderstanding on his part with regard to the extension of the powers of the court for trial and punishment. I refer my hon. Friend to clause 2*(b)*. It seems that the European Court already has the power for the trial and punishment of persons who commit perjury, which is what this amounts to. The clause does nothing more than extend that existing power to any new court which may be attached to the European Court. Therefore, it is not a new power but merely an extension of an existing power.

Mr. Taylor: If my hon. Friend reads what I have said, he will see that I made exactly that point. The power is there in the treaty of Rome, but it is being extended to the court of first instance which we are told is dealing with issues subject to appeal on points of law. I am simply asking the Minister whether he can establish any grounds in which we are discussing points of law where there were justifications for the European Court to try to imprison any constituent of mine.

Mr. Cash: I may offer a slight ray of hope to my hon. Friend in relation to the interpretation of matters before the European Court. Contrary to the practice in the British courts where one may not seek in aid and construction of statutes the proceedings of this House involved, that rule of interpretation is not so strictly applied when it comes to the European courts. The question of whether the Minister may or may not make a statement with regard to the important matters which my hon. Friend has raised may, in due course, turn out to be more relevant than some hon. Members previously thought.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I hope that he is right.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has raised a new and serious point. My hon. Friend knows a lot about the details of European law. He knew enough to earn his living from it. He made the good point that in construing European legislation the judges look at what is said by Ministers or by persons in a political position. The European courts constantly take what are not really legal decisions but political decisions. Therefore, those of us who are sceptical of some of the wider principles set out in the treaty ought to realise that those wider principles are looked at as aids to the construing of legislation by European judges. It is essentially a political court. It is not a court in the narrow sense as we have come to understand our courts in this country. Therefore, although my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) glibly asks the Minister for reassurance, there can be no reassurance. It is essentially an alien system of law.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) made an important point, and I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West, who has left the Chamber, that he is not one of my supporting team. He referred to one of the possible extensions which was not, as far as I can see, referred to in the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. I do not know if my hon. and learned Friend has seen it but the wording used is like most international agreements. The Single European Act is prefaced by a preamble. According to the Foreign Office – who knows more about it than the Foreign Office? – the preamble is "'an integral part' of the Treaty 'but neither confers rights or creates obligations' . . . It nonetheless provides the 'context' the interpretation of the operative text, and thus could lead to variation in the implementation of the Treaty." In other words, even the preamble which refers to a commitment to European union could affect decisions before the new court and before the old court.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton is not one of my supporting cast and he has been a trusted and valuable supporter of the EEC throughout its existence. He is pointing out a real danger. First, we have a court which is extending its powers anyway, and we have plenty of examples of that. Secondly, it is extending its powers on European union through the preamble and, thirdly, it is extending its powers because it will have the task of implementing or adjudicating on the way in which member states are implementing the new Single Act, even if there is majority voting and unanimity. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will give us some guidance. Is the reason for the new court that we cannot cope because of those three specific items?

Mr. Lawrence: Before my hon. Friend goes on, I should like to confirm the correctness of what he said. I helped to draft the passage that he read out.

Mr. Taylor: Apart from the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), who has left the Chamber, there are few of what we might call obsessive Europeans in the House. I hope that those who are in that category, and there is only one present now, would take the view that there are people who have always supported the EEC and who want to see it be successful but who have been worried sick about the extent to which British sovereignty is being eroded by the existing court and by the new court which is being created.

Mr. Butterfill: On this occasion I hope to be helpful to my hon. Friend. I made the very point that he is now making with regard to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms which is contained in the preamble. It is sad that it should be contained in the preamble and I hope that the Government will take an early opportunity to deratify that convention because it seems that most of the political decisions which come out of European courts come not from the European Court which is attached to the treaty but from the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Taylor: I was certainly not referring to the European Court of Human Rights. It would not be in order for me to do that during the debate. If my hon. Friend is really concerned about parliamentary sovereignty he knows, as I do, that this was ratified for a further five years by a written answer in the House. The European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg has nothing to do with what we are discussing. It has nothing to do with the Bill and nothing to do with the Common Market. We agreed to join that once again for a period of five years by means of a written answer in the House.

What is disturbing me, and what I hope will disturb my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), is the fact that on issues of the sovereignty of Parliament and our people we have no effective control in the House of Commons. It is only now, I am glad to say, that a considerable number of hon. Members are starting to ask why we cannot have some say in the important decision making. I would be glad to join my hon. Friend and say that we should have some discussion about the Court of Human Rights. However, it is too late. We cannot do anything for another five years. I do not know whether my hon. Friend or I will survive the next election. Let us forget about the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg for five years. There is nothing we can do about it. Even if the House voted 629 votes to one to tear it to pieces it will still apply for five years. That decision was taken by written answer in the House. If that does not get us worried, what should?

8.30 pm

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend said that the decision that was conveyed to the House in a written answer about the European Court of Human Rights binds us for five years. I should like to draw his attention to the preamble to the Single European Act. Surely that binds us for ever.

Mr. Taylor: How right my hon. Friend is. Once it is ratified, the Single European Act is there for ever. I take the view that this is a dangerous and bad piece of legislation. The Minister, who has not been entirely helpful in this regard, may take the view that it is not a bad piece of legislation. She may say that we are looking for troubles where they do not exist. The fact is that none of us knows. The European Court will decide what the Single European Act does. It will not be the Government, me or other Members of Parliament. That will be decided by the European Court, which will interpret the new treaty.

Therefore, we must be careful and cautious before we give the court additional scope to do things and decide things. If we did not agree to the creation of the additional court, that would be a lesson to the European Court of Justice that we are getting just a bit worried about the extent to which it is extending its jurisdiction.

I should like to ask a few detailed questions in relation to the amendment. The first is: how many new staff will be employed by the court, and what will be the cost? That may be regarded as a silly and niggling question, but I do not regard it as such. The Commission is another great arm of the Common Market. Only today I asked how many people it employed in the year before the Conservatives came to power and how many people are now employed, bearing in mind the fact that we believe in reducing the number of civil servants. I received the astonishing information that the total number of persons employed by the Commission was 7,983 at that time, and is now 10,881 — a substantial increase in the number of persons employed.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): My hon. Friend is omitting to notice that there are now more members of the Community — Spain and Portugal. They have to have their interpreters and other staff.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend will appreciate that the figures that I was given were in 1 January 1986, which was round about the time when Spain and Portugal were joining the Community. I would not have thought that all the staff were in place on the day when the new members joined.

Mr. Deakins: In his answer from the Minister, did the hon. Gentleman get any information about the number of people currently employed in the European Court of Justice, and the number of people expected to be employed in a subsidiary court?

Mr. Taylor: That is the point on which I was hoping that the Minister would give us an answer. How many people are employed by the European Court of Justice? How many will be employed in the new courts? There will be not just one court. There will be one for the European Coal and Steel Community and one for the EEC. There will be at least two new courts. We want to know how many people will be employed and what the cost will be. I hope that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that it is not just one extra court. We have articles 4 and 11

Mr. Deakins: With respect, the hon. Gentleman has got it wrong. At least, I hope that he has. I should be appalled if he were right. One looks to the Minister for an answer. Surely there are three separate provisions in the Single European Act, altering each of the three basic treaties, because there are three basic treaties, each of which is supervised by the court. Therefore, the extra court would be merely one extra court for the European Court of Justice as a whole. There should not be three extra courts.

Mr. Taylor: That was my understanding when I first heard about it. I had heard the Minister talking about one extra court.

I see that the Bill does not refer to "an" extra court. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will look at it carefully. It says:

"decision of the European Court or any court attached thereto".

There are other references to "any court attached thereto". I should have thought that if there were one extra court, the Bill would say "the" court. In fact, one of my amendments says that.

Mr. Deakins: I seriously think that the hon. Gentleman got it wrong. Clause 2 mentions "the European Court". As I understand it, there is only one European Court, which regulates the affairs of the Communities under the provisions of the three basic treaties. All that we are being asked to approve — even that would be beyond what some of us want — is one extra court for the one existing European Court.

Mr. Taylor: I should like to think that that was so. If that was the answer, I should be satisfied. The hon. Gentleman has been bold enough to say that he is sure that I am wrong, but I hope that he will look at the Bill carefully. The wording is, "any court attached thereto". If we were to have one extra court, the Bill would have said "the court attached thereto", not "any court".

Mr. Spearing: It might be better to clarify this point straight away. As I understand it, my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) is right. There is a European Court of the European Community, covering the three treaties. It sits in several courts, in that it hears several cases at once, rather like our High Court in the Strand. The provisions set up a lower tier of the European Court, which may be in the plural. It may be an undefined number. That is what I understand the set up to be, which is much more serious than that even the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) envisaged.

Mr. Taylor: Indeed. I hope that I did not appear to be discourteous to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins), but I believe that he should look at the Bill more carefully. He is one of the most conscientious Members in looking into such matters. If he was right, the Bill would have said, "the European Court or the court attached thereto". But I understand that there will be several subsidiary courts. I may be wrong, but we have no information on the real position. I should like the Minister to tell me how many more there will be. Does the Council of Ministers have any control?

We know that the Council of Ministers is taking upon itself in a later article the power to amend the rules of the court. Is there any control of the staff costs and the numbers? Can the Minister give me an idea of what she would regard as a reasonable extra number of people, or a reasonable extra cost?

Mr. Marlow: Maybe I am seeing bogies where they do not exist. My hon. Friend has studied the matter more deeply than I have, but, as he says, clause 2 refers to "any court attached thereto". It may well be that the Bill is written in such a way at the moment so that it anticipates what might happen several years hence. With the Bill written as it is, is it not possible that at some stage a future United Kingdom Government could agree with its European partners that the British High Court could be a court subsidiary to the European Court, and part of that court?

Mr. Taylor: That may be done, but it is not relevant to the amendment. I am anxious to continue with my detailed questions.

My second detailed question is pretty fundamental. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister and her advisers will take note of it so that I can get a clear, specific reply.

Mr. Butterfill: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend. Article 32*d*(2) says:

> "The Council, following the procedure laid down in paragraph 1, shall determine the composition of that court and adopt the necessary adjustments and additional provisions to the Statute of the Court of Justice."

Does that not answer the questions that my hon. Friend was asking?

Mr. Taylor: It does not. I am concerned about the control over the number of people. My hon. Friend was referring to article 4. Let him turn over the page and look at article 11. There he will see another reference to a court and the EEC treaty. It is true that, under article 12, the Council has the power to fix the rules of the court—the rules of operation—but not, unfortunately, the numbers of people employed or the global cost. I should like to know who is controlling the cost of that operation. Is somebody somewhere saying, "We think a reasonable cost should be X, Y, or Z, and a reasonable number of staff is this."? Does the Court of Auditors have jurisdiction—I understand that it does not—over whether too many people are employed in the new court? I hope that the Minister will give me and my hon. Friend the answer. Who controls the numbers and the costs? Does somebody do it at some stage?

The next important issue that I would like my hon. Friend the Minister to clarify is whether the new court, which will deal with points of law and Community institutions, will have jurisdiction to implement judgments in so far as they apply to the various inherent parts of the Community. By those inherent parts I refer specifically to the European Assembly which we will have to call a European Parliament.

Mr. Deakins: There is no way that I will call it that.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Member for Walthamstow may say that he will not call it a Parliament, but I can assure him that it will legally be the European Parliament if the Bill is enacted and the Parliament ratified.

The Minister will be aware that one of the most interesting cases to come before the European Court of Justice recently was a decision by the court that the European Assembly or Parliament had paid out from British taxpayers' money a sum of £27,547,000 to political parties in Europe. That money was paid out illegally, without justification and was used for wrongful purposes. That is not my view; that was the decision of the European Court. The court said that it was a fiddle that £27 million of our taxpayers' money was filched by the so-called European Assembly or Parliament and handed out to political parties.

Bearing in mind the judgment that I have described, I expected something to happen. I have been peppering the Order Paper with questions to Ministers asking what has happened to the money. When will that money be paid back? The answer that I receive is that it is a matter for the European Parliament. The Minister may take that view, but who does the money belong to? I have plenty of constituents who find it difficult to pay their taxes and to get the money that they need for essential services. Like the constituencies of many other hon. Members, my constituency contains hospitals in which wards have been closed. Nothing sickens us more than to see money wasted. However, this money was not wasted; it was fraudulently used. That is the view of the European Court of Justice.

Why should we bother about the decisions of the European Court of Justice affecting us and jump to implement its decisions when nothing has happened after the court's ruling on the fraudulent use of our funds? I have asked the Minister what will happen to the money and if it will be returned to us. Nothing has happened, although we have been told that a committee of the so-called European Parliament is considering the matter.

Mr. Cash: As I tried to explain in my article in today's edition of The Times, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) referred, the European Parliament does not have an executive to which it can address questions which, in its turn, is accountable to an electorate. Therefore, when matters go before the European Parliament, we must not be misled into imagining that merely because a problem arises within the framework of the European Parliament—whether or not the Bill is enacted—the questions can be answered by Ministers who must answer them in a democratic assembly.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend has made a fair point. He has said that there is not much that we can do about the matter under the present set-up. However, we are considering a new set-up. The Government have said in many publications that the measure will improve the workings of the European Parliament, and presumably that means stopping the abuse of cash for fraudulent purposes.

Will the new court, in the first instance, have the power to take action over the fraudulent use of money by the European Parliament in relation to the use of 40 million ecu or the £27,547,000 at current exchange rates paid to European political parties? The new court will do many things to interfere with the decision making of individuals and Governments, but will it stop the scandal that I have referred to and, if not, why not?

My next question relates to article 12, which arises under the amendment. That gives the Council the power to change rules of jurisdiction. It also gives the Council of Ministers the power to amend the statute. That is a most unusual power to grant to the Council of Ministers. I may be told that I should not worry about this as it is simply a common term and rather like a regulation going through the House of Commons. However, what is covered by "rules" and "the statute"? Is it possible that article 4(12) would give the Council of Ministers the power to extend the jurisdiction of the court? We have already heard from the Foreign Office representatives appearing before the Select Committee that the preamble—which does not include any powers—will influence the European Court's decisions by making it have more regard to the concepts of European union. If we approve the measure, will we give the Council of Ministers the power to amend the rules in such a way as to extend the jurisdiction of the court? We must remember that we do not have any power over its actions at present. That is a fundamental point and we are entitled to a clear answer.

Sir Anthony Meyer: As I understand it, surely the Council must act unanimously. Does that not specifically enshrine a British veto on any application of the clause in the manner that my hon. Friend suggested?

8.45 pm

Mr. Taylor: Indeed, it may. A point of detail is involved and I hope that my hon. Friend was present when I raised it earlier. Although we hear much about veto, I hope that my hon. Friend will appreciate that the Single European Act will grant the court and not the Council the power to take decisions. There is a problem over the power of veto to protect us on the question of harmonising VAT. However, once the measure is passed, the court will make the decision.

My hon. Friend knows more than most hon. Members about the working of the Community. My hon. Friend will know that the Council of Ministers often works by horse trading. Often Ministers say that they will agree in one council if Ministers will agree on another matter in another council. That is natural with the constitution of the Community. It is inevitable that if we are desperately anxious to get something through the Council of Transport Ministers and the French are stopping us, but the French are anxious to get something through the Council of Health Ministers, we can—not openly—reach an arrangement. To that extent, the power of veto and a change in the rules does not provide the protection that I require. If there is to be a change in the rules, will that extend the Government's jurisdiction or powers?

Mr. Cash: This is an extremely important question. The problem sometimes arises in the context of our domestic legislation in the United Kingdom. Orders are sometimes made under what is known as the Henry VIII system whereby we are requested to agree to legislation which, by order, will enable us or a Minister to amend the provisions of an Act of Parliament. It is well known that that provision is deeply resisted by the House, because it is using a form of procedure that is appropriate to subordinate legislation to amend a substantive Act of Parliament.

I am worried about whether the provision that we are discussing does the same by giving the power to the Council. I should like to emphasise that, because the power is permissive and is conferred on the Council acting unanimously. That is a further restraint, and I concede that. None the less, that is a significant power that is granted to the Council to enable the provisions of title 3 of the statute to be changed when the proceedings before the House are being enacted in the present form because at present it would not be open to any order-making power to confer provisions in the same way.

Mr. Taylor: I am glad that my hon. Friend has brought his long legal experience to bear on this matter. He has confirmed my worry. The Council will be granted the power to amend title 3 of the statute. That is the power to change legislation and the Council will make that decision.

To supplement the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford, I should like to know what the rule changing involves. It can mean anything at all under article 12 because the rules under which the courts operate can be amended by the Council in any way that it thinks fit. Do we have any protection against such amendments changing the actual jurisdiction of the court?

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) suggested that there was nothing to worry about because there had to be unanimity in the Council, so we could veto any change in the powers of the court. Mention has been made of barter—"You agree this for us and we will agree that for you". Before this measure ever saw the light of day our Prime Minister said that it was unnecessary, as indeed it was. This massive constitutional change was agreed to by our Government and Prime Minister as a basis for barter. The rebate due to us was being obstructed and we agreed to this because we wanted to get our money back. Yet this is one of the most fundamental pieces of legislation to come before the House. As a result of that barter we have agreed to something in which we do not believe and which we do not regard as being of any use or interest to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Taylor: To follow that intervention would raise much wider issues than are covered by the amendment, but my hon. Friend is right in one respect. It is not this clause that will determine the power of the court. My fear is that the court will be able to determine its own jurisdiction and powers. We have already received a warning from the Foreign Office, of all places, about the danger of encroachment on British sovereignty by the EEC. The Foreign Office warned the Select Committee that even the mealy-mouthed preamble about European union would affect the context in which the European Court will make its decisions. If the Foreign Office is getting worried about the powers of the Common Market, it is time for all of us to put up the panic signals.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves article 3, perhaps he will tell us whether he has succeeded in finding title 3 and, if so, where he found it.

Mr. Taylor: Title 3 is in article 188 at the back of the EEC treaty. The Library found it for me. Right at the back there is a description of the powers of the European Court.

My fourth question to the Government is equally fundamental. Will any of the rule changes set out in article 12 be subject to the approval of the Parliaments of member states, or does the Council of Ministers have the right to act without reference to the United Kingdom Parliament? That is extremely important. The Government may say, "What does it matter about Parliament? We will get agreement to this, come what may." But there is a great deal to be said for bringing things before the House. At least it is a way of telling people what is happening. Those of us who have been here for a long tme may wonder whether our debates achieve very much, but at least they bring the issues before the people. If a fundamental rule change for the operation of the European Court of Justice is made at a meeting of the Council of Ministers in Brussels very few people in Britain will know anything about it, but if such changes have to be debated by the House of Commons and approved or rejected those who are expert in these matters will ensure that people know exactly what is going on. We may not change Government policy on that occasion, but the matter will be borne in mind for the future.

We were all here when the Government rushed through the big increase in VAT own resources. Some of the public were outraged at the huge increase in Common Market spending, but we did not manage to stop it. Nevertheless, as a result of the issues raised in that debate it would be very difficult, even with the help of the Foreign Office and the Treasury, to put through a further increase in VAT because people now have some idea what is going on. That is why it is so important that if there is to be a change in the rules of operation of the European Court under article 12 the approval of Parliament should be sought. Then at least we shall know what is going on and can bear it in mind if a further rule change comes up.

How often can rule changes be made? Clause 2 gives the impression that there is to be just one change, but my reading of the measure suggests that the Council of Ministers can make regular changes. Regular changes cannot be made without changing the powers and scope of the new court and, indeed, the existing court.

I do not know whether the Minister can answer my final question, but I hope that somebody can. Have the Government sought the views of the United Kingdom courts about the impact of the increased power of the European Court? The last thing that we want is for our courts to become involved in politics or controversy, but the correspondence in the press from learned barristers and QCs shows that the legal set-up in this country is getting worried about the increase in power and scope of the European Court. That worry will grow if the clause is passed allowing the setting up of additional courts in the European Court of Justice. I hope that someone somewhere is keeping in some kind of contact with the British courts and what they think. I do not mean what they think about their own rights and responsibilities. People are always anxious to hold on to their little bit of power and responsibility.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend talks of asking what our courts think, but they are now subordinate. They have no more right to say what they think than the corporal who is ordered to do something by his commanding officer.

Mr. Taylor: That is certainly true as things now stand. Our courts are clearly subject to the European Court of Justice, but only within the interpretation of the treaty of Rome. Another treaty is now being proposed under which our courts will be subordinate to the European Court. Surely it would be interesting to know what our courts think, not just in terms of their wishing to keep their little bit of power and authority but in terms of the rights of British people. Happily, I have never appeared before a court, but I have gained the impression that our courts are as much concerned with the rights of British people as with implementing justice, chasing crime, and so on. They are the guardians of the rights and liberties of the people. Our judges and others must have some views about this. I hope that the Government are consulting them because in this minor part of this very important new Bill I see a fundamental change, creating a whole new treaty and giving a new court power to implement that treaty in any way that it thinks fit.

I believe that this represents a huge diminution in the rights and obligations of the British people and in the right of Parliament and the British courts to protect them. It is wrong to suggest that things should never change, because things must change, but Britain has been marked by having a Parliament that can protect the people. We have a Parliament that has fought for justice and courts which have defended the freedom and liberties of our people. That was certainly eroded by the implementation of the treaty of Rome and the extension of the powers of the European Court of Justice. Before we take another major step forward towards a new additional treaty of Rome and new additional courts to implement points of law, we should stop and think whether it will make life better in any way and whether it will safeguard our freedom and liberty. To have these decisions made by foreign courts composed mainly of people whose experience of the law is in a wholly different tradition will simply take decision making further from the British people. Some people may say better and some may say worse, but their tradition is certainly not the same as ours. We should think extremely carefully.

I hope that hon. Members will probe the Government so that we can at least tell the British people what is happening. We may not stop it this time, but let us hope that by telling people what is going on and what has happened to their liberties and freedoms we shall at least stop a further grave mistake, such as the one which the Government are making tonight.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: It was an important constitutional event when you decided to call amendment No. 1, Sir Paul. It is no accident that the debate which the calling of that amendment initiated has exploded into a major constitutional discussion.

The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) would reduce by one the provisions of the Single European Act, which by this Bill are included in the definition of the treaties and the Community treaties in the European Communities Act 1972. I may be mistaken in my opinion that the Government have not introduced the Bill as a mere act of supererogation. It is not a superfluous act on their part to provide the House with something with which to amuse itself during the summer months. They would not have introduced the Bill if they had not considered that it was necessary to enable them to make the treaty which they have made to the implementation of the duties which they had undertaken in signing that treaty. We must presume that they have included in the Bill all those provisions of the Single European Act that are necessary to validate in effect in practice their adherence to that Act as a Government.

In international law and relations the Government have bound themselves to the observance of that instrument, but in order to be able to do so, consistently with the law of the United Kingdom — just as in 1972 in order to accede to the European Community they had to define those treaties and make provision through section 2 of the 1972 Act — they must now come before Parliament and ask it to include within that definition of the 1972 Act certain provisions of the Single European Act.

If the amendment is carried, it will remove one of those certain provisions which will no longer be understood when the terms "the treaties" and "the Community treaties" are construed in future. This is no laughing matter. Indeed, we are engaged in something similar to what has been occupying the United States Congress in discussing the extradition treaty which their Government had entered into but which their Government must ask the United Kingdom to alter by agreement, presumably, as Congress has declined to legislate on the domestic law of the United States in order to give effect to the agreement which had been reached between the two sovereign Governments.

If we decide to accept the amendment we shall remove one of those certain provisions, and the Government will need to notify the European Community that to this extent they will be unable to comply with the provisions of the Single European Act. Therefore, if hon. Members think that this matter can be allowed to go without a Division by any person who is serious about the constitutional powers of this House, I ask them to think again. When we consider this amendment we have power in our hands over the Government to limit the exercise of the treaty-making prerogative of the Crown.

With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I do not think that we are engaged in the business of ratification, although I am open to correction. Ratification is a different process altogether whereby the Government are assured of the general——

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): The treaty is a multilateral organisation, unlike the bilateral treaty between the United States and Britain that the right hon. Gentleman has described. Will he speculate about the practical consequences if we in the House were to vote in the sense that he suggests and every other member state were to decide to proceed to establish the new arrangement as proposed?

Mr. Powell: It will be interesting if the hon. Gentleman intervenes later to push that speculation further. I am concerned with the consequences upon the adherence of the United Kingdom to the Single European Act. The Government's view — this stands upon the face of the Bill — is that for the United Kingdom validity to assent to the Single European Act it is necessary for this and other provisions of that Act to be written into the law of the United Kingdom by means of this Bill.

It is an interesting speculation exactly how the Government would get themselves out of the scrape that would result, but it is a real scrape and it is no use the House saying that it has no control over the domestic consequences of the external commitments into which the Government enter.

I know that we are only permitted to allude by way of imperfect analogy to the European Court of Human Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights. Nevertheless, the House has, in effect, cocked a snook at the Convention on Human Rights, the Commission and the court by the decisions which it has come to in the face of Government proposals in the matter of corporal punishment. That is a bagatelle compared with what is happening here. We are at the heart of the matter. It would be valuable if the Minister, when she replies to the debate, could explain exactly what effects upon citizens subject to the law of the United Kingdom this provision will have if the provision is, as the Bill proposes, included in the definition in the 1972 Act.

What we are clearly doing is deciding on the application of a part of the Single European Act within this realm. Before the House decides whether to assent to that, it should be told clearly how those who in the United Kingdom are subject to the United Kingdom law will be affected by the provision which the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Southend, East will eliminate. I leave that there having put on record the fact that it is a solemn decision which we are about to take. If, when the question is put, there are tellers available, it will be no use hon. Members who do not go into the Lobby saying that they have no power to override the treaty-making prerogative of the Crown. They have, in so far as that treaty-making prerogative is exercised with a view to altering the rights of the citizen here inside the United Kingdom.

I turn from that to the kind of legislation that we are achieving if we allow the provision to be included in those definitions. That brings me to article 4—articles 4 and 12 cohere to a certain extent, but I refer to article 4 of the Single European Act to which we are assenting.

We are not assenting to article 4 in the way in which we assent to provisions of an Act of Parliament. Although, as I have already demonstrated, article 4 will have its consequences for the subjects of the Queen inside the realm, we are not altering the law; we are changing a provision in a treaty. But the effect of it is equivalent to the making of new law.

Let us see how we are going about our business. It is a very grim business that you will find, Mr. Armstrong, when one is engaged in legislation by way of treaty amendment rather than by making Bills and examining them in principle and in detail in both Houses of Parliament. I have done my best, as I am sure have hon. Members, to study article 4. We find immediately, as the hon. Member for Southend, East discovered, that we do not know whether we are assenting to the setting up of an additional court of the European Coal and Steel Community, as it happens, in article 4, or two courts, or any number of courts.

It is inconceivable that a Government would dare to bring to the House a piece of legislation to set up a court, and that when we had read the legislation we could not possibly decide whether it gave power to set up one or two courts or any number of courts. We gather from a verbal expression to which the amendment of the hon. Member for Southend, East draws attention that there is a possibility of a plurality of courts.

By legislating by an amendment of treaty we are legislating in a fog on matters of substantial importance. It is a matter of substantial importance whether we as members of the European Community have to support the bureaucracy and top-hamper of one court, two courts or an unlimited pullution of junior courts or courts attached to the European Court of Justice. [Interruption.] I do not know whether any hon. Member dissented or objected to my use of the term "pullution". It seems to me to be perfectly appropriate to a process of multiplication which may be within the terms of this Bill.

Mr. Marlow: The right hon. Gentleman has great experience of this issue. I should be grateful if he could tell me why this part of the final Act comes under provisions amending the treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community. Does this court have reference only to the European Coal and Steel Community or is it likely to have other effects? This is the final Act and the provisions of the final Act. The Bill is the Bill, and what is contained in that is the law of the land. The Bill could go rather wider than this final Act.

Mr. Powell: What fun this is. We are amending the law of the land by including in definitions in the European Communities Act 1972 various amendments of amendments, amendments by reference to parts of various treaties to which the United Kingdom is a party. It is not just legislation by reference: it is legislation by amendment of treaty by reference. That is what is happening and it produces some entertaining effects, one of which the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has drawn to our attention, namely, that one has to look at article 11 as well as article 4 in order to find out what is going on, in order to add courts under the treaty of Rome to courts under the European Coal and Steel Community.

Mr. Spearing: The right hon. Gentleman is helping the House enormously by unravelling the meaning of these many treaty articles relating to clause 2. We are still not sure whether the court is a single court in the sense of being at the level of a High Court which can pullulate different chambers of justices. Does the right hon. Gentleman not think it remarkable that any Government of Her Majesty the Queen, who has courts in Britain, should come to the House with an almost indigestible series of pieces of legal jargon and without an accompanying White Paper that expounds clearly that which is intended?

Mr. Powell: It could be that the clear exposition of what is intended would have been inconvenient, or is that an unworthy thought that entered my mind? I am glad to be assured that I am helping the House, and I assure the House that I am being helped by the different interjections, including the interjection by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). The hon. Gentleman raised a difficult point for a non-lawyer: when is a court not a court? Since he asks for it, my understanding of the matter is that a court can sit in different sections if it wants to, or if its rules permit that, but that that does not make additional courts in the way that we are providing for additional courts by this amendment of the treaty in article 4.

As I understand it — and any one of us could well be wrong — in article 4 we are creating something that is not a court of justice of the treaty of Rome, whether sitting in one piece or in different pieces, but a court subordinate to it in one particular, and additional to it in other respects. That is what I understand to be happening. What a predicament it is for us to discover when we are legislating — and we are legislating, though indirectly — that we have great difficulty in finding out on the face of the Bill what the legislation is possibly about. It is extraordinary for us to have a Bill that discloses none of the changes in the law that will be made if we accept the Bill.

9.15 pm

Mr. Spearing: The right hon. Gentleman appears to be saying, for the purposes of debate, that, for convenience, we should refer to the additional court as the lower European court. However, is not the right hon. Gentleman incorrect in saying that the lower European court is a subsidiary of what is known as "the Court of Justice"? Article 32d makes it clear that there is no appeal from the lower court to the "Court of Justice" in the way that we have an appeal to the House of Lords. There is only an appeal on a point of law. Therefore, while the lower court is a subsidiary court, it is not a subsidiary in the way that we understand that term in this country.

Mr. Powell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has construed correctly paragraph 1 of new article 32d in article 4 of the Single European Act. I want to leave that point after drawing attention to one other impermissible vagueness in what we are doing by making that amendment. The paragraph to which the hon. Gentleman referred mentions that are to come before the new court. So we are asked to assent to the setting up of these courts attached to the Court of Justice and they are to deal with

"certain classes of action or proceeding"

"certain classes of action or proceeding".

We are not told what

"certain classes of action or proceeding"

there are. No Government would dream of bringing before the House a Bill that left so substantial a matter so vague. That brings me directly to article 12.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: As this is meant to help people to go to the court, does the right hon. Gentleman, who has obviously studied the articles, know what is meant by a "natural" person who can go to the court? I have asked the Library, but it cannot find any trace of a definition in case law of "natural or legal persons" as opposed to an unnatural person.

Mr. Powell: Endeavouring to construe from the context, I read on and found a reference to and thought that perhaps they were the unnatural persons implicit in the wording to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Whether I am right or wrong and whether the hon. Gentleman's question is material or not, these are certainly matters that we would need to have cleared up if, in any proper legislative context, we were making new law, as we shall undoubtedly be making new law if we leave the Bill as it stands.

Mr. Budgen: Could it be that, because continental law is seen so much as the handmaiden of the executive, that, as we approached a united Europe and as such political doctrines as convergence require greater intervention and a more effective attitude of interference by the European court, so it is envisaged that further courts may need to be set up, including, for example, "the convergence court", rather as we have our own Restrictive Practices Court?

Mr. Powell: I see nothing in the wording that would exclude the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. I listened with great sympathy and agreement to earlier interventions by the hon. Gentleman on the radical difference in the concept of courts of justice within the framework of the EEC, and between the continental tradition and our own. Indeed, that is one of the grounds for my fundamental and instinctive detestation of the United Kindgom's adherence to the European Community. However, I am allowing hon. Members to tempt me into greater prolixity than I had intended, and so I shall hasten to article 12.

Mr. Marlow: I probably did not make my point clear the first time. I understand that article 4 enables the Community, through unanimity, to establish a supplementary court and to attach a further court to the European Court of Justice. But the Bill gives power to any courts established by the Community at any stage and at any later date. The Bill is therefore much wider than the European final Act.

Mr. Powell: I share the hon. Gentleman's alarm at the expression "any" in the Bill. Indeed, the hon. Member for Southend, East has tabled an amendment to remove it. That expression certainly implies a laxity of use of the power that we are conveying, and the possibility of a considerable multiplication of courts.

I must return to the subject of article 12. We have been greatly helped by the means of discovering where title III of the statute referred to in the new paragraph to be inserted in the treaty of Rome by means of article 12 is to be located. However, the trouble remains that we are creating a new kind of delegated legislation. We are delegating, admittedly under certain conditions, to the Council of Ministers the right not just to make European law — the Council of Ministers is undoubtedly the legislature of the Community as it stands—but to alter treaties. Therefore, it is a delegation of the right of legislation by the exercise of treaty-making power.

During our proceedings on the 1972 Bill I remarked that as a Tory I was tender of the royal prerogative but that it had never occurred to me that even a Conservative Government would introduce legislation to make possible legislation by prerogative. Of course, it is legislation by prerogative of treaty-making that is here being delegated. Thus we have the monstrosity of the delegation by this provision of a form of legislation which is incompatible with the principles and spirit of our constitution. For the sake of greater completeness we should no doubt have an amendment that moves out article 11 as well as article 4. But when the House is seized of this matter, I hope that it will recognise that it has in its hands, if only for a few hours, the power to reassert the sovereignty of the House as against the Government's use of the treaty-making prerogative of the Crown.

It is no small business that we are about in debating this amendment, and I hope that not only the debate but the outcome will be worthy of the magnitude of the issue.

Mr. Butterfill: My reading of the situation is somewhat different from that of other hon. Members. With my much briefer experience of the House, I am obviously loth to question the greater experience of other hon. Members, such as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell).

However, it would seem that we are not creating a new court. We are admittedly creating a subsidiary court, or possibly courts, but we are doing so only in accordance with the first paragraph of article 4 or 11, which lays down the circumstances in which those courts can be created, and gives the ground rules. Such a court can be created only at the request of the European Court of Justice, and then only after consulting the Commission and the European Parliament and by the unanimous resolution of the Council of Ministers.

The dangers of some amazing new court with amazing new powers emerging have been grossly over-stressed, because the court will not have new powers. It will not have any powers which are not possessed already by the European Court. The European Court interprets the treaties. The only new powers which any court, including the European Court, could have would be those which arose from changes in the treaties. We are considering the extent to which this legislation may amend those treaties.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend is wrong. The treaty does not envisage a static situation. It lays down a large number of principles—not all of which are consistent with each other — by which the European Community may proceed. My hon. Friend cannot, therefore, say that we are talking about the interpretation of the treaty at any one moment. We are discussing the interpretation of a living system of law.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I hope to deal with that later.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Butterfill: I am sorry, but I must continue. I shall give way later if I do not deal adequately with the point which my hon. Friend wishes to make.

We are concerned with the interpretation of the treaties and the extent to which they may themselves be living and changing. We must examine the contents of the Bill. We must consider the extent to which the Bill gives force of law to the Single European Act.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) gave the impression that we were being asked to approve the whole of the Single European Act. That does not seem to be so, on my reading of the Bill. I believe that the Bill gives approval only to parts of the Single European Act and then only for the purposes of section 6 of the European Assembly Elections Act 1978. That gives rise to a rather nice position.

Article 33 of the Single European Act states:

[Mr. Butterfill]

"The Act will enter into force on the first day of the month following that in which the instrument of ratification is deposited of the last Signatory State to fulfil that formality."

I am not sure how we formally ratify in that way. We certainly shall not be formally ratifying the Single European Act in that way this evening. If we do not ratify the Act in its totality in that way, possibly the Act will never come into force. The first day of the month following ratification might never arrive. Perhaps that is what the signatories to the Act intend.

This evening we are ratifying certain sections of that Act which are innocuous and fulfil a useful purpose—that of aiding the work of the European Court, of reducing the congestion which occurred as a result of the request to clarify the treaties and of providing for a subsidiary body to assist in the work of that court. To that extent, it is wholly——

9.30 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I am not a lawyer, but I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the long title and its final few words:

"approves the Single European Act".

Is that not what the debate is about this evening?

Mr. Butterfill: Of course those words are in the long title, and to that extent it would have been possible for the Bill to contain that provision, but it does not go that far. No clause, as far as I understand it, fulfils that function. The only clause that actually ratifies the Act in any way is clause 3(4), which does so in relation to the European Assembly Elections Act 1978.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: My hon. Friend disputed the proposition that the court was not entitled to a static system of legal exhortations, interdictions and arrangements, but only to a moving one. There is frequent reference in the Single European Act to the European Parliament, yet the original treaty does not provide for a European Parliament. If that is not absolute evidence of a development, however illegal, pray what can be?

Mr. Butterfill: My hon. Friend knows full well that he is talking about semantics——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: No, it is real.

Mr. Butterfill: The use of the words "European Assembly" has no real meaning. We may call a Parliament a Parliament in this country, but in France our equivalent is called an Assembly and in America it is called a Congress. It is a question of semantics and has no legal significance. If people want to argue about what they call the thing that I choose to call the European Parliament, and which this Bill, if we pass it tonight——

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I allowed the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) to reply to the intervention, but he is now going wide of the amendment.

Mr. Butterfill: I had hoped that I was confining my remarks to the subject of our debate. If, in responding to an intervention, I strayed from the path that you would wish me to follow, Mr. Armstrong, I apologise.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I am following my hon. Friend's remarks with great interest. I ask him to consider honestly what he is saying. He said that the provisions of the Bill were innocuous. Does he think that the inclusion of a legal commitment by the United Kingdom to go with the harmonising of indirect taxation is innocuous? I accept his arguments for and against it, but I hope that he will accept——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going down a road that is not concerned with the amendment.

Mr. Butterfill: As I thought I said earlier, my interpretation of the Bill is that it confines itself to certain fairly narrow elements of the Single European Act and does not seek to approve or ratify the Act as a whole.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Butterfill: I have concluded my remarks. If my hon. Friend wishes to make a point, I am sure that he will be given the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Deakins: I thought that the debate on which we embarked some time ago about the extra court would be relatively short, with the Minister in due course answering a number of questions put by right hon. and hon. Members. However, it has developed, rather unusually, into a major constitutional debate, and that shows the House at its best. We have discovered that even a matter which, on the whole, seems to be relatively innocuous prima facie has implications and repercussions that go much wider than the mere wording of the change that we are asked to bring about in British domestic legislation.

I begin by asking the Minister to clear up the issue of how many European courts exist. I shall make an attempt myself to do so, and I hope that the Committee will bear with me. Why was it necessary in the Single European Act, and why, therefore, is it necessary in the Bill, to refer to articles which amend the EEC treaty, the ECSC treaty and the European Atomic Energy Authority treaty? I thought that the three basic treaties were combined some years ago into what was supposed to be the single European Community treaty.

I am strengthened in my thinking by the treaty of Rome, a copy of which I have to hand. On page 146 is one of the protocols that is attached to the treaty, and article 2 refers to the European Court of Justice. Article 3 states:

"The jurisdiction which the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community and the Treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Authority confer upon the Court of Justice shall be exercised, in accordance with those Treaties, by a single Court of Justice composed and appointed as provided in Articles 165 and 167 of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community and in Articles 137 to 139 of the Treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community."

For some reason there is no mention in that article of the European Coal and Steel Community. It makes it clear, however, that there was from that time a single European Court of Justice. The following articles, which I shall not weary the Committee by repeating, mention a single European Court of Justice. Unless the Minister says something different—I hope that she will not—when she replies, we must work on the assumption that there is but one European Court of Justice.

Another question for the Minister is why the European Court of Justice and the subsidiary court mentioned in the Single European Act are now to be brought into our domestic legislation by clause 2. Why was this intention not mentioned in any of the summit communiqués of last year? I confess that the first moment that I realised that there was to be an addition to the European Court came when we had the Single European Act, and then with the Bill. The provision seems to have been inserted in the Single European Act, as a result of the intergovernmental conference or conferences of the summer and autumn of 1985.

That happened with remarkably little publicity. I do not think that one of the instructions given to the intergovernmental conference or conferences by the summits in March and June of 1985 was to talk about creating a single internal market and improving decision-making, for example. It was not an instruction from the Heads of Government at those meetings that the European Court should be empowered to have a subsidiary court. I do not know where the proposition cropped up.

The purpose of the subsidiary court is unclear. I have armed myself with a copy of the proceedings of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs that took place on 7 May. I am glad that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office is on the Treasury Front Bench because she went before the Select Committee on that day to answer questions about the Single European Act. I am no longer, much to my regret, a member of that excellent Committee. The members of it, however, did an extremely good job, and one of them asked the Minister several questions about the legislation affecting the European Court and the new subsidiary court.

Question No. 180 was asked by an hon. Member:

"Could I just ask you now about the Court of Justice? The Single European Act enables the court of first instance to be attached to the Court of Justice. It is purely permissive, it is not mandatory. You, Minister"— the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker)—

"appear to have implied in the Second Reading debate that the work of this additional court would be limited to dealing with internal Community staff matters. Could you confirm that this is certainly the intention of Her Majesty's Government because the Treaty certainly is by no means exclusive on this point?"

The hon. Lady replied:

"Indeed, it could go"—

the remit of the new court—

"slightly wider, but that would be at the discretion of the European Court of Justice. The problem which has occurred is this: the workload of the Court of Justice has increased threefold over the last decade. Some half of the workload involves staff cases which are not legally significant, I am informed, but are of course very time-consuming because they deal with the matters of individuals. There is no question of increasing the powers of the Court, but it is a question of the redistribution of the workload and the court of first instance would be attached to the European Court of Justice. It will take on some of its work at the behest of the European Court of Justice"—

I am not sure about the word "some"—

"but it will not take on new work"—

I do not know whether the words "new work" mean work which comes direct from outside the European legal system, such as it is, or whether they mean new work which comes from the European Court itself. It is a bit vague.

"and it will not have new powers, any powers of its own; it is part of the European Court of Justice."

I shall continue with that point because it is to the Committee's advantage that we understand what the hon. Lady said and what queries were raised. The questions are pertinent to the matters raised by all hon. Members regarding the amendments and clause 2. The hon. Member went on to ask, in question No. 181:

"As I understand it, it is hoped that the new court will reduce the main court's workload by dealing with actions by Community staff against the institutions employing them and also, as I understand it, in cases raising complex issues of fact, specially competition and anti-dumping cases. I just wondered whether this was so. Is that the intention of Her Majesty's Government?"

The hon. Lady replied:

"The point about the court of first instance is that it only has those powers which are delegated to it under the European Court of Justice, it has none of its own."

That was a repetition of the previous answer. She continued, and I emphasise:

"We are awaiting detailed proposals from the European Court of Justice as to what subjects will be dealt with or are suggested to be dealt with by the court of first instance."

Therefore, as of 7 May—the hon. Lady may have further information for us tonight—the Government did not know what subjects would be dealt with by the subsidiary court. I do not wish to demean the court by calling it a "subsidiary court". It seems to be a shorthand way of describing it. It does not have a name at present.

The Minister later told the Foreign Affairs Committee:

"But in all probability it is . . . cases which involve that time-consuming fact-finding and those of minor legal importance which currently account for over half the cases that come before the Court."

She said, and I stress:

"Other work which might be involved is in the industrial and commercial field which simply entails unravelling the most complicated issues which take so much time but which do not actually have a final bearing on the outcome except for the information which they supply."

That suggests that the Government are not clear about the relationship between the subsidiary court and the Court of Justice, apart from not being clear what powers it will have and what work it will do.

Mr. Budgen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this extended court could be especially useful if the EEC countries agreed to a major policy of sanctions against South Africa? As we all remember from the previous period of sanctions against Rhodesia, it is often extremely difficult to ascertain the facts. No doubt, it would be useful to have another court to look into those problems.

9.45 pm

Mr. Deakins: I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's point because I am not in charge of the Bill. The Minister may be able to help, if she has more information than she was able to provide the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on 7 May. We shall know a little later.

Is this subsidiary court necessary? I do not mean "necessary" in terms of work, because we still do not know what work it will do or what powers it will have. I mean "necessary" in terms of the amended treaty of Rome. Section II of the convention on certain institutions common to the European Communities concerned the European Court of Justice. Article 4(2) stated:

"To this end, on the date when the single Court of Justice referred to in Article 3 takes up its duties: (a) Article 32 of the Treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community shall be repealed and the following provisions substituted therefore".

I confess that I had not realised when we were debating these matters in 1972 that one article appears to refer to two of the basic treaties and another to the third of the basic treaties, but in a different light. I should have thought that the aim in unifying the Community was to have one form of justice and common institutions and rules. New article 32 stated:

"The Court"—

the single European Court of Justice—

"shall consist of seven Judges.

The Court shall sit in plenary session. It may, however"— the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and others were concerned about this—

"form chambers, each consisting of three or five Judges, either to undertake certain preparatory inquiries or to adjudicate on particular categories of cases in accordance with rules laid down for these purposes."

If there is already power for the single European Court to divide up its judges so that they can make preliminary inquiries and do the fact-finding, devilling and donkey work, if I may use that non-legal expression, which the Minister of State mentioned in her answers on 7 May to questions 180 and 181, is it necessary to have a subsidiary court?

Mr. Cash: The answer may lie to some extent in a problem which has concerned the interpretation of the treaty for some time, known as the contentious jurisdiction of the court. Effectively, this provision in combination with article 12 provides a means whereby the vacuum in the ability to enhance the jurisdiction of the court can be filled, rather like the provisions of article 235 of the treaty. That may have something to do with the problem which faces us.

Mr. Deakins: I bow to the hon. Gentleman's superior legal advice. I am certainly not a lawyer, as he is.

Mr. Budgen: I suggest that the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) attaches insufficient importance to the difference between the continental inquisitorial system of justice and our adversarial system. In our system it is not the judge's duty to adduce evidence and find out the truth. He simply sits and listens to such evidence as is brought before him and makes up his mind on that evidence. The continental system is different. The judges believe that there is something called objective truth. They go out and try to find it and they inquire about it.

Mr. Foulkes: The French.

Mr. Budgen: Not especially the French. However, the same system extends to most of the continental systems. It may well be that they are envisaging systems by which they will set up preliminary inquiries so that, for the sake of argument, if they are inquiring into the power to control and enforce any future EEC sanctions against South Africa, they will set up an inquiry quite different from the inquiry we set up to look into that control. It would be necessary to have some form of subsidiary court which would sus out the information and it would then go forward for further consideration by another part of the court.

Mr. Deakins: I accept what were probably strictures from the hon. Gentleman. I accept his example that the English legal system is very different, as we all know, from the continental system — although I think that the Scottish law has some similarities. However, I do not think that that is necessarily what the Government have in mind or what might happen.

Mr. Budgen: We do not know. We shall not be told, either.

Mr. Deakins: No, we do not know. There are analogies in the English legal system. As I understand it — there are are plenty of lawyers in the House who will immediately correct me if I am wrong — normally a superior court will not query the findings of a lower court on matters of fact. We have a system of magistrates courts, for example, and we also have Crown courts and courts of criminal appeal and so on. It is not normal in the English legal system for superior courts to go through the business of fact-finding again. It may be that what they have in mind, although it is the continental system, is the need to have a subsidiary court to find fact.

My point is that we do not need a subsidiary court to do that work. I appreciate that that work is necessary and that it is time-consuming and boring and so on. However, if the judges can divide themselves into chambers and, presumably, little subsidiary courts in their own right, what need is there for legislation, for the Single European Act and for changes in the basic treaty?

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I would like to think that what the hon. Gentleman says is the full story. I accept that he may be right in saying that there is no need for the Single Act. However, line 4 of article 32(d) refers to "a court with jurisdiction to hear and determine at first instance".

It seems that what is proposed is something not just to establish the facts but to determine certain classes of action brought by natural persons. I can see problems because in British law we do not have a definition of a natural or unnatural person. The hon. Gentleman would be wrong to think that it is just fact-finding. It provides for the courts to have the power to determine certain classes of action.

Mr. Deakins: The hon. Gentleman has raised another important point. I accept that the Minister will do her best to answer, but I would have thought that on issues of that sort we might need some strong legal advice, perhaps from the Law Officers. The relationship between the European Court of Justice and the subsidiary court, if it is set up, is not clear. If the hon. Gentleman is right and the subsidiary court has the right to determine matters as well as do the fact-finding and devilling—let us assume that that is the case — is there going to be a right of appeal from a subsidiary court to the European Court of Justice? As far as I know, that is not mentioned.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: The hon. Gentleman has hit on a fundamentally important point. He should read article 32. Like the hon. Gentleman, I am sorry that we do not have any Law Officer present on a vital legal issue. It is staggering that on an issue affecting British courts we do not have a single Law Officer in the House. Will the hon. Gentleman accept that it states clearly that the right of appeal is only on a point of law. The hon. Gentleman will find that chapter 1, article 4, 32(d) refers to "jurisdiction . . . to determine at first instance, subject to a right of appeal to the Court of Justice on points of law only".

We are setting up a new subsidiary court which can determine certain classes of issue on which there is an appeal only on points of law. This is a staggering new development in the way in which we determine legal action that affects us all. We are having to discuss it without the presence of any of the Law Officers. We should not proceed until a Law Officer is present.

Mr. Deakins: I leave that to the Chair and the Minister. The hon. Gentleman has raised another important point. The Single European Act makes it clear that there is a right of appeal on a point of law—

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Only.

Mr. Deakins: Indeed. That is in line with the English hierarchical system of courts. One can appeal against sentence, but there is mainly an appeal on a point of law rather than on points of fact—

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Armstrong. I wonder whether this will be helpful to the House. This is a complex matter. Some hon. Members are lawyers, and understand this well, but even some of the lawyers feel that it is inappropriate to continue the debate until we have a Law Officer in the House, because I believe that

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that the presence of Ministers is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Budgen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Armstrong. Can you advise us how we can require the attendance of the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General? Of course, we do not wish in any way to act improperly in raising this point of order, but if you were able to give us—I do not put it so vulgarly as "a nod and a wink"—a little informal guidance, it would help us in deciding whether it was worth the Committee's while to continue. We have a difficult—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that when he raises such matters the Front Bench may hear, but the presence of a Minster is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Budgen: I understand, but sometimes one finds that the Front Bench benefits from the guidance of the Chair. One of the glories of our constitution is not only that it is unwritten but that sometimes its oddities and difficulties are overcome by a combination of friendliness and informality. If a little guidance were given by the Chair to the Front Bench, we might understand these things a lot better.

Apart from going for a cup of coffee, I have listened to most of the debate. As far as I can gather, we have had extraordinarily little clear exposition of the hierarchy of the courts. No doubt somebody could instruct us on that—either the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General. It would be a good thing if that were done. I might be permitted to say, in a sexist way, that it would be a gallant act. It would be a demonstration of the sexist way in which the Law Officers come to the aid of the lady in difficulty—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot refer to a point of order that was not a point of order. Let me reply to the hon. Gentleman's brief intervention. I am heartened by his confidence in the way in which the House is ready to receive my guidance, but the presence of a Minister is not a matter for me. I have no doubt that the Front Bench will have taken note of what has been said.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Armstrong.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Is it on the same point of order?

Mr. Marlow: It is a different point of order.

We all have the greatest respect for my hon. Friend the Minister of State. She has a great deal of knowledge, and very great communicative skill, but I was wondering, as a result of the last few comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), whether the Minister might like to come to the Dispatch Box and tell us how she intends to deal with some of the more intricate legal matters. Is she considering asking one of the Law Officers to join our debate?

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Further to that point of order, Mr. Armstrong. I should like to draw your attention to clause 2(b), which says that our constituents could be tried and punished. When the Government are proposing the approval of a new court from which there will be no appeal whatever, apart from on a point of law, and our constituents could be punished without the punishment being made clear, in respect of the protection of the general public and our rights and privileges as Members of Parliament, surely that matter affects our privileges as Members of Parliament. Should the matter not be referred to the Committee of Privileges? If we are asked to approve a court which can punish our constituents without any appeal, except on a point of law, a matter of privilege must arise.

The First Deputy Chairman: That is a matter for debate and the hon. Gentleman should raise it at the appropriate time.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Armstrong. I think I may be able to help the Committee on this point. In evidence to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Minister, in answer to a question from her right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Thomas) as to the Government's intention, said—

It being Ten o'clock, THE FIRST DEPUTY CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report Progress.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

"That, at this day's sitting, the European Communities (Amendment) Bill and the Ways and Means Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour."—[Mr. Maude.]

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Spearing: I must apologise. I now understand that my point has already been raised during my short absence from the Chamber. However, it would be helpful for the Committee to know whether the suggestions from the European Court have been received and published. We could then make more progress.

Mr. Deakins: That is apparently not a point of order; I shall now continue my speech.

I was following up a point made by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) about the hierarchy of the courts. At present there is a single European Court of Justice whose judges can divide themselves into chambers, which I would regard as lesser courts within the scope of the European Court of Justice. Under the proposal, we will set up one, or more than one—and the precise number remains to be clarified by the Minister—subsidiary court whose relationship with the European

[Mr. Deakins]

Court of Justice is laid down in the article in the Single European Act. However, the scope for extending the number of subsidiary courts is unlimited.

Although I do not wish to alarm hon. Members unduly, it is possible to envisage the European Court of Justice being at the apex of a network of courts, many of which could be based in the individual member states of the Community.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there would be a growth of such courts only in response to demand? In other words, the number of courts would be increased only if sufficient cases were being brought.

Mr. Deakins: I do not deny the hon. Gentleman's point. However, the prospect of that happening scares the living daylights out of me. I am not considering bureaucracy; rather I am thinking about the web which will entangle us more and more and which will affect citizens within the context of an integrated western Europe. I do not want to go into that subject now, as we will debate that later.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman would not want to encourage delay through a long backlog of cases. Would he agree that it would be desirable to have an extension of courts in that circumstance?

Mr. Deakins: I want to make it clear that I want to reduce the number of cases and the scope of the European Court and limit it until we have changed the relationship between this country and the rest of the Community. I accept that, while the European Court exists and if article 2 is enacted, there will be scope for the European Court, in association with the Council acting unanimously, to extend the Community's legal system downwards. It certainly cannot extend it upwards because it would not be possible to go higher than the one single court at the apex. That is something which should worry the whole House.

What sort of people will be able to take cases to the subsidiary court? Will individual citizens of member states who are aggrieved at some action of their national Government which might or might not contravene Community law or at an action of a Community institution be able to go to the subsidiary court? There are plenty of lawyers here to advise us. At present, I suspect that the European Court is basically for the use of member states and institutions rather than individuals.

Mr. Butterfill indicated dissent.

Mr. Deakins: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, so I assume—perhaps the Minister will confirm this—that individuals can go to the European Court. Will individual people — "natural persons" under the legislation — be able to go to the subsidiary court, and will a network develop of lawyers skilled in the processes of European law to advise people whether to take their cases to the subsidiary court or courts or to the European Court and what their rights are? This may appeal to the lawyers, but is there not a danger of building up a whole new legal network to advise people in Community countries?

Mr. Foulkes: Has my hon. Friend, with his fertile imagination, considered whether residents of the Channel islands and the Isle of Man, who are British citizens with British passports, could take cases to those courts? There is scope for further consideration there.

Mr. Deakins: My hon. Friend asks an important question to which, I confess, I do not know the answer, not merely because I am not a lawyer but because I am not skilled in the intricacies of this Single European Act. I hope that the Minister will take these questions on board.

Mr. Spearing: Is not the real position even more serious? The Minister's answer to question No. 181 in the Foreign Affairs Committee, to which my hon. Friend has referred, was that no lawyer and apparently no Government yet know the answer because, as the Minister made plain and as the text of the measure makes rather less than plain, there must be a request from the European Court of Justice. In other words, the answers to germane questions which the House should know before it decides on the amendment, let alone the Bill, rest not with the House or even with national Parliaments or the so-called European Parliament but with the request of the existing European Court of Justice.

Mr. Deakins: My hon. Friend makes his own point and will no doubt wish to make his own speech. I wish people to have whatever rights are available that they need, but if individuals can go to the subsidiary courts as well as to the European Court, matters will be further complicated.

To make a party political point, the next Labour Government are pledged to certain matters of economic policy which would not be acceptable to Conservative Members—import controls, for example—but which will nevertheless be put to the electorate.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: You cannot do that.

Mr. Deakins: The hon. Gentleman says that we cannot do that. Within reason, the British Government can do whatever they like. Whether they are breaking international obligations is another matter. Let us assume that there is a limit on the import of German motor cars. At present, an importer can go to the European Court for a declaration that the action of the British Government in imposing import controls was illegal and the court would no doubt pronounce on that. Clearly, it is more expensive to go to the full European Court. In the future, will an aggrieved importer be better advised to go to the subsidiary court? Would that court be able to handle the case, or would the matter have to be referred up to the full court? Again, we do not know and I am not at all sure that the Minister knows.

Mr. Butterfill: If a future Labour Government banned the import of German motor cars, it would be a direct breach of a treaty obligation into which this country had entered and in which a previous Labour Government played a major part. Presumably, if a future Labour Government wished to do something like that, they would abrogate the treaty rather than breach it.

Mr. Deakins: The hon. Gentleman's analysis is right, but I doubt whether what he suggests will happen in practice. I do not wish to stray from the narrow remit of the amendment, but some of my right hon. and hon. Friends may prefer to take their chance on that and remain within the EC. We shall return to this matter later.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is not only the Labour party but Conservative Members who should study the clause carefully, because under article 20 there is a commitment to converge and harmonise economic policies between member states? There will be nothing to stop any natural or institutional person going to the court or getting the Commission to say that our economic policy, whatever it is, does not converge with the policies of other member states.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman should not go down that road until we reach that discussion.

Mr. Deakins: I certainly shall not, Mr. Armstrong. However, I accept the hon. Gentleman's point that the European Court is extremely powerful and that having a subsidiary court will make it even more powerful, for a reason which has not yet been advanced in the debate.

Mr. Butterfill: Why?

Mr. Deakins: I shall explain why. I mean that the court is powerful in spreading its tentacles rather than in arrogating to itself, which it cannot do, additional constitutional powers under the statute.

The European Court will get rid of all the mundane cases which the Minister tells us are clogging up the works. If the top European Court gets rid of all those mundane cases, will it not have much more time to deal with what it would regard as the important cases which, because the court is federalist by nature, will advance the cause of European union? More and more of the court's judgments and time will be spent pontificating on those matters and directing national Governments towards European union. At present, the court is being held back from doing that because it cannot push on to a subsidiary court the minor cases which do not raise major issues of principle of Community law and of the relationship between the institutions, the member states and individual citizens.

Mr. Marlow: Many hon. Members follow European affairs closely but others do not have a great deal of knowledge about them, and the debate is becoming increasingly intricate and based on the legal aspects—the court, its powers and powers between courts. As the hon. Gentleman has the Floor, will he, perhaps, catch the eye of my hon. Friend the Minister to see whether she will bring a Law Officer before us? Before we go much further, we need a full explanation of the rigours and meanings of the amendment and clause from a Law Officer?

Mr. Deakins: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but it is entirely up to the Minister. I hope that the Minister, who, like me, is not a lawyer, is not relying solely on the legal department of the Foreign Office for this debate. In 1982, the Foreign Affairs Select Committee investigated the patriation of the Canadian constitution and we had legal advice from the Foreign Office legal department, not from the Law Officers, which ultimately proved to be completely wrong about the constitutional relationship between the United Kingdom and Canada. The constitutional advice from the three most distinguished constitutional lawyers whom we had as witnesses was that the Foreign Office legal department was wrong. One may argue that that is merely a dispute between lawyers. We produced two reports which were then produced, almost in evidence, and quoted by judges in the Canadian supreme court which upheld the view of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs which was opposed to the legal advice of the Foreign Office.

10.15 pm

Mr. Cash: I happened to be adviser on the Canadian provincial case before I entered Parliament. I think that it was Professor Marshall's evidence in particular which clinched the whole matter and which I find rather extraordinary. I have a certain sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman said, but I must weigh that against the fact that there are many eminent lawyers in the Foreign Office and I would not like it to be thought that although I thought that they were wrong on that occasion——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We should get back to the amendments before the Committee.

Mr. Deakins: I promised the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) that I would give way to her.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that my hon. Friend the Minister said that the staff cases to which he referred are not legally significant? They are time-consuming, but they are of great importance to the individuals concerned. Surely it is important that those individuals should get their justice more rapidly.

Mr. Deakins: Indeed. I accept entirely what the hon. Lady says. When the Minister gave evidence before the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs—she was not necessarily pressed on this point, although I was not present—she was unable to give details of the number of cases in recent years. Why there should be so many staff disputes which require legal action makes one's mind boggle. Britain has plenty of disputes between employers and employees but few end up in the courts. They are usually disposed of without the need for legal processes. There must be something wrong with the Community if, every time the staff have a dispute with the management, they have to go through the European Court of Justice. Think of the expense, apart from anything else.

I want to refer to article 188 of the treaty of Rome, which is mentioned in the Single European Act. Article 188 is short and says:

"The Statute of the Court of Justice is laid down in the separate Protocol."

That is annexed to the Treaty. The second paragraph says:

"The Court of Justice shall adopt its rules of procedure. These shall require the unanimous approval of the Council."

The Single European Act is seeking to insert into the second paragraph of article 188 some new words, which have already been quoted. I shall quote them again because it is important that the Committee should bear them in mind. They are:

"The Council may, acting unanimously at the request of the Court of Justice"— that is more or less equivalent to what is there at the moment—

"and after consulting the Commission and the European Parliament, amend the provisions of title III of the statute."

But what article 12 of the Single European Act does not say is that the existing wording should be deleted.

This part of the Bill is very much a dog's breakfast. We are being asked to insert, where there are already two minor paragraphs, in article 188 of the Treaty of Rome, a new second paragraph without taking out the old second paragraph. I do not understand how that can happen legally or constitutionally or how those who drafted the Single European Act came to draft that. Some British people may have been involved, but they did not do a good job on that. I am not a lawyer but that is nonsense. How can something be inserted unless something else is pushed to one side, which I presume is the case, or replaced? Obviously the intention of the insertion in article 12 is to replace the second paragraph of article 188 of the treaty of Rome. It is not replaced by the wording of the Single European Act.

Finally, let me deal with the statute in the protocol on page 153 of the treaty of Rome with annexes which I have before me. That is the statute which can be amended by the delegated legislation which the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) mentioned. That is concerned entirely with procedure. I have no objection to courts. In Britain they regulate their own procedure, subject to the Lord Chancellor. The European Court of Justice deals not merely with individuals but with member sovereign Governments and one needs to be careful about the mechanisms for changing rules of procedure.

Title III, article 21 of the treaty of Rome says:

"The Court may require the parties to produce all documents and to supply all information which the Court considers desirable. Formal note shall be taken of any refusal."

The next and important sentence reads :

"The Court may also require the Member States and institutions not being parties to the case to supply all information which the Court considers necessary for the proceedings."

That seems to be a fairly draconian provision, but at least it was put in after approval by the national Governments by way of ratification and is a treaty matter. It is embodied in Britain in the European Communities Act 1972.

We are now handing over our power to control such changes in the rules of procedure not merely to the European Court, but to any subsidiary future courts that it may set up, and those may be unlimited in number. Those courts will be unable to regulate their own procedure and will still have to do it by unanimous opinion of the Council, but the matter will no longer come to this Parliament. It will not come here in the form of a Bill and we shall be entirely dependent on the Government of the day — I make no party political point here — as to whether or not that Government say that such changes in the rules of procedure are matters that this Parliament representing the British people ought to be cognisant of and to have an opportunity to comment upon, even if we do not have a right to approve of them. I hope that at least we will have a right to approve as well.

Mr. Butterfill: If the hon. Gentleman reads article 4(2), which is the same as article 11(2), he will see that it is only for the purposes of necessary adjustments, necessary for the purposes of paragraph 1. Enormous safeguards are built into paragraph 1 and the hon. Gentleman is making a big fuss about nothing.

Mr. Deakins: I hope that the hon. Member is right. I am raising the issue because I am worried about it, but if I am wrong and the hon. Gentleman is right, I am sure that the Minister will take legal advice and put me right.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman mentions one area in which the European Court can act and in which our courts cannot. That is to say, it can demand evidence from institutions or from national Governments within the Community. During my days in uniform I used to go to courts martial from time to time and there were various rules of evidence which were important for an individual's freedom and justice. One of those rules was that hearsay evidence was not acceptable. What is to stop this institution flipping through some late night sitting as part of the quid pro quo with other Community Governments over something about us getting back our rebate? Because things are bogging down in the Community and the court does not have as much power as it would like to have or because it wants to investigate this, that or the other, it could take hearsay evidence. What is to prevent that sort of monstrosity from taking place?

Mr. Deakins: I am not in charge of the Bill and I cannot answer the question posed by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). The Minister must take note of these points.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept the matter of rule changes having to be necessary? The only determinant of what is necessary is the Council of Ministers. There is no question of the Council being limited by paragraph 1 because it acts in accordance with paragraph 1.

Mr. Butterfill: Has my hon. Friend read the paragraph?

Mr. Taylor: Indeed I have, and I have it in front of me. The Council of Ministers, and only the Council of Ministers, decides what is necessary for a rule change. Neither the House of Commons nor member states have any jurisdiction. Rule changes are a matter for the Council of Ministers and nobody else.

Mr. Deakins: It is not just a matter for the Council of Ministers, and that is another of my objections to the provision in the Single European Act and therefore to clause 2 of the Bill. In future, unlike the present position under article 188 of the treaty of Rome, the Commission will have the right to be consulted and to put its oar in. So will the so-called European Parliament, but not this Parliament. This is another derogation of the sovereignty of this Parliament. I accept that it is derogation in a minor respect, but principles do not depend on measurements. The principle is vital and one which we should seek to safeguard. Perhaps the Minister will reassure us when she replies to the debate.

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Mr. George Robertson: As this is a Committee stage I think that it would be appropriate for me to intervene briefly from the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: It is a carve up.

Mr. Robertson: I can tell the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that if there is a carve-up, it appears to be taking place among him and his colleagues. I am a free agent and, as the Opposition spokesman, I wish to make a brief contribution to the debate.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Can the hon. Gentleman give the House an assurance that he has not been involved in any private discussion to keep out my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) who is the only hon. Member with any direct experience of these courts? Bearing in mind the fact that we have not had one Law Officer here all day

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not casting reflections on the Chair.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: No, not in any way.

The First Deputy Chairman: There has been no kind of arrangement as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Robertson: Who is called in a debate and who chooses to intervene are not matters for me. Some important issues have been raised in this important debate and it is only right and proper that all hon. Members who wish to take part in a Committee stage should have the opportunity to do so. I have sat here from the beginning of the debate and have listened carefully to all the right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken. I have as much right as any other hon. Member to make an intervention.

Mr. Bill Walker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I hope that he will not think me out of order in saying that I am surprised that he is intervening at this a stage when some Back-Bench Members still wish to speak on these important amendments. Front-Bench spokesmen usually wait to hear what Back Benchers have to say before making their own comments.

Mr. Robertson: It is incredible that some hon. Members seem to be suggesting that they will be teaching their grandmothers how to suck eggs. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who is a good colleague of mine, has considerable experience in these matters and could teach me a great deal in areas of detail. I hope that he will be able to participate in the debate. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) — Newham plays an important part in our debates—and the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), not to mention the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), all wish to make contributions.

However, it is open to me to come in at any stage. There has been no concordat or agreement——

Mr. Cash: In view of the circumstances in which I find myself, I should like to put it on record that I shall not be engaged in a filibuster. I am here to make some serious points and I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not seeking to jump in to prevent me from saying a few things that are based on a small amount of experience in these matters.

Mr. Robertson: How can it be suggested that I, as an Opposition spokesman, am seeking to prevent a Conservative Back Bencher from speaking?

Mr. Teddy Taylor: The usual channels.

Mr. Robertson: I am not a member of the usual channels.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is so.

Mr. Robertson: I am not a member of any usual channels. I have sat through the whole debate and I wish to intervene at this stage.

Mr. Taylor: The dirty tricks department.

Mr. Robertson: No, there is no question of——

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: No. I intend to make, and have always intended to make, a brief contribution. A number of lengthy speeches have been made and I hope that we shall be able to exhaust the important issues involved in the debate. I hope that there will be adequate opportunity for everyone who wishes to participate in the debate to do so. I am sure that it is not the intention of the Chair or anybody else to curtail this or any other debate. There are another seven groups of amendments to come. I am sure that it will not have escaped hon. Members that if a deal had been done to prevent discussion of one group of amendments, debate could easily be prolonged on other groups of amendments.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: I will give way for the last time.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He has just implied that there are several other groups of amendments, and that we could debate this subject during our discussion of them. I am not quite sure why he said that. This group of amendments is massively important and concerns the whole judicial future of the United Kingdom. The surrender of sovereignty by some of our courts may be involved. After only four Back-Bench speeches, why does he, as Opposition spokesman, feel that it is time to intervene in the debate?

Mr. Robertson: It is obvious that the amendment was tabled by the hon. Member for Southend, East that he opened the debate, and that hon. Members have been free to speak at any juncture and to do so repeatedly. If the closure is moved after I or the Minister speaks, the Opposition will oppose it. There is no question of us being involved in any filibuster. I cannot believe that the Government would wish to terminate a debate on such an important issue at this stage.

Hon. Member after hon. Member has pointed out that, as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said, we are in a fog about the Government's intentions in this crucial area. There is no explanatory White Paper, and no opportunity for the Committee to consider in detail some of these important issues, and so we have to rely on the reports of the Scrutiny committee. However, one such very important report was published only this morning, thus giving hon. Members no time to reach any conclusion. Consequently, we have to ask the Minister questions concerning fundamental points of legislation relating to our consitutional future, yet there are no answers.

10.30 pm

Hon. Members feel frustrated because questions are asked about an incredibly complicated Bill, which depends on the Single European Act being brought into force the Act itself being dependent on the treaties party to the EC — and yet they receive no real answer. My hon. Friend the member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) made some detailed and valid points, yet they are not likely to be answered to the satisfaction of hon. Members. We are ill served by the institutions of Government when Parliament is faced by a major constitutional Bill, which was trailed as being a very significant and important Bill, and yet there is no explanatory memorandum of any consequence and no white paper to explain the legal and constitutional details that lie at the very heart of it.

We shall have to consider other aspects in some detail later.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is also regrettable that no SDP Member is present for the debate?

Mr. Robertson: That may well be regrettable, but it is hardly surprising that those who protest the loudest about their conviction concerning the necessity for a united Europe and about their commitment to the ideal of the EC are rarely, if ever, here. Indeed, the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), who is, I understand, the principal Front Bench spokesman for the Liberal party on Scottish and European affairs, is the sole representative of the alliance during many of our long and somewhat esoteric debates. Out of the massed ranks of the alliance, he alone should be congratulated on his commitment to the European cause

Sir Russell Johnston: I hope that I will be permitted to express my warm, heartfelt appreciation of those tributes. I speak on European, as well as Scottish affairs.

Mr. Robertson: As a former Scottish affairs spokesman I can see the link between Scottish and European affairs.

Mr. Budgen: Does not the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) think, on reflection that he was rather ungenerous to the SDP. One of the courageous characteristics of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) is the persistent way in which he expounds the need for greater expenditure in the EEC and the wonderful way that he regrets the niggardly limits on VAT-based expenditure in the EEC. He wants that to go to 2 per cent. as quickly as possible. Is the hon. Gentleman not ashamed of the way——

The Second Deputy Chairman (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I find it impossible to relate those remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Robertson: Those remarks were irrelevant to the amendment. One might say that the SDP was irrelevant to the amendment, to the Bill and to the House. If a representative of the SDP were present tonight, he and the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber might not agree on thier view of the amendment. However, that should lie upon the Table.

We need to know whether we are talking about the European Court, which we know, or about a number of subsiduary, lower tier courts as part of the new structure. We must have a genuine answer. We have had an interesting debate so far. Who knows how interesting it will become?

I studied the Foreign Affairs Committee report to see whether I could find the answer. Both Government and Opposition Members have to rely on deliberations by the House of Lords and House of Commons Scrutiny Committees. One seeks in vain for the answers to important questions.

Mr. Spearing: In case there is any mistake, the hon. Gentleman should know that the Select Committee on European Legislation was not able to examine the Single European Act treaty, or anything relating to it, because its terms of reference did not allow it to do so. I add that, because it might be thought that we abrogated our duty to the House.

Mr. Robertson: I would not dream of suggesting that my hon. Friend abrogated his duty. I recognise the careful distinctions between the remits of the House of Lords and House of Commons Committees. The Government have made a commitment to examine our scrutiny.

Paragraph 30 of the Foreigh Affairs Committee report takes us some way down the road suggested by the hon. Member for Southend, East. I disagree with the emphasis that he chose for the debate, but he explored serious and important issues. There are some safeguards in the system. Some of the questions he asked deserve clear answers. He suggested that some of the court decisions might pre-empt decisions by the European Council, even where unanimity has been specifically inserted as a result of the negotiations at the Luxembourg summit. The court might, somehow, take the power away from the politicians and, by a process of interpretation, seek to impose upon nation states within the EEC obligations that they would not otherwise have chosen.

Paragraph 30 of the report states:

"Article 18 of the Single European Act provides (in new Article 100A(4) of the EEC Treaty) that a Member State may apply separate national provisions on grounds of major national needs, but"—

I emphasise this point—

"also enables the Commission or another Member State to take that Member State to the Court of Justice on grounds that it is 'making improper use' of this provision."

The hon. Member for Southend, East has hit on an important and far-reaching aspect of the Single European Act. If the Community did go in that direction, it would be against the very spirit of the Luxembourg agreement. Indeed, it would go against the specific guarantees that the Prime Minister gave the House regarding the way in which these degrees of unanimity on the reserved areas would operate.

Although we are now in the area of the purely hypothetical — and undoubtedly the Minister will say that we are hypothesising about something that will never happen and that, after all, we have the Prime Minister's guarantee that none of this will happen — the fact that the Committee reached that conclusion should at least make hon. Members, even those in favour of the reforms, stop and wonder whether this step is being taken without a full examination of the consequences.

The Select Committee on European Legislation in the other place last week produced a damning report, which may have alerted a number of hon. Members who may not have been aware of the importance of the Single European Act — that peculiarly named animal that is neither an Act nor is it single, although it is certainly European—that something grave and important was happening, and in their speeches they made some of the points made in that report.

The Bill, the Single European Act and the many glosses put upon the issue by the Secretary of State and the Minister in the Committees before which they appear do not disclose the real changes in the law and their implications for the unwritten British constitution. That is a defect that the Committee is right to criticise and question. By the standard of the contributions that have already been made, and may yet be made, mine is a brief speech. I simply seek to endorse the view put by other hon. Members that we are being ill-served by the fact that there is not the detail, the information or the background to such an important issue to enable the Committee to reach a conclusion. The process of debate, which is the hallmark of this Parliament, underlined that with considerable force.

Before you returned to the Committee, Sir Paul, I was being accused of a variety of heinous crimes. I know that hon. Members on both sides still wish to make brief and relevant contributions, and I hope that in the process of doing so they will highlight the points which have been made already, which validly and rightly should be made.

Mr. Cash: I participate in the debate as someone who is by no means an anti-European, as I have made clear on a number of occasions in previous debates. I believe that that has been acknowledged by my hon. Friend the Minister. I am in no sense engaged in a filibuster. I have spoken at length on occasion in other debates, but I have no intention of doing so now.

One of the great difficulties that faces the European Court of Justice, Britain and Parliament, is our lack of knowledge of European law and procedure. Britain has been a member of the Community since 1 January 1973, yet that seems to have had little impact on the ability or the determination of the various colleges of law to ensure that lawyers know what is going on. It is a matter of some concern to me — I made such a remark in an article which appeared in The Times today — that this deficiency should be put right. As the debate has shown, it is impossible for the House of Commons to know and understand the basis upon which it is considering these matters unless the principles of law and the basis of interpretation of the Community court are well understood by those participating in it. Unfortunately, they are not.

Although the European Community is a glazed-eye subject and is extremely boring to many, it happens, if I may catch the attention of Opposition Members for one second, to be a matter of considerable importance to the British people. When matters of this sort are being debated, it would help enormously if more of those who have had direct experience of the European Community were to participate to ensure that we have a proper discussion of the principles that apply, especially those that bear on the amendments that are before us.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman), who was an MEP, is in her place and she may well wish to help the Committee in that way.

Mr. Cash: That may be. Only time will tell.

I shall conclude by quoting from a case in which Lord Denning made the following statement:

> English courts have been exhorted to divine the spirit of a treaty and gain inspiration from it. If they find a gap they must fill it as best they can. They must do what the framers of the instrument would have done if they had thought about it."

When we are dealing with the interpretation of Community law, which has a direct bearing on our economy and industry, and when we have a debate which is as important as this one, we have the feeling, rather like the hunting of the Snark, that we are looking for something that hardly exists. In fact, we are debating issues of which the people, our courts and the House of Commons have little knowledge and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take this opportunity to exhort those who teach our lawyers to take a more serious interest in the practical questions which arise so that we have a constructive approach to the European Community in this context.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) referred to knowledge by hon. Members of whom he is one — he knows something about the affairs of the Community — but, more importantly, knowledge of the citizens of this country who are subject to the laws of this House and those of the EEC. As he is a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation, of which I have the honour to be Chairman, I should underline that, much as the Committee might have wished, to provide a comprehensive view of the legislation — if it is not European legislation I do not know what it is — our terms of reference constrained us from doing so.

We did, in fact, produce a report on the impact of the Single European Act for parliamentary scrutiny, which was our concern. But we were not able to address ourselves to the issues we are discussing tonight — the introduction of what I hope we can call the lower tier European court, who should determine its terms of reference, its membership, who can go to it, and the penalties and adjudication that it should have.

The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, in its limited time available, did not go far down that road. It established, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) has said, that the answers were not even available to the Government. I suggest that the major difficulty we have faced tonight has been a repetition of questions from hon. Gentlemen. The Government do not know the answers to questions which have been raised on a Bill which they introduced. That is the position at which the Parliament of the United Kingdom has arrived. It has arrived at that position as a result of the consequences of the European Communities Act 1972. We are not debating that Act tonight, and we are not debating the advantages or disadvantages of membership or continued membership. We are discussing whether or not the judicial powers of the EEC should be expanded into a lower tier court.

The House has not heard what the Government have said on the issue, surprisingly enough, in a command paper. The Government issued Cmnd. 9761 dated March 1986 called "Developments in the European Community July-December 1985". I shall read to the House what the Government said about the European Court of Justice. Paragraph 2.10 states:

> "On the European Court of Justice agreement was reached inter alia on new treaty articles providing power to set up a Court of First Instance. it is hoped that when this power is exercised it will enable the Court of First Instance to deal with staff matters and cases raising complex issues of fact, (especially competition and anti-dumping cases). The changes are designed to reduce the Court's heavy workload."

That does not suggest what we have gleaned tonight. A much bigger scope is envisaged than the modest clearing away of complex cases and dealing with staff. The sentence at the end:

"The changes are designed to reduce the Court's heavy workload."

is a little ambiguous. Whilst, it would relieve the workload of the European Court of Justice as such, it would not relieve the total workload of the courts of justice of the European communities, which is a different thing. The number of cases going for adjudication would almost certainly be greater. The figure may be three times that of the 1973 figure. If the figure was not greater, there would be no need to set up a lower tier of court to clear away the ground.

Mr. Marlow: Is not the best reference Professor Parkinson? Would he not say that we would not expand the operation, but the work that it did?

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman may be right. I think that Professor Parkinson's law is universal. There is another factor, which the hon. Gentleman has forgotten. It has not been mentioned much tonight. If the scope of the European Community were enlarged by definition — in other words, if the area over which it is given jurisdiction widened — the number of cases taken to the court would be likely to increase, even if that jurisdiction were of equal controversiality as that of the existing legislation. I understand that the position is different. Later, we shall discuss widening the scope of the European Community.

Lord Cockfield presented a Green Paper containing 300 regulations in the appendix. Those regulations are waiting to descend on us when the internal market is perfected between now and 1992. I hazard a guess that it was difficult to formulate those regulations and that they are probably more controversial than those that we have already considered. I suggest, therefore that there might be more litigation than we already have. Not only will the scope of EEC legislation be wider but the amount of litigation that it throws up may be greater.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is no opporunity to appeal against a decision by the Court of Justice? The court's decisions are final, which raises certain peculiar difficulties which may be overcome in part by the provisions of this article. As I said before, the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice is effectively being supplemented. The courts are tied to what the treaties allow them to do and the article provides an opportunity to expand their jurisdiction. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the jurisdictional provisions of the treaties have been observed as follows:

"No international tribunal has ever been equipped with so varied a jurisdictional competence as has the Courts of the European Communities".

The court has, in fact, a wide degree of competence.

Mr. Spearing: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but he should be careful. As I understand it, this is not an international organisation in the normal sense of international treaties. All these treaties are supra-national, which is very different. I think that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that, because there is no appeal against a decision of the European Court of Justice, there should be a higher level of court, a sort of House of Lords in Europe — as well as the lower tier which we are discussing. The hon. Gentleman should be careful because he suggests creating possibly three tiers of European courts of justice. By the very nature of the ongoing legislation from the European Community, those tiers would, I suggest begin to absorb an increasing proportion of matters that are justiciable in the United Kingdom. It may well be that aspect that has caused a certain flurry in the legal professions and in the columns of The Times. An expansion of European law within the legal system of Britain would begin to have severe repercussions on the legal professon and on those who need to take matters to the lower tier court.

I shall hasten on because my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), who is Chairman of the Select Committee on Employment and a frequent participant in European discussions, may wish to catch your eye, Sir Paul. I should like to ask the Minister a number of questions in addition to those posed by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). Under article 4 of the Single European Act, proposed article 32d of the treaty of Rome states that it is the request of the Court of Justice that there should be another court. Will the Minister confirm that the terms and conditions of the lower tier court will be created not by the European Council but by the Court of Justice acting — uncharacteristically, I should have thought, as a court — in effectively an executive capacity? The Court of Justice, following decisions agreed unanimously by the Council, is acting at least in a semi-executive role in producing the regulations by which it will administer the lower tier.

Article 4(3) states:

"The members of that court shall be chosen from persons whose independence is beyond doubt and who possess the ability required for appointment to judicial office".

Since there will be no appeal from these courts, other than on a point of law, perhaps I am inaccurate in calling it the lower tier. It is the court of first instance, and may be the court of last instance for many people or bodies. I do not know how far the natural human body, which was mentioned earlier extends. Does it extend to trade unions, employers' organisations, manufacturers' associations or to associations of those engaged in some sorts of retail trade? All those bodies will be heavily involved in the avalanche of harmonisation to which the House may soon be subjected, and may have recourse to the courts.

The Minister must tell us — the Government may not decide this, but she may have heard a whisper from the Court of Justice — what the court intends. If there has been no information from this great court to Her Majesty's Government, we should adjourn the debate and not proceed with the Bill. If we do not get firm replies about what is intended, it would be improper for us to proceed with this part of the Bill. If it is improper for us to proceed with this part of the Bill, that must be true of the entire Bill.

Paragraph 4 states:

"That court shall establish its rules and procedures in agreement with the Court of Justice."

I presume that that means that the lower-tier court shall establish its own rules, provided that the Court of Justice agrees. It is yet another example of self-legislation by the courts, not even under the control of the Council of Ministers. It does not say that it shall be subject to unanimity, only that it must be approved by the Court of Justice. The lower-tier court will establish that in the first instance.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman should have read the next line, which states:

"These rules shall require the unanimous approval of the Council."

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman is right, but the generation of such proposals lies entirely with the second-tier court. It cannot be initiated by the Council of Ministers or, surprisingly, by the Court of Justice.

If we translated that position to the United Kingdom, it would be extremely strange. The administration of justice here stems from statutes passed in the House, to which the High Court of Justice and lower courts are subject, save only for the common law. This is almost the reverse.

As a London Member of Parliament, I frequently show parties of visitors from schools and, alas, nowadays, the unemployed, round the Palace of Westminster. When we pass through the Royal Gallery, I explain that judges come there once a year. I ask them "What do you see in courts?", and they say, "The royal arms." I say, "Yes, that is the King's court. The King or the monarch dispenses justice. The courts in this land are the courts of the Crown, and the judiciary which is responsible alone to the monarch who gives royal assent to statutes passed by the House."

Some time ago — I apologise to the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) for not giving him notice that I would raise this point, but he is big enough to take it — when the European Communities Bill was going through the House, the right hon. Gentleman, then Prime Minister, made a speech, reported in The Times, to the effect that the position of the Queen would not be affected. I read that with some incredulity, because any first-year law student — I have not been one, but I understand that they consider the British constitution as a starting point — knows only too well that Britain's laws, at least until 1973, were made only with royal assent or in regulations by the Crown in Privy Council. Justice and courts were under the jurisdiction of the Monarch. After 1973, in accordance with the Act, that changed. The Monarch and the Crown was no longer central to our system of legislation expenditure, administration and justice. In all those aspects the Crown was short-circuited. Laws were imposed on this country, or at least were accepted through the medium of that Act, which came directly from Brussels. They did not pass through this Chamber and they did not need the Royal Assent. Therefore, far from the Queen not being affected, she and her heirs and successors, as long as the Act is on the statute book, will be bypassed. We then had the position, extraordinary as it may seem, of the Prime Minister not knowing the basic fundamental constitution of the land.

I would suggest that we are now faced with the second stage of that constitutional change. We are now setting up a second tier of courts to which the citizens of this land, and perhaps corporate bodies, will have first recourse, which are not under the aegis of the Crown, will not have the Royal Arms above them, will not be subject to the statutes of the House or to its determination. They will not even be subject, as we have seen, to the chain of accountability through the Council of Ministers. The fact that that is so has been amply demonstrated today in debate by the fact that so far — the Minister has yet to speak — she and all the publications of the Government have not explained how it will work.

Mr. Deakins: My hon. Friend keeps referring to the European courts in plural, not just the European Court of Justice and its new subsidiary court, but the chances of several subsidiary courts being established. I believe that in that view he seems to have the support of Her Majesty's Government. They have chosen wording in clause 2 of the Bill which refers to "any court" under the European Court of Justice whereas in the Single European Act it merely refers to "that court". I do not know if my hon. Friend can answer, but I hope that the Minister can say why the Government have taken it upon themselves to go beyond the terms of the Single European Act in making provision for any European court when there is only one and there can be only two under the Single European Act? Why do they not specify the subsidiary court in the terms of amendment No. 1 in the name of the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor)?

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that issue. I shall now try to choose my words carefully. It ought not to be necessary because if we had had it spelt out in a White Paper one would have thought that most of this debate would have been unnecessary and the Government's concern over the time factor would not be as great.

As I understand it, the word "court" in the singular implies a level of judicial authority. Let us take the High Court in the Strand. It has three divisions, but it is the High Court, singular, although we all know that it sits in multiple in many courts with many divisions. I believe, from what I have heard and hope to see ere long, that in Luxembourg the European Court sits, but it sits in multiple chambers with multiple numbers of judges and could, under the existing European statues, multiply itself, provided the Council voted the money, ad infinitum. For some reason, it has not been chosen to exercise that solution to the problem of workload which the Government showed us in their White Paper. Even if it had 20 or 30 courts, in the normal everyday sense of the word, taking 20 cases at one time, it would still be the European Court of Justice.

I answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow. When I refer to the European Court, I refer to at least two levels—the present level of what is described as the European Court of Justice in the Single European Act, and what I have dubbed the lower tier court, which could nevertheless sit in multiple. This is a demand-led issue, according to the number of cases that has to be met. I could foresee a lower tier European court on the northern circuit, perhaps calling at London, Edinburgh and Copenhagen. Perhaps there would be a circuit based on the Franco-Belgian tradition, calling at Luxembourg, Belgium, Paris, Strasbourg and Bordeaux. We must not forget our Spanish friends—the Lusitanian tradition, and the tradition of the Iberian peninsula, with the court perhaps calling at Lisbon, Madrid and Rome. There are our Greek friends as well. There could be many multiple courts. My hon. Friend is right. Clause 2 says just "any court attached thereto". It is wide open. There is nothing to prevent all that happening under the Bill.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman is coming to a very important point. The debate has been brought about because of the Single European Act, but for some reason best known to the Government, the Bill is much more widely drawn. Is it not right that there is nothing in the Bill to stop the European Court subsuming national courts? If the hon. Gentleman knows of anything that stops that, I should be relieved to know it. Perhaps individual areas of policy could be subsumed, but under the Bill as it is written not the Single European Act – the European Court at a later stage could totally subsume national sovereign courts of the United Kingdom and other countries.

Mr. Spearing: I shall come to that.

I should like to take up what the hon. Gentleman says. The Government have not explained anywhere that I have seen why the terms of the Bill are apparently that much wider than those of the Single European Act. But is there anything in the Single European Act as drafted that would prevent the rather fanciful Gilbertian picture that I painted? The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) may know better, but I suggest that there is not. Therefore, we must ask ourselves whether there is nothing in the Single European Act article to prevent it. Is there something that the Government know that we do not, so they have drawn the clause so wide? If that was not envisaged, why did they put it at that width? The only suggestion that I can offer is that they did what parliamentary draftsmen and wise Ministers do. They said, "Let's make it wide enough so that we do not have to have legislation again," but that is not a good reason.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Apart from the extension to which the hon. Gentleman refers, does he accept that the crucial extension of the work of the court under the clause is the extra powers of interpreting the new Single European Act – matters such as tax harmonisation, over which there are no powers at present? The court now has the ability to make determinations on those matters. Does the hon. Gentleman further accept that that major extension of the work of the court is in the interpretation of the new clauses that include the convergence of economic policies, tax harmonisation, environment, technology and many other issues?

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman anticipates what I was about to say. I was about to refer the House to the fact that Title VII on page 17 of the Single European Act, Cmnd. 9758, introduces for the first time, specifically, areas over which the European Community has legislative rights. At present the legislative rights of the European Community are restrained within the terms of the Treaty of Rome. They can be excepted only by use of the existing article 100. That article states that any matter which affects the operation of progress of the Common Market requires unanimity. There has been much discussion within the Community as to whether the Common Market requires expansion in that area. In fact article 100 of the treaty states that > "The Council shall, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission, issue directives for the approximation of such provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action in Member States as directly affect the establishment or functioning of the common market."

11.15 pm

I would draw the House's attention to the words "directly affect". There has been much argument as to how far the article can be pushed. Regulations arise from the Commission to the Council on matters such as the environment, public health, conditions in slaughter houses and about the conditions of health for workers and so on, and it has been said that in order to obtain a Common Market there must be common regulations on a wide range of issues. Others have said that that is pushing things too far. Until now, as we know so well, from the trailers to this debate, any one country in the 12 can say "No dice". The country does not even have to say that the matter affects the national interest, it need only say that it does not agree and that the matter goes too far. As the matter must be unanimous under article 100, it is finished.

The controversy about support at that stage is truncated. If the Bill is enacted, we will be in a new ball game. The House will consider article 100A later, together with article 100B – the latter being a goad to speed up 100A and is a long stop provision. We will then have to face the establishment of the internal market by 1992. That is presaged by the Cockfield White Paper and there are 300 draft regulations in waiting.

As I said earlier in an intervention, by definition the 300 regulations are likely to be controversial. If they were not, they would already have been passed.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the creation of the internal market is likely to benefit this country? The internal market in services, especially the financial services, is something that we have been prostrated on for some time. There have been many non-tariff barriers to trade against our exporters and the purpose of the creation of the internal market is to deal with those problems.

On the point which the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) raised about the court being different from any other court that we have previously known, does he not agree that that applies to any court of reference that arises out of a treaty obligation? It is no different from our agreeing to refer a matter to the International Court at the Hague in the past. We are only subject to the court as long as we are subject to the Treaty. This Parliament is sovereign and can de-ratify or renege on the Treaty at any time it wishes.

Mr. Spearing: I do not wish to proceed too far down that road, as it leads outside the realm of litigation. I want to keep my remarks within that realm and that brings the matter within the scope of the debate. However, there are widely differing views on the matter. It is true that the Government have said that the expanding internal market will be beneficial to this country in spite of the £10,000 million trade balance in manufactures. When the Minister was asked about that in Committee she said that those trends existed. Therefore, there is some doubt whether the expansion of the internal market is beneficial. But it is undoubtedly true that the Government say that whatever the form of harmonisation, it is advantageous to Britain so long as it brings in market forces and allows them to move freely over the EC. The hon. Gentleman may agree with that view, and it is certainly the view of the Front Bench, but I do not think that it carries universal agreement among Conservative Members. A modicum of scientific observation and a little statistical analysis might have called that into question.

The Government are going ahead with that area of regulation which will automatically require and produce a vast amount of litigation.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Article 130B title V commits member states to conduct their economic policies in such a way as to reduce disparities between the various regions. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would have been easy a fortnight ago for the Cornish tin miners to have taken the British Government to the European Court, saying that the Government were not applying that policy? Will not this Act massively extend the work of the European Courts because for the first time they are being given the right to make judgments on the economic policies of member states?

Mr. Spearing: I shall come to that area of litigation in a minute, but first I should like to put to the House another area.

I understand that some of the regulations now under discussion include such matters as the harmonisation of income tax and of excise duties on wines, spirits and beers. That is under the jurisdiction of the internal market council, and I am not sure whether it has reported fully to the House. When regulations are passed in that sort of tender area, I like the hon. Friend, can imagine people, for example, with high salaries subject to enormous differentials of pay—for the sake of cross party amity I shall not mention some current personalities who are earning high sums—investing money in lawyers to take their case to the European Court. They do not want their income tax to be harmonised to their disadvantage. It may also be to the advantage of corporate bodies to take their case to the court.

Title VII is headed "Environment" and article 130R, paragraph 3, states:

"In preparing its action relating to the environment, the Community shall take account of:

—available scientific and technical data;

—environmental conditions in the various regions of the Community;

—the potential benefits and costs of action or of lack of action;

—the economic and social development of the Community as a whole and the balanced development of its regions."

That includes tin mines. I can see some litigious persons looking at some regulation and saying, "But the Government did not take that into account," and going immediately to the court. Why not? The environment is a minefield for any Minister of any Government in any country. That is just one group.

What about research and technological development which is worth much more money? There is a whole batch of new articles to the Treaty of Rome, 130F, 130G, 130H, 130I and 130K to 130Q, which relate to statutory arrangements for framework programmes, and to the implementation of multiannual framework programmes and of research, technological development and demonstration programmes. We already have such arrangements, but these are being written into the statute.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman drew the Committee's attention to title 7 on the environment, paragraph 3, the last sentence of which says:

"The Community shall take account of . . . the economic and social development of the Community as a whole and the balanced development of its regions."

One of the greatest problems that the Government have when they want to build, for example, a road, is the great planning inquiries. Programmes can be held up for months or years on end.

It is possible under this title that if a motorway were postulated between, say, Cardiff and Edinburgh, the Italians could go to the European Court and say that it was unfair and would be advantageous to us and that they wanted one in Italy. Surely there will be an immense amount of litigation.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I am working alphabetically backwards in the litigation litany in drawing the attention of the House to new articles of the treaty of Rome—130A, B, C, D, and E. They relate to a heading which I find intriguing—"Economic and social cohesion". Whether one can legislate for that I doubt, but Article 130C says:

"The European Regional Development Fund is intended to help redress the principal regional imbalances in the Community through participating in the development and structural adjustment of regions whose development is lagging behind and in the conversion of declining industrial regions."

I suppose that that is a fine aspiration, but many of the articles will clearly give rise to increasing sensitivity to litigation of the very sort with which the lower tier court was presumably designed to deal. I think that the Government said that it was "of considerable complexity".

My point is that there will be greater need of these lower tier courts, that they will not be courts of her gracious Majesty

Mr. Moate: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Spearing: I regret that I must continue.

Despite being a great impact on many British citizens and many corporate interests, it will not be possible for the House to protect those interests adequately because not only have we not got complete control over legislation—I make no point about that tonight—but we have not even got control over those who will create, run and cause regulations to be made for these new courts.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means: Mrs. Lynda Chalker.

Mr. Leighton: On a point of order, Sir Paul. I hope that the Minister is not seeking to wind up before other members of the Committee have spoken.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The Minister has risen and I have called her. Mrs. Chalker.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Sir Paul. I draw your attention to the fact that the proposer of one of the amendments that we are debating is not here. I am the second proposer of that amendment and I trust that, because you have quite properly called the Minister, that will not debar me from speaking on that amendment.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. It is a matter for the discretion of the Chair whom the Chair calls and it is customary, when Ministers rise, that they should be called. Mrs. Chalker.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): After over three and half hours of a wide-ranging debate, I may be able to outline why the court of first instance has been included in the Bill and perhaps clear up some of the matters resting in the minds of hon. Members.

First, the proposal for a court of first instance reflects what has been a threefold increase in the work load of the European Court over the past 10 years. The number of cases brought before the court rose from 297 in 1983 to 433 in 1985. More than half of those cases were about staff terms—promotion, conditions of employment, salary increases and so forth. They were not the sort of case which had normally been associated with the European Court of Justice, but they rightly went to it.

11.30 pm

The proposal is that the court of first instance will do no more than relieve the Court of Justice of some of the existing burden of work. That is exactly what was said in Cmnd. 9761, published in March, in paragraph 2(10) on page 9, and as I replied in giving evidence to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs in paragraphs 180 and 181.

The court of first instance will be attached to the European Court of Justice. It will hear certain classes of action brought by individuals or companies and its decisions will be subject to a right of appeal to the Court of Justice. It will not hear cases brought by member states, nor will it hear cases brought by the institutions of the Community. Such cases will go to the European Court of Justice. It will not take on new work and it will not have new powers. It will be there to deal with some of the detailed probing that is necessary in cases that now come to the European Court of Justice.

I was quite right to say in response to questioning in the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs that we await precise proposals from the European Court of Justice about the kind of work that the court of first instance could most suitably take on. Because it does not take on new work and will not have new powers, its work will be limited. We anticipate that the European Court of Justice will probably recommend that the court of first instance should take on the sort of cases that I have described—those which involve time-consuming fact finding and those of minor legal importance. Such cases will include applications about employees' terms of service with Community employers which currently account for half the cases that come before the Court of Justice. These sometimes take the form of disputes between a Community institution and one of its employees who may feel that he was not receiving the pension to which he was entitled under staff regulations.

Other work that may be devolved to the court of first instance is in the commercial field, in particular competition and anti dumping cases, where unravelling the complicated issues of fact often entails a disproportionate amount of time and can be done by a subsidiary court of first instance working directly to the European Court of Justice.

Sir Russell Johnston: Why did the Government not wait to receive from the European Court of Justice a detailed proposal about exactly what the court wanted before agreeing to go ahead?

Mrs. Chalker: I can only tell the hon. Member for Inverness, Nair and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) that it was made quite clear, although I was not in this job at the time, that the European Court of Justice gave, as I have just given, examples of the issues that it wanted considered. I do not know why, but as far as I know, the issues have not been put in formal terms. I understand that they are no different from the terms that I have described.

Mr. Leighton: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Chalker: I will not give way. I have waited a long time to try to clear up matters. I shall now do that. If other questions are asked, so be it. Quite understandably, some hon. Members have expressed concern at the provision in the Single European Act which empowers the Council, acting unanimously at the request of the Court of Justice, to amend title III of the court's statute to meet changing needs. Hon. Members anxiety is that this could be a constitutional innovation allowing the Council to amend a protocol to the treaty without reference to the Parliaments of member states. That is a mistaken view. Article 3 of the protocol of the statute of the European Court of Justice deals only with the procedures of the court. It does not deal with substantive powers or with its composition or organisation. The provision in article 12, which refers to the EC treaty, simply allows the court's procedure to be amended in the Council by unanimity. That would make it easier and quicker to produce procedural reforms, but not substantive reforms or reforms of composition or organisation. It is severely limited.

The substantive powers of the court, about which hon. Members were rightly concerned, are laid down in the EC treaty and not in the protocol. We have been speaking only of the protocol. Those substantive powers of the court can be changed only by treaty amendment and that would require the unanimous agreement of the member states and the consent of national Parliaments. The fear in that regard does not hold good.

We are not proposing a constitutional innovation. Articles 165 and 166 of the EC treaty provide that the Council of Ministers, acting unanimously on a proposal from the European Court, can already increase the number of judges and advocates-general and make consequential amendments to the court's statute.

A number of hon. Members referred to the words "any court" in clause 2. I fully understand why the phrase may have seemed a little strange on first reading. The Single European Act does not establish the court of first instance. It enables the Council, acting unanimously, to establish such a court on a proposal by the European Court of Justice. As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber pointed out, no such formal proposal has yet been made and the Council of Ministers has not therefore been in a position to take a decision. We shall consider a decision only when a formal proposal is made. Anyway, a decision could not be taken until the Single European Act was in force throughout the Community. I am not a lawyer, but I am told that it is premature in legal terms to talk about "the court", as the court of first instance does not yet exist. Therefore, the court does not have a name and the legal terminology "any" is the correct term. The only court for which the provision will be used is that provided for in articles 4, 11 and 26 of the Single European Act, whatever form it takes.

The word "any" also covers the possibility that the European Court of Justice may propose a single body or, for example, two specialist chambers, one for staff cases and one for preliminary fact finding in commercial cases, which would be separate, but similar, exercises.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend started by saying that she visualised only one further court being spawned by the European Court, but now she says that there might be two courts. Does she deny that, given the way in which the Bill is written, there could be a proliferation of courts at a later stage and that the House would be unable to do anything about it?

Mrs. Chalker: Yes, that could be possible, in order to speed up the work of the court and to get through the time-consuming but necessary fact-finding. However, the thought and the intention have always been to establish a sensible and clear manner of proceeding—not one that grows in the way that my hon. Friend fears, but one that is decided by the Council of Ministers, acting unanimously. We have the very safeguard for which my hon. Friend asks.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Although my hon. Friend believes that there is protection in the unanimity of the council, does she accept that there is genuine concern about a proliferation in the number of courts. Might not the answer be to amend clause 2 so that these agreements by the Council of Ministers are subject to the approval of the Parliaments of member states just as most of the regulations promoted by the Council of Ministers are? Would that not be a useful amendment to the Bill, and will the Government suggest it to the Council of Ministers?

Mrs. Chalker: I shall look again at what my hon. Friend has said. However, because we are talking about procedures and not about the composition, organisation or substantive powers, I think that my hon. Friend is unnecessarily concerning himself.

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Chalker: I should like to get on, because we have had a long debate and the hour is late. I should like to comment on the points that have been raised.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) opened the debate, he commented on the provision in article 12. I have already explained that the provision in article 12 simply covers the court's procedure. We are seeking to make it easier and quicker to introduce procedural reforms. But I assure him that substantive changes of the Court's powers will have to go before national Parliaments. There is nothing in the Single European Act or in this Bill that alters that in any way. I hope that my hon. Friend will realise that the court's procedure is largely a technical matter. It is unnecessary for it to go through the full treaty amendment procedure. It is the unanimity requirement that constitutes the safeguard in the unlikely event that a proposed change of procedure would adversely affect the interests of member states, or individuals or bodies within those member states. That is the safeguard. I am not prepared to accept the amendment, because it would change the substance of the Single European Act, as it was agreed by the Heads of Government. However, I take on board all that my hon. Friend said in this somewhat long debate. I understand that he is asking reasonable questions—as he sees them—and although I may not agree with him, he has every right to ask them.

I was also asked about several items that I have not covered previously. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East asked about the size of the staff of the court of first instance and its cost. He was concerned that it should not grow. Indeed, I share the concern that staff numbers should not grow out of proportion. He cited figures for employment in the Commission, but he took a very different situation from the one facing us. We are now a Community of 12, and we are not likely to be other than a Community of 12 for as far as anybody can reasonably foresee.

I cannot give my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East estimates until the European Court of Justice makes proposals for the terms of reference of the court of first instance. But because those terms of reference will be determined by the Council acting unanimously when it decides on the establishment of the court of first instance, it will be possible for the member Governments, acting together in the Council of Ministers, to satisfy themselves on the level of staffing and costs before agreeing to the establishment of such a court. I assure my hon. Friend that that will be done.

Mr. Budgen: I have taken a slight interest in Turkey's application to join the EEC. As it happens, I obtained a copy of tomorrow's edition of the Financial Times. On, I think, page 3 there is a large article about the new application from Turkey to join the EEC. There is a great deal of vague and friendly talk, particularly from the French, about Turkey. From her position of great importance and power, my hon. Friend has, in an important part of her speech, blocked the way for Turkey. Those of us who wish to see an on-going, generous, open-armed EEC have great hopes for Turkey. We want to draw attention to

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I find it difficult to relate that intervention to the amendment.

11.45 pm

Mr. Budgen: But my hon. Friend denied Turkish application for membership as an important part of her argument. Since she speaks with enormous authority and, plainly, from a prepared brief, we should have an immediate statement so that those in Turkey who are preparing their new application may know whether the Minister speaks with the authority of the Prime Minister and the Government.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope that the Minister will not be tempted to stray out of order.

Mrs. Chalker: Whatever my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) says, he will not soft soap me into stepping out of order.

I was trying to reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East. I have already covered what he said about article 12 and rule changes. He asked how often rule changes could be made. It is for the Council of Ministers to change rules when necessary. I cannot imagine that the court would wish to have its rules constantly changed. There would have to be good reasons for the Twelve, acting together, to change the rules. My hon. Friend also asked about the increasing power of the European courts. There is no increase in their power.

A number of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) asked about articles 4, 11, and 26. Three articles are required because the European Court of Justice acts for the three treaties. Article 4 amends the treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community; article 11 amends the EEC treaty in identical terms; and article 26 amends the European Atomic Energy Community treaty to provide for the court of first instance. All three treaties must be amended in this way because the European Court has a single statute and rules of procedure, but they cover all three Communities, so the amendment must affect all three. I hope that that helps the hon. Gentleman.

[Mrs. Chalker]

I was asked about the unusual phrase, "natural or legal person". A "natural" person is an individual, I am told, and a "legal" person is a body corporate — mainly companies, but it does not apply to institutions or to member states. That means that as defined in paragraph 1 of article 32 of Chapter I of title II of the Single European Act, we are dealing with individuals or bodies corporate, not with member states or institutions.

Mr. Foulkes: Can the Minister deal with a point with which I have been waiting for her to deal since 7 o'clock this evening?

Mrs. Chalker: We did not start until about a quarter past.

Mr. Foulkes: I was anticipating the hon. Lady's speech, of course. Indeed, I thought about it this morning.

Will the Minister now deal with what my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) said about individuals who are resident in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man but who are British citizens and have British passports? Will account be taken of them?

Mrs. Chalker: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman has someone extra special in mind, but if he is a British citizen he is covered, as any other British citizen is covered, if he has a case that is within the rules.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow asked whether any natural or legal person could bring a case before the European Court of Justice within the treaty rules. Under article 173(2) he could — the nationality or employment provided for in the rules are immaterial in that case. Whether a case would go to the full European Court of Justice would depend not on the status of a person as an individual but on the subject matter of the case and whether it should be allocated to the court of first instance or rest with the European Court of Justice. Those details still have to be settled by the Council of Ministers, acting unanimously.

I was asked a series of other questions about cases that have been before the European Court of Justice and how compliance had been insisted upon. Once the court had ruled on the distribution of political funds — the example quoted — and that the matter was outside the powers of the European Parliament, it was for the European Parliament to implement the judgment. I understand that the European Parliament is now considering what to do. The point is that once the European Court of Justice has ruled, it is for the body on which it has ruled to take the appropriate action. If it does not do so, there may be a further intervention by the court, but that would depend very much on the case.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow asked about chambers of the court rather than the court of first instance, and I understand why he raised that point. The European Court of Justice already divides into chambers, but it is still swamped by the very many cases and the intricate detail of them. What would not be done by creating additional chambers, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, would be to dispose of the enormous work load on the judges of the court. It would make much more sense to deal with the additional work load by determining a particular class or type of action that could be dealt with separately, such as unravelling all that detail. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that in some constituency cases we wish that there were someone to unravel the detail before reaching a conclusion. It is something not unlike that.

The important thing is that the European Court of Justice will be free to devote itself to cases that are brought by member states or Community institutions and not widen, as hon. Members rightly feared, the scope of the cases coming before it.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way because she has been patient. It is an important point on which there is some ambiguity. We can understand a lower court preparing a case and unravelling the details before it goes to the higher European Court of Justice, but we understand from the terms of the treaty that there is no appeal other than on a point of law. Is she saying that in certain circumstances the new courts will, nevertheless, at the request of the European Court of Justice have some form of preliminary hearing, or will it be the whole case? If it is unravelling the difficulties, there must be a passage from one court to the other, other than on a point of law.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, but the detail of how exactly this will work has still to be determined, which is why I have been interested in the debate this evening. In determining exactly what should be referred to the court of first instance, it can delineate what can be left there and what can go back up to the European Court of Justice. Given the terms under which the idea of the court of first instance was arrived at, that is not something that will give us any difficulty. The aim is to relieve the work load of the European Court by lessening the detailed work that it has to undertake. The European Court will hear the cases once the detail has been unravelled.

It is evident from the debate that an infinite number of questions could be asked on these matters. Many of the questions this evening have been hypothetical, but it is important that I tackle two of the questions of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East. My hon. Friend asked whether rule changes to the European Parliament would be subject to national Parliaments. I hope that I have satisfied him on that score. He then asked whether the Government had sought the views of the United Kingdom courts on the impact and the power of the European Courts. As I have already explained to him, as there is no change in the power of the European Court of Justice, its impact and power will be no different from that which we face now. It is for the House to decide, as it will do in a moment, no doubt——

Mr. Budgen: Is my hon. Friend assuming the power of the Chair now?

Mrs. Chalker: That was a manner of speaking. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West forgets how late the hour is.

I was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East about Clause 2(b) on the issue of false statements in the court of first instance. My hon. Friend wanted to know whether the issue would be tried and, if necessary, whether punishment would be imposed by the European Court rather than the British court. That will not happen. Section 11(1) of the European Communities Act 1972 provides that those who make false statements during sworn evidence before the European Court shall be guilty of an offence under United Kingdom law and may be proceeded against in a British court as if they had committed the perjury here. My hon. Friend need not have concern on that ground.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East raised a number of other matters, one of which I shall try to answer without straying from the rules of procedure. My hon. Friend asked about European Commission action against the United Kingdom if we were to fail to harmonise in accordance with the obligations of the Single European Act. The European Court will have the jurisdiction in future, just as it has now, to decide whether member states are acting in accordance with their obligations. That will apply to the Single European Act as it does in respect of the three Community treaties.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Chalker: Yes, if my hon. Friend will allow me to finish what I am saying.

The Commission will not be able to bring actions against member states in the court of first instance. That is expressly excluded by the final sentence of the first paragraphs in the new provisions in articles 4, 11 and 26 of the single Act, which I described in response to the speech of the hon. Member for Walthamstow.

On the specific issue of the harmonisation of VAT and excise duties, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East, the amended article 99 makes it clear that any decisions imposing new obligations on member states must be taken by unanimity. I suspect that we shall be dealing with that in a later debate if the relevant amendment is called.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend has been helpful on an important issue and I am grateful to her. She said that the Commission could not take the power to say that Britain had not harmonised its VAT adequately for the purposes of article 99 in the court of first instance. That is clear and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that. Would it be possible for the Commission to take action in the normal Court of Justice because Britain had not harmonised in accordance with article 99. That is something that every taxpayer wants to know.

Mrs. Chalker: It would be, if that were the case and we were so subject, but the position is not altered by the Bill. It is not altered by the Single European Act. I think, Sir Paul, that you will allow me to debate that when we consider amendment No. 7, and you would rule me out of order if I went further down that path.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend has said that the court will take account of the Single European Act. To what extent will the court take account of the preamble?

Mrs. Chalker: I intended to refer to that. The preamble concerns aims and objectives. The preamble in no way changes rights or responsibilities. Therefore, it fits together with the rest of the Act. It does not, in itself, confer a right or an obligation. As a statement of aims and objectives it is part of the whole. It is not a covert step, as my hon. Friend seeks to say.

We have had a long debate on a complicated issue, which has been further complicated by the misapprehensions of a number of my hon. Friends and hon. Gentlemen. This sensible, clear-cut and eminently practical measure can ease the load on the European Court of Justice in a forthright and sensible way. Amendments Nos. 1, 4 and 38 would not help in any way. In fact, they would hinder that objective. For those reasons, I urge the House to reject the amendments.

Mr. Marlow: Sir Paul, on a point of order—

Mr. John Cope (Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Marlow (Seated and covered): Sir Paul, on a point of order. I raised a point of order before the Whip rose to speak. That was quite clear. I think that all Conservative Members would rightly, like me to raise the point of order. Am I entitled to raise my point of order?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I shall not take the point of order during the Division.

Mr. Marlow (Seated and covered): I raised a point of order before the Division was called.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I will hear the hon. Member after the Division.

Mr. Marlow (Seated and covered): The point of order will not be relevant after the Division. Are you trying to silence Back-Benchers?

The Committee having divided: Ayes 117, Noes 34.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Sir Paul. Before the Division and before the closure, I sought to raise with you a point of order. I rose to my feet as the Minister was sitting down, and I got to my feet before the Whip got to his feet. I asked to raise a point of order. My hon. Friends are well aware of the fact that I sought to raise the point of order before the Whip got to his feet.

I do not know how one can have an objective assessment of this, but can I ask you to listen to the Hansard tapes, when you will find out that I sought to raise that point of order before the Whip got to his feet? I know that it was a great convenience for the Government to get the closure, because I would have asked that we report progress. I would have done so at this time of night because it is an important debate and many hon. Members who wished to speak did not have an opportunity to speak. If it is the case that I wished to raise that point of order before the Division, knowing that my hon. Friend will now ask you to report progress, can we reverse the situation, do without that closure and continue the debate?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Points of order were put to me simultaneously and I exercised my discretion to take the point of order on the closure——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Moate rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I allowed the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) to raise his point of order, but I must immediately put the Question on amendment No. 1——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I must put the Question on amendment No. 1.

Question put accordingly, and negatived.

To report progress and ask leave to sit again.—[Mr. Cope.]

Committee report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

EDUCATION (No. 2) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 69(6) (Second Reading Committees), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

EDUCATION (No. 2) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Education (No. 2) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament—

(a) of any sums required by the Secretary of State for making grants to the Fellowship of Engineering or the Further Education Unit;

(b) of any expenses incurred by the Secretary of State attributable to provisions of that Act enabling him to make payments to any authority in substitution for block grant to which they would be entitled apart from those provisions; and

(c) of any increase in the sums payable out of money so provided under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 which is attributable to provisions of any Act resulting from the Education (No. 2) Bill regarding the payments to any authority of the amount by which their block grant for any year falls to be increased in accordance with the arrangements under the Act of 1980 for pooling expenditure by local authorities on education and for connected purposes irrespective of whether any block grant is otherwise payable to them for that year.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

EDUCATION (No. 2) BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Education (No. 2) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the recovery from any authority of sums in respect of any amount by which the block grant payable to them for any year is less than the amount, or aggregate amount, by which the block grant payable to them for the year falls to be reduced in accordance with the arrangements under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 for pooling expenditure by local authorities on education and for connected purposes.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

PATENTS, DESIGNS AND MARKS BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 69(6) (Second Reading Committees), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

SCOTTISH ESTIMATES

Ordered,

That, in the course of its consideration of Scottish Estimates, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 67 (Meetings of Standing Committees), the Scottish Grand Committee shall have leave at its sitting in Edinburgh on Monday 30th June, to sit until half-past Three o'clock.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE

Resolved,

That it is expedient that a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons be appointed to examine the processes of enacting Private Legislation and to consider whether:

(a) there are any matters of a kind at present dealt with by Private Bill which could more appropriately be dealt with some other way, taking account of the interests both of promoters and other affected parties;

(b) any changes are desirable in Private Bill procedure; and

(c) any amendments are desirable to the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936 and the procedure thereunder; and to consider whether any amendments are desirable to the Statutory Orders (Special Procedure) Act 1945.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Hot Dry Rock Project (Cornwall)

Motion made, and Question proposed That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

12.16 am

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): It gives me considerable pleasure to be able to raise Cornwall's hot rock project on the Floor of the House and to give the opportunity to the Minister to explain the Government's position, and perhaps I can guide his response with one or two questions and observations as we go on.

The basic theory of Cornwall's hot rock project is not new to many hon. Members who have followed this with any interest. Anybody who has gone down South Crofty mine will be more than aware that the rocks in Cornwall are very hot even at moderate depths. That has been well known for a long time, and it has caused some difficulty with the mining industry. The concept is that if it was possible to drill parrallel holes to a substantial depth and it was then possible to break up the rock between the bottom of those two holes and put cold water down one hole it may be possible to get hot water, indeed steam, out of the other. That is the theory and the background, and much work has gone on in that over the past decade.

By chance I had some remote connection with the origins of that. I used to work for a company in Camborne called Compair in its research and development department back in 1973, when that company, together with the local school of mines and a small company locally called Penryn Granite did a few tests using the equipment that was then available to monitor the increase of rock temperature as deeper holes were drilled.

In 1976 the Science Research Council gave the project some money and assistance. In 1977 the European Commission became involved, with much local support. Compair, my old company, and a company called Pneu-o-plant, run by a friend of mine, Mr. Williams, all put a great deal of energy and effort into it out a personal interest that in the long run this was something of above average interest.

In 1978 the Department of Energy became involved, a little slow for some of our tastes, with a six-year project and then the real work on this concept started. It is fair to say that difficulties were experienced in the early days. There was no great problem in drilling the holes. That has been done elsewhere and satisfactorily on that site. The cracking of the rock at those depths was a new concept and, in the early stages, it is fair to say that when the rocks cracked, they cracked in the wrong direction. When the cold water was put down the hole, far too large a percentage of the water just disappeared.

A rethink of the whole process, and a discovery that the problem was that the pumping was being carried out at too high a pressure led the project to drill deeper and pump at a lower pressure. Since then tremendous results have been achieved. The holes are now 2,000 m deep, and some 75 per cent. of the water is recovered. The circulation has been going on for some 7,000 hours and the temperature of the rock face, which is just short of 100 deg. C, shows no sign of falling. That is all good. It is a tremendous achievement. It is all new technology. There is no book to which the engineers could go to seek answers to the problems with which they were faced.

So far so good, but further questions remain. The general belief is that rock of 200 deg. C needs to be found, before it is likely that we can produce hot water and steam in the quantities and at the pressure and temperature required to generate electricity. The view of all the geologists is that that temperature is available at 6,000 m. The questions that I ask the Minister will revolve around the reason why the Government have not given the go ahead to drill the deeper holes.

There are technical question marks. I cannot say that there are problems because as yet we do not know. For example, water at that temperature and pressure has a quarter of the viscosity that it has at normal temperature and pressure. There is a possibility that the flow will become turbulent. If it does, the heat transfer characteristics from the rock to the water, which is extremely important, may be interfered with. It is the view of the scientists and those who have studied the matter that we shall find out only by trying. We are virtually at that point.

Some 18 months ago, the Government started on an amazing charade. First it was suggested that the project should be privatised. Dr. Tony Batchelor, who I think all would admit is the main driving force behind the project, managed to find someone who would allow it to be privatised. It was American money. The Government eventually turned it down. Whether it was because it was not enough money, or because it was American—all that was in the middle of the Westland affair—we know not. It does not make a tremendous difference. The fact is that the Government killed that aspect.

Then we started the saga of the chief scientist's report. We understand that the first draft suggested that the project would produce electricity that was as cheap as coal. The report was then redrafted. The second draft suggested that the electricity might be a great deal more expensive than coal. We then had the Russian tragedy. At that point the report went off for the third drafting. That drafting is more strongly in favour of the project than the first. The Minister will know that I tabled some questions and was promised that the report would be published. I would appreciate an idea of when that will be.

What is certain is that the Government, throughout the negotiations, allowed the project to run within days or at least weeks of the redundancy notices being handed out. The team of experts was on the verge of breaking up. We are talking about very high technology.

I have had a few Adjournment debates in my time, but I have never known a situation so transformed between the time when I obtained the Adjournment debate and reaching the opportunity to deliver my speech. Between those two dates, the Government announced that they are to fund the project for another two years—a sum of over £5·75 million is to be provided, and £1 million for something extra, which is unspecified.

Will the Minister confirm what he thinks the engineers and scientists are to do with that sum? I understand that they will be asked to continue the circulation tests to make sure that the temperature profile is maintained. I have no complaint about that. They will be asked to develop tools that are capable of drilling into higher temperature rock, which will be required at deeper depths. I have no complaint about that. Some money will be provided for shallow drilling to check the temperature profile in other parts of my county, to see whether there are other more attractive sites. I have no real complaint about that, either. My real complaint is that all adds up to a sum considerably less than what the engineers had hoped for. They will not be able to answer the fundamental question unless the Government have the courage to finance the 6,000 m hole. That is what is required. We would not expect the go-ahead to be open-ended, with no review points or analysis of what happens at various stages. However, until the go-ahead is given for the 6,000 m hole, we will not be able to answer the questions.

I understand that the tranche of money is intended to cover two years. The scientists tell me that they will be able to tell whether the 6,000 m hole is worth drilling a long time before that two year period elapses. We need to have information from the Government as to when a decision is to be taken on the hole and whether a review relative to that is planned before the two years is up? What criteria will the Minister use to judge whether that prospect is viable?

It may be that if the hole is drilled and is a success, the Government might not wish to be involved in building the electricity unit. I have no real complaints about that. If a commercial proposition can be involved, I would wish the commercial firm good luck. However, can the Minister say whether any private companies are involved at this stage or whether he expects any to become more involved as time passes?

We want the go-ahead for the 6,000 m hole with the 200 deg C rock. If that is as successful as the project has been so far—and it is worth recalling and placing on the record that the scientists have made promises and have delivered the goods—what must they do to get the go-ahead for the 6,000 m hole? There is a view that if the Government do not finance it, the hole will not be drilled. However, we seeking answers to questions that will only be answered by carrying out the research. Research is cheap in this area relative to the quantities of energy that may well be produced. It is worth recalling that there are some 6,000 million tonnes of coal equivalent within the south west basin. Even a small percentage of that will be worth recovering.

The scientists want answers to those questions and I am delighted to have been able to give the Minister the opportunity to clarify these matters. I know that the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd) wishes to ask some questions, so I will finish my remarks.

Mr. David Mudd (Falmouth and Camborne): I would like to congratulate the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) on his success in securing the debate and I am especially grateful that he has allowed me the opportunity to speak. Although the hon. Gentleman lays claim to the entire county of Cornwall as his county, the constituency in which the project is carried out is exclusively mine. I can therefore speak from a differenct point of view from the hon. Member for Truro, as I know more about the facts and a little less of the political folklore that it has generated during the past five or six years.

The hon. Gentleman was rather scathing in his suggestion that the Department of Energy has been less than enthusiastic in its support for the project. I can set the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest and tell him the facts which he could easily have obtained had he so wished. Far from being reluctant to give government support, since 1980 the Department of Energy has provided £20 million of taxpayers' investment even before the £5·75 million announced as recently as Thursday of last week to see the project through the next two critical years.

The hon. Gentleman thought that the Department of Energy was dragging its heals. Perhaps he is unaware that I had the honour of pressing the Department to make its decision over the past three months and that that decision was partly associated with my effirts to obtain that early announcement.

I welcome the fact the Camborne School of Mines has been awarded a contract and that it will be using Geoscience Ltd. as its sub-contractors. Not only does that guarantee a continuity of exploration, development and exploitation but it suggests that a continued public sector participation rather than a move to the private sector at this stage, will continue to enhance the inter-change of technical knowledge from various competing projects in Germany, Sweden and California. Had the Commercial sector been brought in inopportunely at this stage, it would have inhibited the all important exchanges of knowledge which are so vital to the project worldwide.

Moreover, the work to be carried out within the new contract period to the end of September 1988 should allay one of the hon. Gentleman's fears, namely, the complete dissipation of the highly professional and expert work team. They now know that they have the guarantees to be able to work together to arrive at áll important decisions about what ultimately might be capable of commercial exploitation.

It is right that the next two years should be seen as the preliminary years of an eight-year programme which could lead to the construction and operation of a power plant in south-west England. That will be a commercial decision and the next two years, which are now firmly guaranteed by the announcement on Thursday, were never in doubt. It was never considered that that support would be withdrawn. The announcement will provide the necessary time for industrial concerns to consider a concerted approach to the development of a pilot plant. It will also give the important and valuable techology the chance to prove itself.

I hope that details of continued Government support will be made at the latest half way through this new contract period, since I certainly share the hon. Gentleman's view that there can be no denying that delay and prevarication hits morale, causes alarm among those who work on the project and, understandably, leads to the danger of various experts being seduced by private corporations, offering them long-term prospects.

The two years guaranteed in Thursday's announcement must be used to encourage industrial interest to exploit the technology and to take some of the risks associated with research; to help smooth the transition from full Government support to commercial operation; and to make easier the transition from research to development without any significant extra demands on taxpayers.

I welcome the partnership of Camborne School of Mines with Geoscience Ltd. in what is now internationally regarded as one of Britain's most promising renewable energy projects. I am proud that in Cornwall, where so much traditional industry and expertise is under threat, my constituency has become the scene of one of the world's most active research programmes into using natural sources for the production of much-needed energy.

12.32 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) on securing the debate tonight and thank him for opening it. I welcome his interest in one of the promising renewable energy sources that the Government are examining as part of their renewable energy research and development programme. I am particularly pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd) has been able to contribute to the debate, because he has put the record straight on some important points. My hon. Friend is a great lobbyist on behalf of the hot dry rocks project in his constituency.

I am also delighted to see in his place my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris). In recent months both my hon. Friends have been pressing me hard on behalf of the project to make the announcement that I was able to make on Thursday. I am sorry I could not make it earlier, but I made it at the earliest possible opportunity.

When the House debated the alternative sources of energy on 25 October 1985 I stressed that in many cases we were working on the frontiers of science to establish the renewable technologies firmly in our energy future. In many respects our geothermal hot dry rock work is in the vanguard of this technological advance.

Since 1980 we have been engaged in one of the most active research programmes worldwide into the possibility of obtaining energy from hot dry rocks beneath the earth's surface. We have invested £20 million in this programme. The prospects are encouraging and for that reason we announced last Thursday that a further £6·85 million will go into this research programme. The major part of this investment will be the extension of the programme carried out by the Camborne School of Mines in Cornwall for a further two year's work from October 1986, and it will cost £5·85 million. Other related work will cost a further £1 million.

Our hope is to have a commercial prototype in operation with industrial collaboration by the mid-1990s. The work that we have now commissioned will allow us to make decisions as to what could be capable of commercial exploitation.

The hon. Gentleman may know that I was delighted to have the opportunity of visiting the project last week in the company of my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne. I had the opportunity then of talking to the team directly and I thanked them for their loyalty and the hard work that they have put into the project.

When the hon. Gentleman throws doubt on whether an announcement could now be made to move on to the next stage, I hope that he will accept from me that I raised that issue with the project team, most of whom were at the meeting with me last Thursday. They all agreed that it was not yet possible to move on to that stage. Everybody was resolved in their determination that the two-year extension would enable us as quickly as possible to move on to making a decision about drilling to a deeper depth.

Mr. Penhaligon: This is important. Is the Minister clearly saying that the decision to go for the 6,000 m hole can be taken a long time before that two years is up, provided, I accept, that the evidence suggests that that is the logical thing to do?

Mr. Hunt: I can be quite clear with the hon. Gentleman, because I was pressed in the meeting by my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne to make clear exactly what was proposed. I set a target of being in a position to make the decision at some stage next year. I offered to accept a further invitation from my hon. Friend to visit the project in his constituency at an appropriate time next year when I hope that the necessary work will have been completed which will enable us to make a decision on drilling to a deeper depth in good time before the expiry of the two-year period at the end of September 1988.

I want to stress again that the Government are firmly committed to developing and promoting all economic renewable technologies which have potential to make an economic contribution to the United Kingdom's energy supply. While geothermal hot dry rock technology is very much a technology for the 21st century, other technologies that we have developed such as passive solar design and waste derived fuels are economic now and we are actively promoting their take-up in the market place.

Major advances have been made on other technologies and some have real promise of becoming economic in the United Kingdom in the near future. In that respect I am encouraged by the progress that we are making in wind power and the next twelve months will see the completion and commissioning of our horizontal and vertical axis machines on Orkney and at Carmarthen bay.

Since 1979 the Government have spent over £81 million on a comprehensive range of research and development for the renewable technologies, a wise investment given that renewable energy sources have the potential to contribute over 30 million tonnes of coal equivalent per annum to the United Kingdom's energy supply by 2025. No Government have ever had such a positive attitude to wind and tidal energy, to geothermal hot dry rock technology and to renewable sources of energy generally. If the research and development on geothermal hot dry rock is successful and we can move to commercial exploitation then the resource could be significantly increased.

We are currently carrying out a major programme to develop this promising technology at Rosemanowes quarry, which if successful could extract heat from deep impermeable rocks at depths between 4,000 m and 6,000 m.

As the hon. Member for Truro said, the programme started in 1977 and it is designed to realise and to determine the technical and economic viability of hot dry rock systems in the United Kingdom. The possible uses envisaged for hot dry rocks are electricity generation, combined heat and power schemes and the direct use of heat.

At this point I should like to refer to Richard Shock's report. I regret that the hon. Member for Truro made a number of unjust accusations about this report. There has never been any secrecy about it. A report on the economic viability of hot dry rocks was commissioned by my Department last year. The report by Dr. Richard Shock, the chief officer of the chief scientists' group at the energy technology support unit, is in its final draft stages and it is intended that the report should be published as soon as possible. The draft report has been discussed extensively and will take account of comments made by experts in the field, including experts at the Camborne school of mines and Dr. Tony Batchelor. The report examines the economics of hot dry rocks for electricity only, combined heat and power and heat only and is likely to conclude that electricity production is the most attractive option for hot dry rock technology.

The cost of generation is subject to a large number of uncertainties, such as drilling costs and flow in the reservoir, but it is estimated to be 4·5p per kilowatt hour. However, there is a large amount of uncertainty about this figure. The work to be carried out over the next two years will help to eliminate these uncertainties.

As the hon. Member for Truro will know, the main work on the hot dry rock geothermal research has been carried out by the Camborne School of Mines at the site in Cornwall and the research there has reached an interesting stage. The hon. Member for Truro sought to encompass that in his speech and spoke about the intermediate depth system. That has now been established and is currently being developed. Three holes have been drilled in the rock to a maximum depth of about 2·5 km and experiments have been carried out to open up the natural joints in the rock in order to create a series of fractures between the holes. The object is to achieve good circulation of water through the fracture system or reservoir so that we can be sure that if commercial systems are created at between 4 and 6 km, the flow rates will be sufficient for the economic production of electricity. Although the basic idea sounds easy, I can assure the House that the problems in creating such a system are complex.

I am delighted that we have some of the best brains in the world present on this project site in Cornwall. Other countries have hot dry rock projects, but the United Kingdom has established itself as the world leader in this technology. I went to see the project last week and I was delighted to hear that the Camborne team has now achieved the highest circulation rates in the world to date. It did that approximately four weeks ago. The circulation rate is about 30 litres per second.

Mr. Penhaligon: If what the Minister has just said are the best brains in the world in this technology reach the conclusion some time before the two years are up that now is the time to start drilling the 6 km holes, will he give the go ahead and finance that drilling before the two years are up?

Mr. Hunt: I have already made absolutely clear and I make it clear again that I have set the team a target, which it has readily accepted, that it should place my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in a position next year to make a major decision. Everyone agrees that further work must be done first in order to eliminate the uncertainty. At the meeting I attended last week, nobody expected me to go further than that. When I visited the site in Cornwall at the invitation of my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne for the first time in November 1984, and again last week, I was most impressed by the techniques developed by the research team there and the standard of research carried out.

In a review of renewable energy research and development in 1985, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's advisory council on research and development, ACORD, endorsed hot, dry rock geothermal energy as a "promising but uncertain" renewable technology. ACORD share my view about the high standards of research achieved by the Camborne team. ACORD recommended that the work in Cornwall should continue, and I fully support this view.

The extension of the work for a further two years beyond October 1986 will enable the complex problems of reservoir formation and the extent of the geothermal resource to be fully understood. This will, if successful, enable us to demonstrate the technical and economic case for a new programme at greater depth, leading to the commercialisation of hot dry rock technology. That is the assurance that my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne has constantly sought from me. I have told him many times that there was never any question of terminating the project at this stage. The question was how best we could carry it through to the next stage. The work will continue, with the Camborne School of Mines in the lead. I am anxious to see that every opportunity is given to United Kingdom industry to become involved in the technology so that eventual commercialisation can take place in the United Kingdom economy. A major aim of the two-year extension will, therefore, be to develop a suitable broad based institutional structure for the project, and United Kingdom companies are being encouraged to participate.

It is also essential that we continue to collaborate in hot dry rock research internationally, and I am pleased that the European Community has so far contributed about £2 million to the work in Cornwall and a further £1 million is expected. The other major project on hot dry rocks is being carried out near Los Alamos in the United States and there is close collaboration technically between the Camborne school of mines and the Los Alamos team. Collaboration is also under way with a joint French-West German project at Soultz, which involves the drilling of a 1 km deep hole to provide a facility to develop hot dry rock techniques. That project is also partly funded by the European Community. The possibility of collaboration on hot dry rocks research with Sweden is also currently being discussed.

The longer-term aim of the United Kingdom programme is to have a commercial protoype in operation at about 6 kilometres depth in collaboration with suitable commercial companies by about the mid-1990s. This depends, however, on whether the technical targets at the present depth of 2,000 m can be fully achieved, and whether it can be shown that hot dry rock technology has sound prospects for commercial viability.

The next two years will be an important proving time for the technology. The project will be subject to review during that period so that all options for the future can be fully considered. I hope that if the review of the longer-term technical and economic prospects for the technology is favourable, a case can be made for a new programme of work at 6 km leading to a commercial prototype.

I am sure that the House wishes the Camborne team every success in achieving the necessary technical targets that we have now set for the programme. The Government will continue to back the most promising technologies and promote further technological advance wherever necessary to encourage the use of renewable energy sources. Our commitment to geothermal hot dry rock is a clear statement of that intent.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes to One o'clock.

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Falkland Islands

1. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there has been any change in the pattern of patrols in the south Atlantic following the sinking of a fishing vessel by the Argentine navy off the Falklands Islands.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): My hon. Friend will, I am sure, understand that I cannot provide details of Royal Navy patrol patterns in the south Atlantic. However, Her Majesty's Government have strongly condemned the deplorable attack on an unarmed fishing vessel in international waters by an Argentine coastguard vessel on 28 May, with resultant loss of life.

Mr. McCrindle: I understand the Minister's inability to be specific, but will he give the House an assurance that the Government remain satisfied that the level of naval patrolling within our terroritorial waters around the Falklands remains adequate to deter the sort of movement to which I referred in my question? More generally, has the incident caused Her Majesty's Government to reconsider the prospect, to which they look forward, of reducing the garrison on the Falkland Islands?

Mr. Stanley: I can assure my hon. Friend that we keep our force levels under review, and at present we are certainly satisfied that our force levels in the south Atlantic are appropriate to meet the threat.

Mr. Cartwright: As the seas around the Falkland Islands now seem to be becoming a traffic jam of foreign trawlers, all intent on stripping the islands of one of its most important assets, is it not time that Britain and Argentina got together to try to agree some sensible policy for protecting the fish stock?

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that fisheries policy is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. He will also be aware that Government policy is to try to produce a multinational solution to that problem.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Are Her Majesty's Government aware that, as a result of this example of frightfulness, the British people of the Falkland Islands are the more resolved that they shall not pass under the sovereignty or administration of Argentina?

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He knows, as well as anybody else, that on every possible occasion in recent years the people of the Falkland Islands have made it clear that they wish to remain under a British Government.

Mr. Dalyell: Whatever the ministerial responsibility, what are the Government, as a whole, going to do about the ecological disaster of over-fishing?

Mr. Stanley: As I have already said, the Government are trying to negotiate a satisfactory multinational fishing regime.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Will my right hon. Friend continue, privately and effectively, to point out to the Foreign Office the extra burden that will fall upon the Royal Navy should Britain decide to go for a unilateral conservation regime in that part of the world?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend makes a very pertinent point.

Chemical Weapons

2. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the implications for the speed of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's reaction to a chemical attack from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in a future conflict of all North Atlantic Treaty Organisation chemical weapons being stored in the United States of America.

Mr. Stanley: If the hon. Member is implying a reaction with chemical weapons, the implications would be determined by a variety of factors, such as which delivery systems the United States chose and whether there had been any contingent deployments of chemical weapons to other NATO countries by the time any Warsaw pact attack with chemical weapons took place.

Mr. Caborn: I thank the Minister for that answer. Does he agree that such a movement of chemical weapons across the Atlantic could be seen as being extremely provocative in times of tension? Has he seen any estimates of shipping such weaponry across the Atlantic, for example, for the stockpiles in West Germany?

Mr. Stanley: On the basis of the hon. Gentleman's argument, NATO would have no reinforcement plans whatsoever. I would put to him a contrary point of view: that, at times of tension, it is fundamentally important that the NATO Alliance shows its resolve to resist and so preserve deterrence.

Mr. Lyell: Is it not a fact that, at the moment, the Russians have a massive chemical capability which would put our conventional forces at a huge disadvantage if there were an attack in north-western Europe, and that unilateralism and its disadvantages apply just as much to chemical warfare as to nuclear disarmament? Should the House not remember that before the second world war Britain had a massive gas capability and that, as a result, Hitler never dared to use gas?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. and learned Friend is entirely right to draw attention to the relationship between preserving a viable chemical deterrent and preserving our conventional deterrent. He is entirely right to stress, as we have done often from the Dispatch Box, that if the Warsaw pact, through being able to launch chemical attacks on our forces with impunity, was able to oblige our forces to fight continuously in protective clothing while not being under any such disadvantage itself, it would confer an enormous advantage on its conventional forces.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Minister think that the deployment of chemical weapons across the Atlantic at a time of tension would help to heighten, or to relieve, tension?

Mr. Stanley: That would obviously depend entirely on the circumstances of the time. As I said in reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), we believe, as previous Governments believed, that it is critical that NATO countries should have reinforcement plans and show their will and determination to reinforce at a time of tension.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Why is it automatically assumed that the way to deter chemical weapons is by the use of chemical weapons and that the way to respond to a chemical weapon attack is to use them, when there are plenty of other options which the Minister does not seem to allow for in his answers?

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the NATO defensive posture is one of flexible response. It is, therefore, open to NATO countries to use the range of their capabilities. The essence of our deterrence is that we do not signal in advance the form of response that we might make to any form of Soviet agression.

Mr. Terlezki: Does my right hon. Friend agree that we ought to ask the Soviet Union to get rid of 300,000 tonnes of chemical weapons so that there is no need for other countries to produce or use them, thereby increasing the peace, security and well-being of the whole world?

Mr. Stanley: That is, and remains, the first objective of the Government's policy. Everybody's defence and security interests would be best served by disposing of these weapons altogether. As some of my hon. Friends have already rightly said, the Soviet Union has been responsible for this major escalation and extension of the chemical threat, as it has modernised and expanded its chemical stocks, when none has been produced by Britain since the 1950s and by the United States since 1969.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Is it not a fact that these binary weapons are no use in the United States, and that they are of use only if they are located in Europe, because that is presumably where the war would come? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the next step is for the United States to request that the bigeye bomb and other versions of these weapons be located in Britain at Upper Heyford and Lakenheath? If so, what would be the Government's response?

Mr. Stanley: As we have told the right hon. Gentleman and the House often, United States policy is that these weapons should remain in the United States during peacetime. As to what would happen at a time of tension or war, as we have said many times it would be matter for decision by the Government of the day in the light of all the circumstances at the time.

Nimrod Airborne Radar Programme

3. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made towards completion of the Nimrod airborne radar programme.

15. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report on progress being made in bringing Nimrod airborne early warning aircraft into service.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): A full statement on the Nimrod airborne early warning project was made to the House by my right hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement during the debate on the Royal Air Force, on 26 February, at columns 962-65 of the Official Report. The present position is that we have received proposals for AEW systems from six contractors, including GEC Avionics and three United States companies — Boeing, Grumman and Lockheed. In addition, we have had proposals from the United States Government to supply either of the systems in current United States military service through foreign military sales arrangements. All contractors have been asked to submit firm price proposals by 7 July.

Mr. Carlile: Why has the tender date for the programme been moved so often—four times, I believe? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the constant moving of the tender date has caused great uncertainty, especially for one of the companies concerned? Does he agree that the tender date has been moved so often because of a running dispute between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence?

Mr. Lee: We are running a fair competition and we intend to be totally even-handed.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend will be aware that a number of the overseas proposals would provide aircraft other than the Nimrod. Will he say whether he foresees that, in the event of one of these contractors being selected, the 11 AEW Nimrods could be redeployed in the ASW role?

Mr. Lee: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his contribution, and his suggestion will be considered, as will any cost-effective solution.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not the scandal of Nimrod, made my Marconi Underwater Systems Ltd. surpassed only by the scandal of Marconi's Tigerfish—the torpedo that does not work? Does not Marconi Underwater Systems Ltd. need a major shake-up? Is not the only reason why it purchased the services of the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) that it could effectively, perhaps, impress Cabinet members with undue pressure?

Mr. Lee: All I would say to the hon. Gentleman is that in fact we are in the air, not under water, at the present time. I repeat, that this is a project of which historically neither the industry nor the Ministry of Defence can be particularly proud.

Sir Antony Buck: Ignoring the rather intemperate remarks of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours, is my hon. Friend able to say when he will be able to say something definitive about the programme? Will it be a matter of months, or a year? When will he be able to to tell us something rather more firm and specific about the future of this programme?

Mr. Lee: Obviously we shall carefully evaluate the proposals. At present we have a team of about 50 officials working on the overall project.

Mr. McNamara: Does the Minister accept that the last statement seems to indicate that the Ministry is all at sea over this particular matter? Will he explain why on this occasion, as on previous occasions, the Ministry has decided to move the goal posts in terms of tendering? This has all the unsavoury atmosphere of what attended the tendering for the RAF trainer. Will the Minister tell the House whether the Ministry has given up all belief in a British early warning over the horizon radar system? Will he give an undertaking that the announcement of the decision about which system is to be adopted will be made in this House and will not be either leaked from the Ministry or slipped out while the House is in recess?

Mr. Lee: I am sure that in due course the decision will be announced in this House, although the decision will be for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I repeat, in reply to the hon. Gentleman's earlier points, that in this competition we intend to be totally even-handed.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that in the Nimrod we have a first-class airframe with a first-class engine and many experienced RAF crews to operate them? Is it really beyond the wit of this country's electronics industry to provide an adequate radar set with which to fulfil the contract?

Mr. Lee: With respect, it would be inappropriate for me to answer that question or to be drawn, apart from repeating once again that we are in full and genuine competition.

Chemical Weapons

4. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation force goal on chemical weapons includes air-delivered munitions.

Mr. Stanley: This force goal invites the United States to modernise its chemical weapon stocks with binary munitions. The force goal itself is classified. The United States Government's plans for the modernisation of its chemical weapon stocks are set out in the United States Defence Secretary's annual report to Congress for the fiscal year 1987 and includes an air-delivered weapon.

Mr. Pike: Have the Government discussed with the Americans contingency plans about where, in times of crisis, these appalling chemical weapons will be sited in this country? If such discussions have taken place, will the Minister make the public of this country aware of where they will be placed? If discussions have not taken place, will he tell the House in what circumstances they will be sited in this country?

Mr. Stanley: No such discussions have taken place to date. As we have said many times, if a proposal is put to us, it will be considered by the Government at the time.

Mr. Conway: Bearing in mind the amount of time that British troops in Germany spend on training in nuclear, biological and chemical safety suits, what are the chances of protection for those troops if we follow the advice of the Labour and Liberal parties and independently and unilaterally do away with our nuclear deterrent, which does afford those front-line troops some protection, as we did with chemical weapons and got no response from the Soviet Union?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend is entirely right to draw attention—and I hope that it will be noted more widely—to the one-sided disarmament tendencies inside the Liberal party.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister said that there would be an air-delivered system. Why does he not make it clear that by air delivery what is meant is the F111s at Upper Heyford and Lakenheath delivering bigeye bombs, as that is the only way in which they can be delivered? Why does he not admit that plans for that are already in operation?

Mr. Stanley: No such plans have been put to us, but if the right hon. Gentleman is concerned about the alternative means of delivery for the United States chemical weapon deterrent, I hope he will bear in mind that the Soviet Union is now able to deliver chemical weapons over any of the NATO countries of western Europe from the sea, from the air, from land-based missiles and from artillery.

Experimental Aircraft Programme

5. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what lessons have been drawn by his Department from the experimental aircraft programme.

Mr. Lee: The experimental aircraft project is yielding valuable practical experience in the integration of a wide range of advanced technologies for new sophisticated combat aircraft.

Mr. Atkins: Is it not essential that the first British fighter for 30 years should fly within its full flight envelope at Farnborough this year in order to maintain the technical lead that we have over the French counterpart, which will fly? Will he join me in urging all those involved in the industrial dispute at British Aerospace to resolve their difficulties as a matter of urgency and get back to making aeroplanes that can beat the competition?

Mr. Lee: I was with my hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence at the impressive roll-out of the experimental aircraft project in April. The industrial dispute at British Aerospace at Warton is sad and disappointing, and one wishes that it will be speedily resolved. It is very much the intention of British Aerospace, and our hope, that the EAP will fly at Farnborough. My understanding is that, where possible, work on the programme has been continuing.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Apart from the importance of the British element in avionics and airframe construction, will the hon. Gentleman give a firm undertaking that, for strategic, employment and technological reasons, Rolls-Royce will continue to have a strong interest in this aircraft?

Mr. Lee: That would be our intention.

Sir Peter Blaker: Does my hon. Friend agree that a settlement of the industrial dispute would be helpful not only in connection with the experimental aircraft programme but in the context of our order for Tornados for Saudi Arabia and the efforts that the Government and British Aerospace are making to secure further sales for that aircraft?

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend is right. I remember that those workers who are now on strike were, some months ago, desperately concerned about their jobs and possible redundancies at Warton, but then we had the extremely successful aerospace package sale to Saudi Arabia. Sadly, we have now moved into an industrial dispute. We all hope that it will soon be resolved.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister mentioned the sale to Saudi Arabia. Can he confirm reports that the Saudis are seeking to renegotiate that deal because British Aerospace is being paid in oil which, as we know, is a depreciating currency? Is that agreement under review? Why did the Government enter into an arrangement for payment in such a depreciating currency as oil?.

Mr. Lee: I have no knowledge of any renegotiation.

Mr. Stern: In the context of the Rolls-Royce contribution to this project, will my hon. Friend take the opportunity to impress upon those trade unionists who are trying to poor mouth the achievements of Rolls-Royce to date how much Rolls-Royce has contributed to this project and, in doing so, has contributed to the growth and future prosperity of Rolls-Royce?

Mr. Lee: I am more than happy to pay tribute to the contribution of Rolls-Royce in this and other projects.

Trident

6. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been (a) committed and (b) spent to date on the Trident project.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): To date, £2,400 million has been contractually committed on the Trident project, of which some £620 million has been spent.

Mr. Livsey: Can the Minister say what effect the expenditure will have on our conventional forces, especially in terms of frigates and Challenger tanks, and the opportunity costs of that?

Mr. Younger: If such a comparison is to be made, the effect of having no Trident deterrent in the mid-1990s onwards would be much more expensive in the vastly greater number of conventional arms that would be needed to replace it.

Mr. Squire: Has my right hon. Friend ascertained whether the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey), in asking that question, was speaking on behalf of the Liberal party leadership, the SDP alliance, or the Liberal party conference? Should we not be told the position?

Mr. Younger: I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would be able to enlighten us on what his leader thinks about the matter. The only thing that I have been able to ascertain so far is that he will not be able to make up his mind for some years yet. The House may feel that that makes Ethelred the Unready look positively constructive by comparison.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the considerable expenditure of which the Secretary of State has given notice to the House, will he indicate the unique nature of the Trident contract that has been placed with Vickers? Will he provide details of the background and say why it was necessary to have a contract whose cancellation would involve 125 per cent. of the official price? Additionally, will the Secretary of State assure my constituents, who are extremely perturbed about the way in which the Ministry of Defence is going about the expansion of Rosyth naval base, that full disclosure will be made in terms of safety and other environmental aspects to the people in the locality of Limekilns regarding the proposed expenditure for Trident at Rosyth?

Mr. Younger: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, there is a copy of the contract with the contract-break clause for HMS Vanguard in the Library of the House. The contract shows that, in the event of cancellation in the limited period before the second Trident boat is ordered, the MOD has agreed to meet properly incurred liabilities up to 125 per cent. of the sum payable for completing the contract. That sum would be paid only if the liabilities had been properly incurred.

On the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I appreciate his constituents' concern about safety. Those concerns will be considered with the greatest care. I think that his constituents are really concerned whether the Labour party, in government, would cancel the Trident project and destroy most of their jobs.

Mr. Leigh: If my right hon. Friend believed that not only should Trident not be replaced at any cost but that Britain should unilaterally disarm, if his right hon. Friend the leader of the party believed that Trident should not be replaced but that Polaris should be allowed to linger on as an increasingly decrepit and hopeless system, and if his deputy leader believed that Polaris should be replaced by cruise, would people not say that the Conservative party's defence policy was a shambles? Is that not precisely the policy of the alliance? Does it not bear less resemblance to the real Alliance that protects our freedom and — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question concerns the amount of money spent on Trident.

Mr. Leigh: Does he agree that it bears a resemblance not to Ethelred the Unready, but more to the Mad Hatter's tea party?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is quite right to say that there is immense confusion as to the precise position of all members of all the Opposition parties. I think the House might agree that any party which goes before the public without a credible defence policy is doomed to disappointment.

Nuclear Arms Race

7. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his European counterparts within the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation about how best to halt the nuclear arms race; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I had useful discussions with both my European and North American counterparts at last month's meeting of the Defence Planning Committee. We confirmed our objective of seeking balanced, equitable and verifiable arms control agreements involving United States and Soviet nuclear forces and expressed our strong support for the United States stance in the Geneva negotiations. Details are contained in the DPC communiqué, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Strang: Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that the whole world was dismayed at President Reagan's threat last month at that very meeting to breach the SALT 2 treaty later this year? Do the Government support the American Administration on this matter?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman should look carefully at what the American Administration has said. As my right hon. Friend has already made clear, we welcome President Reagan's decision to continue to respect, for the time being, the constraints of the unratified SALT agreement by dismantling two Poseidon submarines. The President's statement on 27 May makes it clear that, if the Soviet Union takes constructive steps between now and the end of the year to alter the current position, the President will take that into account in reviewing whether the United States should exceed SALT 2 limits. Thus the door has been left open, and there is a clear opportunity for the Soviet Union to respond constructively.

Mr. Forman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best next step that the Government could take and urge upon their allies to limit, if not halt, the nuclear arms race would be a progressive step-by-step reduction in not only frequency but the number of underground nuclear tests, as recommended by Chancellor Kohl?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point. We have repeatedly made it clear that we favour a comprehensive test ban, if that can be achieved. The key is adequate steps for verification, and we shall pursue that line.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that one way to help to prevent the arms race is to support non-proliferation treaties? To that end, is it not unwise to re-process other people's spent fuel at Sellafield, as we plan to do with the THORP project, to produce plutonium, which we would send back to countries such as Germany and Japan? We know that plutonium can be used only to produce nuclear weapons.

Mr. Younger: That is a different question. The position in this country has always been that, provided adequate safety provisions are carefully adhered to, these industrial matters should be pursued in an industrial manner.

BAOR

9. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to change the size of the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): On present plans we intend to increase the size of BAOR to 56,000 by the end of the decade, as announced in the 1985 Statement on the Defence Estimates.

Mr. Proctor: May I take this opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend on his well-deserved appointment. Will he explain the reasoning behind the increase?

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. For the past 30 years we have had a NATO commitment to maintain on the continent an army of 55,000. It makes operational sense to concentrate those forces in the Federal Republic of Germany to deter and repel an invasion by land.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: If BAOR's strength is to be increased, is it the Government's intention to proceed with the order for 78 new Challenger tanks? If so, will the hon. Gentleman give an unqualified assurance that Royal Ordnance factories will have to put forward tenders, as do their competitors, such as Vickers at the Scotswood works in Newcastle upon Tyne? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be monstrous to award the contract to the ROF at Leeds without tender?

Mr. Freeman: That question is not one that I can answer specifically. I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that, in addition to increasing the strength of BAOR from 55,000 to 56,000, we are improving the equipment available to that Army, including the provision of six regiments of Challenger tanks.

Mr. Conway: I welcome my hon. Friend to the Dispatch Box. Will he assure the House that the less than 4 per cent. of the Army budget spent on the Territorial Army's battalions which are committed to NATO represents good value for money? Will he assure the House that the proposed expansion of the TA, which is much welcomed, is on course and will not be long in coming?

Mr. Freeman: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. I join him in paying tribute to the Territorial Army and to the important role that it has played, and will increasingly play, in the defence of Europe.

Helicopter Procurement

10. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on future helicopter procurement.

Mr. Lee: As in all aspects of defence procurement, our objective in future helicopter procurement will be to meet the forces' requirements for future helicopters and to obtain the best value of money for the taxpayer, with international collaboration where appropriate.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister will recall that on 26 April he said that the Government would do all that they could to ensure Westland's future capabilities and position. Is he aware that the company's most pressing need at present, in planning for the future, is to know with clarity what the position is with regard to the support helicopter for the Army? Will the Minister say when the review for that order will be completed and when a decision will be announced?

Mr. Lee: I know the position at Yeovil. I was there for the commissioning of the EH101 simulator last month and I saw the situation on the production lines. Therefore, I am cognisant of the position. The conceptual study is under way and it is the intention that it will report to the Chiefs of Staff in the autumn. We would hope for a decision probably early in 1987.

Warship Procurement

11. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement outlining his plans for the future of warship procurement for the next five years.

Mr. Lee: It is our intention, within the resources available to us, to modernise our surface and underwater fleets appropriate to the threat.

Mr. Bruce: Is the Minister aware that that reply is rather less than forthcoming on the prospects for future ship orders in the United Kingdom? Will he acknowledge that, for a maritime nation such as Britain, the provision of ships should be our key contribution to NATO defence? What assurance can he give that there will be enough orders coming forward for our shipyards, especially for the shipyard in my own area, Hall Russell, which is starved of orders and being privatised by the Government?

Mr. Lee: Everyone, including the hon. Gentleman, knows full well that there is substantial overcapacity in our warship yards at present. Therefore, I cannot give him the guarantee that he seeks. Nevertheless, the Government have a record that we can be proud of in supporting the conventional and nuclear Navy. Since 1979 we have ordered 52 warships, including 19 major ones, and at present the current value of naval orders is approximately £3·5 billion.

Sir Patrick Wall: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is considerable anxiety that unless the Government order three type 23 frigates each year they will not be able to keep their promise to maintain 50 frigates and destroyers? Is he also aware that Fearless and Intrepid are getting very old and unless there are plans to replace them this year the future of our amphibious force is very grim indeed?

Mr. Lee: I repeat the assurance that I have given previously that we shall be making a decision on the way ahead on amphibious ship replacement during 1986. Frigate orders are very much dependent on the availability of resources. However, it is our intention to make an announcement on frigate orders before the House rises.

Mr. Duffy: Is the Minister aware that his first reply was lamentable, even disgraceful? Even if we were to act on the recommendation of his hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall) and start to order warships again — which the Government have not done for two financial years — and even if we were to resume the obligatory pattern of three warships a year in order to maintain or at least achieve the objective of 50 warships, by 1990 one third of that fleet would be 25 to 30 years old? That is the problem that the Government are storing up for the Royal Navy.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing further to add to the replies that I have given previously.

Sir David Price: Is it my hon. Friend's continuing determination to maintain the pace and scale of the single role minehunter programme? Is he aware that if he slackens on it for Treasury reasons it will have an extremely adverse effect on the programme and on the admirable shipyard of Vosper Thornycroft?

Mr. Lee: I know that my hon. Friend lobbies consistently for Vosper Thornycroft. The order for O1 of the single-role minehunter was, as he knows, placed with Vosper Thornycroft in 1985. However, no decisions have been taken on the size or timing of future orders.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Has the Minister not in effect confirmed what we all thought, that the Government will not be able to honour the commitment to a 50-warship Navy, which would mean ordering three type-23 frigates a year for some considerable time? Why does he not say, as he implied in his earlier answer, that the Navy will be cut and run down in order to pay for Trident?

Mr. Lee: The right hon. Gentleman is totally wrong. I repeat that it is our intention to maintain a running fleet of about 50 vessels.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a good deal of back-chat going on, although we are still in the middle of Question Time.

Overseas Expenditure

13. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will indicate the proportion of the defence budget that is spent overseas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: Direct defence expenditure overseas, net of receipts, is expected to comprise some 14 per cent. of total defence expenditure during 1986-87.

Dr. Clark: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. I recognise the need to spend money abroad in order to secure the defence equipment that we require, but will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that we will use our purchasing power as a major buyer of foreign equipment to secure offset agreements with the companies from which we purchase?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is right about that. When we buy overseas equipment, either because it is cheaper or better, or both, we always try, wherever possible, to tie in offset agreements to help British industry.

Mr. McNamara: How much of that money is spent in Gibraltar and, in particular, how much of it has been spent on the Appledore company, which is supposed to be managing the dockyard in Gibraltar? Will the Secretary of State confirm that that private company, which took over the work at the dockyard, put a screw on a frigate back to front, so that instead of going forwards it would have gone backwards, and vice versa, and that it mended the pumps on a private vessel so that when the crew tried to pump water overboard, the water came into the ship and it sank in the harbour?

Mr. Younger: If the hon. Gentleman will table a question about how much of the money is spent in Gibraltar, I shall be glad to give him an answer. However, he may be interested to know that the 14 per cent. spent overseas includes the net cost of our forces overseas and all the foreign equipment that we buy. I hope the hon. Gentleman will feel that that is a fairly encouraging figure.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: As I have just returned from the annual presentation of the Think British campaign, which was made by the deputy chairman of the Conservative party, may I ask my right hon. Friend to accept from me that spending 14 per cent. of our defence budget abroad is too high a figure? Over the years our Royal Ordnance factories have produced high quality products, and it is nonsense that we should send orders overseas so that we can say that we are providing competition for our Royal Ordnance factories, which already have such an excellent record in this country.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is not quite correct to draw that conclusion. The figure of 14 per cent. relates to all overseas expenditure, net of receipts. If the procurement element is taken alone, between 90 and 95 per cent. of our procurement budget is spent at home.

Chemical Weapons

14. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received concerning the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation force goal for United States chemical weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: To date this year my Department has received about 50 letters from Members of Parliament and some 90 direct from the general public on the subject of United States plans for chemical weapon modernisation.

Mr. Cohen: Is the Minister aware that a United States Senator recently described the bigeye chemical weapon as the turkey to end all turkeys? The British public do not want it on their soil, and it does not represent a realistic form of defence for Britain. If the earlier statement that it will be kept in the United States in peacetime is to be believed, will it not be a sign to the Soviet Union that war is imminent if it is shipped over here? Should we not make it an early Christmas for that turkey, by saying that we will not have it on our soil?

Mr. Stanley: I note the hon. Gentleman's view that NATO would be better served by having no reinforcement plans whatever. That is not the view on this side of the House.

Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles

16. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about his Department's policy for the disposal of redundant intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Mr. Stanley: At the end their useful lives the nuclear warheads for our Polaris missiles are dismantled and reusable materials, which include all special nuclear materials, are recovered. Non-reusable components, including conventional high explosives, are disposed of in accordance with strict safety and security regulations. The disposal of complete redundant Polaris missiles will not occur until the mid-1990s and the disposal policy has not yet been decided.

Mr. Atkinson: In view of the frightening Soviet lead in space, as reported by Jane's today, and of the crisis over launchers in the United States of America and in Europe, what studies has the right hon. Gentleman's Department made on utilising our existing missile stock in restoring our defence satellite programme?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend will understand that those two do not relate to each other. He is entirely right to point to the enormous investment and the great progress that the Soviet Union has made in space.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Craigen asked the Prime Minister is she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with His Majesty King Hussein.

Mr. Craigen: In what sense can the Prime Minister claim that her Administration are giving moral leadership on South Africa?

The Prime Minister: We tried at the Commonwealth conference to see whether we could get the solution to the South African problem by negotiation and we helped to set up the Eminent Persons Group. That Eminent Persons Group was widely welcomed. It was due to our leadership. I believe that had it not been for the bombing of the three capitals, that group would have continued and could have come through to a conclusion.

Mr. Latham: When my right hon. Friend meets King Hussein today, will she describe to him her extremely successful visit to Israel—[Interruption.]—oh, yes—and encourage him to enter into negotiations directly with Mr. Peres, the Prime Minister of Israel?

The Prime Minister: Of course I shall discuss with King Hussein the visit to Israel. I do not think that there is any point in trying to encourage King Hussein to have direct negotiations with the Prime Minister of Israel. I do not think he would contemplate that without the support of the other Arab nations. My hon. Friend is only too well aware of what happened to one of the King's ancestors on just such a similar occasion.

Mr. Kinnock: When Bishop Tutu and his colleagues, as well as the ANC and the UDF, together with other organisations representative of majority black opinion in South Africa, all say repeatedly that economic sanctions are the most effective non-violent way to pursue the end of apartheid, what right has the Prime Minister to disagree with them?

The Prime Minister: With all due respect to the right hon. Gentleman, we each have a right and a duty to formulate our own opinions.

Mr. Kinnock: In that case, we can tell that the right hon. Lady is not black and in South Africa, where they do not have the right to formulate their own opinions. That is what is wrong with the system. Since she offered her opinions, as she is freely entitled to do, last Friday, about what was best for the black people of South Africa, what was her authority for stating that?

The Prime Minister: I have given, and shall continue to give, our views on the lack of effectiveness of economic sanctions. I shall continue to give our view that the important thing is to try to end apartheid by negotiation and to try to get a suspension of violence on all sides. That will continue to be our objective.

Mr. Kinnock: And the Botha regime will continue to mock it. Does the right hon. Lady not understand that if she really wants negotiations they can come only through pressure, and that economic sanctions are vital to pressure?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will remember what previous Members of his party have said about sanctions and what Mrs. Helen Suzman has said about sanctions, that they clearly would not be effective and would be counter-productive. The right hon. Gentleman wants sanctions, which will increase unemployment in South Africa and in Britain. How does he think that that will bring about peaceful change?

Mr. Richard Page: Does my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister agree that the recent honour to Sir Ian MacGregor was well deserved and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not ask a question about the Prime Minister's advice on honours.

Mr. Page: Does my right hon. Friend believe that Sir Ian MacGregor's task to create the most efficient steel industry in Europe, if not the world, was made so much more difficult through the lack of courage of the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979 in not implementing the recommendations of the Beswick review?

The Prime Minister: The fact that the Labour Government did not implement certain recommendations on the steel industry made it more difficult for this Government. I believe that, partly as a result of the foundations laid by Sir Ian, British Steel is now trading profitably for the first time in 12 years.

Q2. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hamilton: With regard to the Prime Minister's meeting with the Queen tonight, and in view of Her Majesty's known anxiety about the need to preserve the unity of the Commonwealth, especially in connection with South Africa, will the Prime Minister—despite what she said last week—give Her Majesty an assurance that she places the unity of the Commonwealth above the unity of the Conservative party?

The Prime Minister: Had the hon. Gentleman listened earlier, he would have heard that I do not have an audience of Her Majesty this evening. When I do have an audience of Her Majesty, there are certain matters that I discuss only with Her Majesty and not with others.

Mr. St. John-Stevas: Will my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister convey to Her Majesty the concern of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) about her welfare?

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. Steel: Will the Prime Minister explain to the House, in advance of this afternoon's debate, the distinction in her mind between sanctions, effective economic measures and effective measures? Is she aware that most of us find it humiliating that Britain is seen as being dragged along towards the inevitable international action to bring pressure to bear on South Africa for peaceful change? Should we not be taking the lead in these matters?

The Prime Minister: Had the right hon. Gentleman listened to my earlier remarks, he would have known that it was we who took the lead in setting up the Eminent Persons Group, which would have been successful but for the circumstances that I mentioned earlier. It is important to secure effective measures to bring the system of apartheid to an end and enable black South Africans to play their proper part in the government of South Africa.

Mr. John Browne: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, with regard to race, our superb armed forces are effectively colour blind, with recruitment and promotion based on aptitude and merit? Does she agree that ethnic monitoring will lead to positive discrimination and enhance racialism and non-merit promotion? Can she please assure the House that ethnic monitoring will not be accepted in the armed forces?

The Prime Minister: It is always important that promotion should take place based on individual merit and ability and not on other factors. There is no monitoring of ethnic origins in the armed forces at present. A review is being conducted, which is nearing completion, and an announcement will be made in due course.

Q3. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Prime Minister aware that my constituents do not want the Torness nuclear power station to be commissioned until such time as they can have satisfactory answers to vital questions about the Chernobyl disaster and about Scotland's future energy needs? As I received reliable information today about serious defects in the insulation of the reactor at Torness and about hot spots that may be having an effect on the steel and concrete linings of the reactor, will the right hon. Lady halt the loading of the reactor until those vital questions can be answered?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. The matters that the hon. Gentleman raises are for the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, which I am sure he is the first to recognise is an excellent inspectorate, with a superb record in this country.

Q4. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hirst: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Bishop Mokoena, the leader of the Independent Reform Church in South Africa, with 4·5 million black Christian adherents, is presently in the United Kingdom, and has brought a clear message to the British people that, while apartheid is totally unacceptable, he believes that economic sanctions and disinvestment would be profoundly unhelpful and damaging to the South African people?

The Prime Minister: I have heard reports of the bishop's views. That underlines the view that we take, that any measures must be effective, to try to bring about the end of apartheid. Economic sanctions are punitive and negative in their effect. We are much more interested in positive measures if they can be shaped for that purpose.

Q5. Mr. Allen Adams asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Adams: Is the Prime Minister aware that she failed to satisfy me last Thursday when I asked her or her Ministers to give me an assurance about the future of aero-engine production in Glasgow? May I now ask the Prime Minister, against the background of defence questions this afternoon, whether she is prepared to give the House, Scotland and the United Kingdom as a whole a commitment about the future of shipbuilding on the Clyde and in Britain as a whole? Is there any point at which the Government will become involved in protecting British jobs in British yards?

The Prime Minister: The future of British yards, and also of British jobs in factories, will depend upon our securing the requisite orders. All Governments in power, of whatever complexion, know that.

Mr. Roger King: Has my right hon. Friend read reports that the Church Commissioners are not able or willing to withdraw investment from South Africa because it may affect the livelihood of the clergy in this country? Does it not follow that hundreds of companies and tens of thousands of work people in this country will be similarly affected if there are swingeing trade sanctions against South Africa?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. That stresses the correctness of the view that the Government have taken, that the matter must be considered very seriously and deeply, along with our partners, because the purpose is not to hurt those whom we least wish to hurt, but to bring about an end to apartheid. Anything that we do must be directed towards that end.

Q6. Mr. Ashton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ashton: Is it not a fact that the Prime Minister's party is now split down the middle on South Africa, just as it was on British Leyland, the Shops Bill and Westland helicopters? Yesterday even a former Prime Minister split with his party on the NHS. The alliance is now split down the middle on defence. Is it not a fact that the only party that is united in its policies in the House and fit to run the country is the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: Why did the previous Labour Government vote against sanctions in the United Nations? Why did the previous Labour Foreign Secretary say, about economic sanctions, that those who we do not wish to hurt would suffer most if economic sanctions were imposed?

Mr. Nelson: In answer to an earlier question by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) my right hon. Friend was rightly cautious about urging on King Hussein later today bilateral direct discussions with Israel. However, does not the presidency of the European Community later this year provide a golden opportunity for a forum for discussions for all the participants in the middle east, in which context the recent visit of President Assad of Syria to Greece is encouraging? May we hope that my right hon. Friend will place this high on her agenda of priorities?

The Prime Minister: It is a cause of concern that at present there is no initiative to solve the middle east problem. We come back in the end to two problems: who should negotiate along with King Hussein — who should be the Palestinians who truly represent the Palestinian people and who would also be acceptable for the negotiating process; and what form should the international grouping behind the negotiations take. So far we have not been able to come to a conclusion about that, but we must keep on trying. To that extent I agree with my hon. Friend.

Q7. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Will the Prime Minister pause to consider that, in the past 12 months or so, she has presided over a massive contraction of the British coal industry? Now there is speculation about a further 10 per cent. reduction in manpower in south Wales. In the post-Chernobyl era, is that not a grave mistake? Is not what is now needed massive investment in the industry to put it at the centre of the British energy industry?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows, there has been massive investment in the coal industry — about £2 million for every day that we have been in power. He also knows that the coal industry has been doing very well and has had a record-breaking year for productivity, which is now over 3 tonnes per man shift. For industry to have a future it must be efficient, and the coal industry is becoming really efficient and working well.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances Regulations 1980) (Amendment) Regulations 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Dangerous Goods) (Amendment) Regulations 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Remands in Custody (Compensation)

3.31 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish the right to compensation for time spent in custody prior to an acquittal; and for connected purposes.

The Bill is designed to overcome some injusticies which we may have in our system. Reaction to the Bill during the past few days from various journalists and members of the public has been one of surprise that in English law a person accused of a crime where there is a presumption of innocence who is then brought to court and remanded in custody—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will those hon. Members who do not want to remain in the Chamber please leave quietly?

Mr. Bermingham: It seems surprising to many that those who are remanded in custody and refused bail in respect of a matter which is denied by them, when they come to trial and are subsequently acquitted, are merely handed back their personal possessions and shown the door. There is no way in which the months, weeks and sometimes years in custody, sometimes with the loss of jobs, homes and livelihoods, and sometimes the break-up of the family, are compensated for by our society. That must surely be a blot on the fairness of our society. After all, a person who is remanded in custody before trial and found guilty has that time spent in custody before trial taken into account when the sentence is assessed. Therefore, the time that a person serves in custody stands to his credit when he is found guilty. A person who is found to be innocent, as many are in any one year, receives no credit for that time; it is simply ignored. The number of persons involved in such matters in a year is sometimes as many as 2,000.

Of course, it is easy for all of us to say that a person should not have got himself charged, but people are charged in respect of crimes that they do not commit. Cases which on the face of the papers appear to be so strong, the allegations so tough, crumble and fall under questioning.

A prosecuting counsel whom I know told me a lovely story about a case which on the face of it was perfect. He asked the complainant the first question and the case began to trundle, but by the third question he had thrown in his hand. First, he asked the complainant if he was Mr. So-and-So and the reply was, "Sometimes." The second question was, "Is that the man who is supposed to have hit you?" The complainant said, "No." In reply to the third question, "Who did hit you?", he pointed to somebody sitting in the gallery and the case was over.

The defendant in that case had spent 11 months in prison because the allegation was an extremely serious one. It was not the fault of the police officers or of the courts, but that man lost his job and his livelihood and has suffered many other personal hardships. At the end of the case he was simply handed his small change and other personal property and sent on his way.

Some years ago I sought to introduce a 10-minute Bill to limit the time that a person could be held in custody before trial. People asked me why I was doing it and I said that the Scots do it. They also asked me what benefit it would be. Two years later it is beginning to become part of our law. If there are limits on the time people can be held in custody, we will cut back on the 2,000 people I am talking about, because fewer people will be in custody.

If this Bill were to be given serious consideration by the House, it might prompt the courts to look again at the findings a couple of years ago of the Select Committee on Home Affairs about bail. That again would reduce the number of people to whom this Bill refers. No system is perfect, but eventually only a small number of people each year will be remanded in custody. They are denied bail, despite making all the applications, because of such factors as evidence that appears to be very strong but who, when they come to trial and justice begins to emerge, are found not guilty.

If we are to have a fair and balanced society, occasionally we have to look at matters like this which affect small numbers of people who, because of our system, will always escape whatever safety net we seek to put in place. Those people suffer real injustice. As I say, it is ironic that if one pleads guilty or is found guilty the time spent in custody stands to one's credit. However, if a person is found not guilty, time spent in custody stands to his loss. That is not fair. We can effect a remedy. I hope that the House will support the Bill, and will give it a Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gerald Bermingham, Mr. Gordon Oakes, Mr. Allen McKay, Mr. Tony Blair, Mr. David Clelland, Mr. Terry Patchett, Mr. Robert Parry, Mrs. Margaret Beckett, Mr. Richard Caborn, Mr. David Winnick, Mr. Guy Barnett and Mr. Kevin Barron.

REMANDS IN CUSTODY (COMPENSATION)

Mr. Gerald Bermingham accordingly presented a Bill to establish the right to compensation for time spent in custody prior to an acquittal; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 4 July and to be printed. [Bill 182.]

Opposition Day

[16TH ALLOTTED DAY]

South Africa

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister. Well over 40 right hon. and hon. Gentlemen have written to me expressing their wish to take part in the debate. There may well be other hon. Members who wish to take part. Between 7 o'clock and 9 o'clock I propose to limit speeches to 10 minutes. May I say to Privy Councillors who may be called before that time that I hope that they will bear in mind that there are other hon. Members who wish to take part in the debate.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it connected with this debate?

Mr. Faulds: Yes, Sir. You will know, and the House is well aware — although it is often more regarded in its breach than in its observance — that if a Member of Parliament has interests he should declare them. Is it not incumbent on right hon. and hon. Members who have benefited from trips to the Republic of South Africa within the last year under the auspices of that Government to declare in this debate that they have done so, so that the House and the public can know why they speak as they do? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman well knows that we have an established Register of Members' Interests in the House in which trips to overseas countries are recorded. Obviously, if any hon. Member has a direct financial interest, he will declare it.

3.40 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I beg to move,

That this House calls upon Her Majesty's Government, in view of the worsening situation in the Republic of South Africa and in the light of the Report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group, to work actively with the European Community, the Commonwealth and the United Nations for the imposition of effective economic measures against the Government of South Africa.

All hon. Members will agree that this is one of the most important issues which the House has ever debated, because the future of the people of South Africa and of the whole of the southern half of the African continent is at stake. The future of the Commonwealth is also at stake. Last year at Nassau the Prime Minister created a gulf between Britain and all other members of the Commonwealth, both old and new. If she deliberately widens that gulf this year, the Commonwealth may not survive. Moreover, Britain is a key member of all the international organisations now seized of the South African problem — the Commonwealth, the European Community, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the United Nations. The Opposition deeply deplore the Government's refusal to send any representative to the United Nations conference in Paris on this problem this week.

Inside South Africa a situation already intolerable to all decent people has dramatically deteriorated in the past few days. South Africa 1986 is the embodiment of the world of George Orwell's "1984". We have in South Africa today a police state in which the Government's agents have a licence to arrest without explanation and to kill without being called to account. South Africa today suffers from a news blackout far more complete than any Communist country has ever known. [Interruption.] Even in Poland in the worst days of the Solidarity crisis, foreign journalists were always free to report on the persecution of Solidarity and to publish in the press or on television interviews with opponents of the regime. That is not possible in South Africa today.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West) rose

Mr. Healey: Armed men can break up church services, but no word may be published about what has happened. The apartheid regime has blotted out the truth in the blackest arctic night. Even before the latest state of emergency the Eminent Persons Group described the system in South Africa as "awesome in its cruelty." I am glad that the Prime Minister welcomed that report and I believe that—

Mr. Terlezki rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Healey: You have appealed to all of us, Mr. Speaker, to limit our remarks, and I do not think that I would serve the House's interests if I were to give way in the first 60 seconds of my speech.

I regard the report of the Eminent Persons Group as one of the most valuable products of the Commonwealth. It is all the more impressive because it was compiled by men and women of various parts of the Commonwealth, with many different types of experience, most of whom have little or no previous personal knowledge of apartheid on the ground. The group included a Conservative ex-Prime Minister of Australia and a Conservative ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer of Britain, who has strong financial interests in South Africa as chairman of the Standard Chartered Bank. He was appointed to the group by the Prime Minister. I hope that the report, in its Penguin publication, will have a massive circulation throughout the world. I assume that the Prime Minister shares this hope.

The report describes in chilling detail a system in which the blacks outnumber the whites by six to one, yet whites have six times more land; a system in which the living standards of the whites are 10 times higher than those of the blacks; in which the state has used, and is still using, brutal violence on a colossal scale to uproot blacks from their homes and dump them in rural slums; and which separates husbands and fathers from their wives and children — in fact, makes 8 million blacks foreigners in their own land. The report describes a system in which the shooting or torture of political opponents is accepted practice and where the state systematically uses excessive violence against peaceful demonstrators against it, including mutilating the faces of schoolchildren with sjamboks. All this is to be found in the report.

On television last week, all that the Prime Minister could find to say about the system, after reading the report, was:

"It must be so irritating, so full of resentment. I understand how they feel."

Does she really understand? Can she really understand? Can she not see that on South Africa, as on so many issues closer to home, her total incapacity to understand how the victims of society feel about their predicament makes her unfit for office in a democratic state?

Mr. Terlezki rose—

Mr. Healey: I am glad to say that the Eminent Persons Group was shocked and astounded by the reality of apartheid. It was equally astounded by the quality and moderation of those who oppose apartheid. It points out that for the first 13 years of this remorseless pressure the African National Congress remained loyal to Chief Luthuli's commitment to a non-violent struggle. It was only the massacre at Sharpeville which compelled them to reassess this commitment and even then the congress restricted its direct action to sabotage.

But 10 years ago another massacre in Soweto, in which most of the victims were children and a third were shot in the back, had an inevitable consequence. The provocation was more than flesh and blood could stand, but the Eminent Persons Group points out that, in the past 20 years, only 20 deaths have been the result of action by members of ANC when thousands were killed by the Government forces.

Mr. Terlezki rose—

Mr. Healey: Sit down. The Eminent Persons Group—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that the right hon. Gentleman is not giving way and he must not persist.

Mr. Healey: The Eminent Persons Group found the leaders of the ANC and the United Democratic Front whom they met, to be men of moderation—

Mr. Terlezki: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall have to hear it, but is it a point of order?

Mr. Terlezki: Yes, Sir. I seek your guidance about whether I am entitled to ask the right hon. Gentleman—

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have told the hon. Gentleman that if the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) does not give away the hon. Gentleman must not persist.

Mr. Terlezki: There is no harm in trying.

Mr. Healey: They were found to be men of moderation who wanted to achieve a multiracial society by peaceful negotiations and prepared to suspend the use of violence to achieve it. I am again drawing upon the report which the Prime Minister has rightly praised.

Until very recently, the Government refused all contact with members of the ANC. Even now, they refuse to allow their Ministers to talk to the ANC, although American Ministers do so regularly. Instead, the British Government, like the American Government, chose the path of what they called constructive engagement with apartheid. The apartheid regime rewarded them with systematic deception. Again, I quote the Eminent Persons Group, which said:

"The SA Government has perfected a specialised political vocabulary which while saying one thing, means quite another".

The Prime Minister and President Reagan swallowed it hook, line and sinker. The House will recall being told by the Prime Minister two years ago that President Botha had agreed with her to take his troops out of Angola. They have been there ever since, even to the extent of blowing up American oil installations at Kabinda. Only last week they were shelling a port in Angola.

On 9 October 1984, the Foreign Secretary told us that there were encouraging developments in the Nkomati accord with Mozambique and rapid progress on Namibia; but President Botha broke the Nkomati accord even before the ink was dry, set up a puppet Government in Namibia and is now conducting military action against neighbouring Commonwealth countries, starting with attacks at the very moment at which the Eminent Persons Group was about to meet Ministers.

President Botha has played the Prime Minister and President Reagan for suckers. He finally admitted it last week when he said in his address to his own Parliament that countries which do not invoke sanctions against South Africa can continue to trade with her but cannot expect to exert any political influence on what the South African Government do, so that constructive engagement was a farce from the beginning. The Prime Minister herself agreed to that at Nassau last year because she signed a communiqué which said that the policy of constructive engagement was a failure in both of its objectives—ending apartheid, and getting freedom for Namibia.

It is sometimes argued that what happens inside South Africa is none of our business, but South African aggression against its Commonwealth neighbours is our business. It is the business of the whole of the outside world. This aspect of the problem has received far too little attention in the House and elsewhere.

Since 1980, the South African Government have engaged in systematic use of armed force against eight majority ruled states in the region. The list of its violations of international law makes a crime sheet of daunting terror. We have had South Africa invading the capitals of three independent countries and invading four other countries. We have had South Africa trying to assassinate the Prime Ministers of two neighbouring states. We have seen South Africa backing terrorism, which has brought two of its neighbouring states to economic chaos and which has caused grave disorder in two others.

South Africa has disrupted deliberately the oil supplies of six of its neighbours and it has attacked the vital railway communications of seven of its neighbours. In consequence of South African action in neighbouring states—these figures are quoted in the report—100,000 people have died and millions have been displaced. It cost the region $10 billion in the years 1980 to 1984—more than all the financial assistance that it received from the outside world. It is now costing the region about $5 billion a year.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the alleged cost of South African actions. What would be the cost of the economic sanctions that the right hon. Gentleman supports to the rest of the Commonwealth and to the West if such sanctions were to be imposed?

Mr. Healey: I am very grateful, for once, to the hon. Gentleman, because that is precisely the point to which I am about to turn.

It is the cost already imposed by the apartheid regime on South Africa's Commonwealth neighbours which has led all of them, despite the real risk of economic sanctions, to support sanctions as the only means of shortening their agony. President Kaunda of Zambia used those very words this week on BBC radio. It is no good the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) shaking his head. That is President Kaunda's view. He knows better what is in the interests of his country than a Member of Parliament who has accepted hospitality from the apartheid regime in South Africa.

If the present situation continues, agony it will be. In introducing his report the other day, Mr. Malcolm Fraser said that the slaughter and bloodshed would be worse than in Vietnam. The Commonwealth group as a whole said that it "could be the worst bloodbath since the Second World War."

And it is a bloodbath, as Mr. Fraser pointed out, that the blacks are bound to win in the end but that they want to avoid, if humanly possible.

The Eminent Persons Group describes the leaders of the African National Congress and the United Democratic Front as men of goodwill who want a multiracial society. I prefer its views to those of the prejudiced bigots who sit below the Gangway on the other side of the House. But the Eminent Persons Group also reached the conclusion that there cannot be peaceful negotiations unless effective economic measures, as set out in paragraph 352 of the report, are applied by the outside world. The key paragraph of the report is the penultimate one, paragraph 354. It says:

"The question in front of Heads of Government is in our view clear. It is not whether such measures will compel change; it is already the case that their absence and Pretoria's belief that they need not be feared defers change."

That is a direct condemnation of the Prime Minister by a jury of her peers, a jury that she helped to appoint. It was her action at Nassau that prevented effective action by the Commonwealth and she gloated about it when she came back to Parliament. If she were to veto action once again, the delay could be fatal for South Africa and inflict lasting shame on her Government, a shame from which I fear the British people as a whole could not escape. Indeed, if the Prime Minister vetoes action once again, then, as Mr. Fraser made clear, the Government who emerge from a decade of mounting violence will be bitterly hostile to Britain and the West. All our economic interests will be destroyed and all our hopes of political influence will be gone. We have seen this already in Angola and Mozambique, and we would have seen it in Zimbabwe if Lord Carrington had not persuaded the Prime Minister to reverse her policy just in time.

The future of South Africa is even more important than what has happened in other neighbouring countries. South Africa has a major population, important natural resources, a developed industry and a large mass of skilled manpower. It also occupies an important strategic position. To throw those assets away because of the imperious vanity of one person would be inexcusable folly.

How we tackle this important issue may yet determine whether the Commonwealth survives as an institution. I regret warnings given by some Commonwealth leaders that they may leave the Commonwealth if the Prime Minister exercises her veto again.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Good riddance.

Mr. Healey: I hope that they would not carry it out, because within two years we shall have another British Government which will have a very different policy on South Africa.

The Government cannot ignore those warnings, nor, as the Prime Minister knows, can the Palace. If the Prime Minister prefers to use the word "measures" rather than "sanctions" to save her face, I have no objections, nor has the Commonwealth, although I am bound to say that, in a discussion with me on television last week——

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for a right hon. Gentleman to seek to involve the Palace in a debate in support of his argument?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman was wrong. However, it is not in order to use members of the Royal Family to influence the debate in any way.

Mr. Healey: I am grateful for your advice Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It must be in order, because it cannot be avoided in this debate, to point out the position of one who is the Queen of the Commonwealth and not just of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows "Erskine May" as well as any hon. Member. He knows that it is not in order to use members of the royal family to advance arguments in a debate.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Although I accept your ruling that it is not in order to use members of the royal family to further an argument, cannot one refer to the Head of State and to the Head of the Commonwealth?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that I can clear this matter easily. I have already said that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) was in order to refer to the Palace, but that it is not in order to use members of the royal family in advancing an argument.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is not a superficial matter. It is wholly out of order in the House to criticise the Monarchy. It must be in order to debate the position in which the Head of the Commonwealth is placed by policies that may or may not be advanced.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not in dispute.

Mr. Healey: I thank you for endorsing my words, Mr. Speaker, which were used at Prime Minister's Question Time today, and have been used by hon. Members at other times.

The arguments that the Government are using against sanctions look increasingly threadbare and contradictory. The first argument, which the Prime Minister uses every time that she appears on television, is that they never work; but if they never work, why did she impose sanctions on Poland, to deal entirely with the internal situation, on Argentina, Libya and Iran, and accept them on Zimbabwe by not opposing them when in opposition? She knows as well as I do that the sanctions imposed on Iran, Argentina and Zimbabwe played an important role in the resolution of those issues.

The United States is also operating sanctions against Nicaragua, and when it was accused yesterday of some inconsistency a spokesperson of the State Department said that if South Africa were a Communist dictatorship, it would be different. I suspect that that is the secret, private view of the Prime Minister.

The second argument is that sanctions would hurt the blacks and the front-line states, which would not like them. However, all the representatives of the blacks except Chief Buthelezi have argued that they want sanctions in order to shorten their agony, and this is the argument used by the front-line states as well because, like the Eminent Persons Group, whose work the Prime Minister has commended to us, they see sanctions as offering the only hope of promoting dialogue between the regime and the blacks.

I find it slightly disgraceful that the Government sneer at countries such as Bermuda and Australia that might make economic gains out of sanctions, but sneer even more loudly at Governments that support sanctions but know that they will suffer as a consequence. I find that profoundly distasteful and typically graceless of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister's real concern is with her view of Britain's economic interests. I remind her that in 1986 we are not talking of economic interests as they were in 1946, 1956, 1966 or 1976. The value of our investments has already fallen by half with the value of the rand, and more and more British companies as well as multinationals are getting out as fast as they can. There is the imminent prospect of the South African Government imposing exchange controls, which will prevent British companies from repatriating their profits, and an immediate prospect of South Africa defaulting on its debts. South Africa is no longer a shining pillar of industrial enterprise. It is sliding fast into the condition of the banana republic.

Why do the Government oppose sanctions? Having read the Government's amendment, I ask myself whether they oppose sanctions. The Government's amendment would be quite acceptable to me, provided the omission of the word "economic" does not exclude economic measures. The objectives that the Government set out in their amendment are acceptable, as I have already made clear. Indeed I was tempted to accept the Government amendment when I started, and if the Foreign Secretary can allay my doubts about the meaning of the amendment I may still discuss with my right hon. and hon. Friends the possibility of accepting it.

Make no mistake, if the Government mean what they say, and if the words are not part of the South African vocabulary that long contact has led the Government to adopt, they are committing themselves to a course of action that means increasing pressure on the apartheid regime, steadily over a number of years, until it finally agrees to negotiations.

The objective set by the Government—the suspension of violence — has been accepted by the ANC and rejected by the South African Government. Any effective measures taken at this time must, as a minimum, mean all the measures on which other members of the Commonwealth agreed at Nassau, plus the measures now being put to the American Congress which, I gather, are certain to be passed by the House of Representatives and perhaps the Senate.

I believe that circumstances will compel the outside world to increase pressure on South Africa as the crisis deepens and as the slaughter mounts. We would be wise to consider — I hope that the Government are considering it — graduating economic and other measures to be applied at intervals, as envisaged at the Nassau meeting, until finally netgotiation takes place.

If that is what the Government are recommending to the House, that is fine by me. If not — if they are simply weasel words by which the Government hope to escape criticism and responsibility for a few months — I warn them that they are riding straight for disaster. If the Prime Minister believes that she can, once again, come out of a a Commonwealth summit bosting that she has outwitted her colleagues, that she has given only a "tiny bit" of what they asked for, she will be condemning this country and the Commonwealth to disaster.

I put to the Prime Minister and her colleagues that, at this time, manner is almost as important as matter. We in Britain have become used to the chilly indifference of the Prime Minister to human suffering. We are used to her armour-plated complacency on issues where her ignorance is total. We are used to it, but we are also sick and tired of it. We cannot accept the monstrous, sacro-egoismo which allowed her to say on television last week, "If I were the odd one out and I were right, it would not matter, would it?"

I ask the Prime Minister to recall that she is not always right. She nearly wrecked the negotiations in Hong Kong before they started by her disastrous pontificating in Beijing and Hong Kong from which the Foreign Secretary, doughty fighter for British interests that he is, finally rescued her. She would have wrecked the negotiations on Zimbabwe if the then Foreign Secretary had not pulled her back from the brink. She could have brought down the Government on the Westland and British Leyland affair earlier this year by her certainty that she is always right. If she allows her fatal, conditioned reflexes to determine her actions on this crucial question, she will bring disaster to Britain, the Commonwealth and the whole of southern Africa.

4.13 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I beg to move, to leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'calls upon Her Majesty's Government, in view of the worsening situation in the Republic of South Africa and in the light of the Report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group, to work actively with the European Community, the Commonwealth, and the Economic Summit Seven countries for effective measures which will help achieve a peaceful solution in South Africa based on negotiations and a suspension of violence on all sides.'.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) has engaged the House with a characteristically simplistic opening to the debate. He closed by enunciating a number of the Government's achievements — the conclusion of the Zimbabwe independence negotiations, the conclusion of the Hong Kong joint declaration, the conclusions of the Commonwealth-Nassau declaration, and the conclusion of the Fontainebleau summit of the European Community. The achievement of each of those successes was due to the leadership of the Government by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the concept of imperious vanity. There is no more outstanding example in the House of imperious vanity than the right hon.

Gentleman. I do not want to be unfair to the right hon. Gentleman, but if I had to identify one consistent thread running through his entire approach to foreign policy, it would be his insistence that Britain should now do everything that it did not do when his party was in government. The right hon. Gentleman has become an echo of his pupil's voice. If the problem were as easy to solve as the right hon. Gentleman suggests, it would have been solved long ago.

I am able to start the debate from one plain piece of common ground. On behalf of the Government, I join the right hon. Gentleman in expressing our complete and absolute condemnation of apartheid and indeed of racialism wherever it is practised in the world. I have visited South Africa only once. That visit included a visit to Soweto under the guidance of a black community leader. Those responsible for my arrangements had not found it possible to organise such a visit in my programme.

We entered the township in Soweto 10½ years ago without a pass and without leave. Whenever we saw a South Africa police vehicle — the presence of such vehicles was not inconspicuous — we had to turn quickly out of sight. Our guide felt and had to behave as if she were — I take the graphic phrase from the report of the Eminent Persons Group — "an alien in her own country". That was an alarming and a deeply moving experience. We forecast with unhappy precision almost exactly the tragic explosion of violence that occurred a few months later, 10 years ago. Such incidents are inevitable in a society that has institutionalised the denial of human rights, that has done so, and continues to do so, explicitly on racial grounds. That is the vice of apartheid, which is condemned by all hon. Members.

In January, President Botha, reaching forward to a better future, described apartheid as "outmoded". No phrase could have been more revealing because, for the rest of the world, such institutionalised discrimination has never been acceptable. Apartheid casts a heavy shadow, not only over South Africa but over the entire region. It is the defence of that indefensible system that has brought South Africa into conflict with her neighbours. For the people of this country, for successive Governments of this country, the problems of South Africa and the impact of apartheid have been for decades a cause of profound and growing anxiety.

We have major economic interests in South Africa. That fact was completely ignored by the right hon. Gentleman. He took no account of the extent to which British capital, skills and people have contributed much to South Africa's economic vitality. In considering the measures we should adopt to promote change in South Africa, it would be quite wrong to overlook completely the fact that up to 120,000 jobs in this country still depend directly on trade with South Africa. One is entitled to ask: what guarantee is there that, if those jobs were destroyed in Britain, they would not be recreated elsewhere in the world?

Mr. Allan Roberts: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree with the statement by the President of Zimbabwe that, by not applying sanctions, the British Government are protecting British interests in South Africa but, unless sanctions are applied, those interests will go up in flames?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not propose to deal with the speech of the President of Zimbabwe.

In considering the difficult balance that we must strike, it would be wrong to disregard entirely those interests. There are other ties as well. It is estimated that there are at least 2 million persons of British birth and descent in South Africa, of whom 800,000 or more may be entitled to claim the right of abode in this country. All those people aspire to play a part in the development of South Africa; so, too, do all the other peoples of South Africa — so, too, does the black majority — yet, for all of them, that future is at risk, if it is to be dominated by armed struggle, racial conflict and bloodshed. Much more than their future will be at risk, if the South Africa that eventually emerges from such conflict sees itself as having done so in the face of opposition from Britain or the West.

It is against that background that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have repeatedly made plain the objectives of our policy towards South Africa. We wish apartheid to be brought to an end at the earliest possible date. We wish to see established in its place a non-racial society with democratic, representative government and with proper safeguards for all minorities. That can be the only secure foundation of a prosperous South Africa, living in harmony with its neighbours. We wish those changes to be brought about peacefully, without violence, by dialogue and reform, not by revolution.

It would not help in any way to promote change of that kind if we were to implement policies that would ruin the South African economy, risk economic upheaval for South Africa's neighbours, fuel an explosion of mounting racial strife and tribal violence and risk possibly grave consequences for racial tolerance throughout the world. It is precisely to avoid such consequences that we have for so long concerned ourselves with the future of South Africa and of all its people.

In that context, it is wrong to see the question of "sanctions" — to use that hard-worked, over-simplified word — as though it is one that has arisen today, this year, last year, for the first time. For years, successive British Governments have been taking measures to hasten the process of peaceful change in South Africa. Those measures have helped to press the case for change in South Africa; so, clearly, too, have the mounting pressure of events in South Africa and the growing economic pressures from the world outside. Increasingly, the judgment of world capital markets has been bringing home to South Africa the urgency of the need for far-reaching change. Changes have been made but, so far as I could hear, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East did not acknowledge them. It is only right that we should acknowledge them.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Were not the banks facing precisely the risks which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has just described for the South African economy when they threatened not to reschedule South Africa's debt? Was that not the most powerful instrument for change that we have seen in recent years?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Measures of that kind taken as part of the course of business dealings are measures from which neither party can sensibly escape. They strike home dramatically and plainly on those responsible for deciding matters concerning the economy. They are different from measures of the type under discussion being imposed collectively by the world outside.

In the past year or two, we have seen the repeal of much petty apartheid, including the Mixed Marriages Act, section 16 of the Immorality Act and the Prohibition of Political Interference Act. Those matters cannot be brushed aside. We have seen fundamental reforms in labour legislation and the extension of freehold rights to urban blacks. Only a few weeks ago, a Bill to reform the pass laws was introduced. A year or two ago, those changes would have been beyond imagination. One must acknowledge that they have been made.

[Sir Geoffrey Howe]

Dame Judith Hart (Clydesdale) rose

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Most members of the South African Government no longer try to defend the apartheid system. They have recognised the need for fundamental reform.

Dame Judith Hart: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sorry; I shall not give way at the moment.

The South African Government have begun to find the courage to make a start on that task, but they have not yet found the final courage of conviction that apartheid in all its guises must be swept away. That conviction is necessary. In the absence of that commitment, the tide of violence has continued to rise. That tide reflects the anger and frustration of people who, in the words of the report of the Eminent Persons Group, are "no longer prepared to submit to the oppression, discrimination and exploitation" of apartheid.

It is still possible to assert that what is going on in South Africa is primarily a matter of law and order, but that is to miss the real issues. Of course we must recognise that there is an internal security problem in South Africa. No one who learned of the Durban bomb explosion on Saturday or heard of the appalling necklace killings or other incidents of brutality in the townships can fail to have been chilled by what is happening. We cannot, and must not, turn a blind eye to that. Such action will not bring justice in South Africa one day nearer but, as the report of the Eminent Persons Group rightly pointed out, violence is firmly rooted in the apartheid system. Treating the diverse forms of violence only as a security problem, without tackling the underlying cause of the problem, can only make things worse. It is that underlying problem, the nature of the system itself, that stands in need of change —change not by violence but by dialogue, in the context of a suspension of violence on all sides.

It was for that purpose that last autumn the international community decided to put in place a series of additional measures designed to hasten the process of change — the United States Congress on 9 September, the European Community countries at Luxembourg on 10 September and, finally, the Commonwealth at Nassau on 20 October. In none of those cases was the approach based solely on taking measures against South Africa.

The Commonwealth's approach, particularly, was combined with a political initiative. The establishment of the Eminent Persons Group was a far-sighted endeavour to break the impasse and to end the cycle of violence. We arrived at that conclusion as a result not of the "isolation" of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister but of our determination to act in concert with the rest of the Commonwealth in support of the establishment of the group. The Eminent Persons Group could never have been put in place without the energetic support of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman explain why he finds it so necessary to oppose economic measures in the instance of South Africa when, within the Commonwealth, he countenances the application of economic measures against a Commonwealth ally simply because of its reluctance to have nuclear weapons within its territory? I refer to New Zealand.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman's intervention is a mile from the point under discussion. We shall look forward to hearing his views on relations between this country and New Zealand in a different context and at a different time.

When we met at Nassau and contemplated the possibility of forming the Eminent Persons Group and creating a political initiative that would help to find a way forward in South Africa, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had clearly in mind the part played by the Commonwealth some years before at the Lusaka conference. But on that occasion, it was the intervention by the Commonwealth that created the circumstances in which it was possible for the Government under my right hon. Friend's leadership to bring about a solution to the long-standing problem in Rhodesia and Zimbabwe. It is a matter on which the Government and my right hon. Friend are entitled to massive credit. The problem eluded solution for years under the Labour Government. We concluded that the Commonwealth conference at Nassau was right to try to formulate an initiative that would pave the way forward for a new solution in South Africa.

Mr. Faulds: Is not the right hon. and learned Gentleman—for whom the House has much regard and for whom I have a great personal regard—as a major Minister speaking from the Government Benches on this momentous and appalling issue ashamed of himself to be speaking in such feeble terms?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am deeply moved by the regard in which the hon. Gentleman claims to hold me, although I am continually astonished by the way in which he chooses to express it.

Mr. Faulds: I love the right hon. and learned Gentleman but he does not deserve it.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I bask in glory at that tribute.

The Commonwealth group showed the range of expertise and experience that the Commonwealth can offer. The fact that we were able to fashion that group underlines the importance of the Commonwealth to this country and the world. What is more important is that the initiative attracted growing support, not just from the Commonwealth but from the rest of the world.

The group was set a specific task by the Commonwealth Heads of Government: to encourage the process of peaceful political dialogue in South Africa in the context of a suspension of violence on all sides.

The Commonwealth Heads of Government called upon the South African Government to take a series of specific steps: to declare that the system of apartheid would be dismantled and to set out what specific actions it would take to achieve that end; to terminate the state of emergency; to release immediately and unconditionally

Nelson Mandela and all others imprisoned or detained for their opposition to apartheid and to establish political freedom, in particular by lifting the ban on the ANC and other political parties. One has only to read that list to regret the lack of progress that has been made.

However, the group was able to make much more progress than many expected. It was able to overcome the initial climate of suspicion and distrust. It offered the South African Government an unprecedented opportunity to break out of the vicious circle of violence. The group offered the negotiating concept which it had discussed with opposition groups and Nelson Mandela. It must be to the great regret of the House, as it is to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and myself, that the South African Government have so far declined to take that opportunity. The way ahead is inevitably more difficult. We shall still urge upon the South African Government the need to be ready to think again about that.

Even if the group did not secure the breakthrough for which we all wished, it has charted a course for the negotiations that must eventually take place. It has identified many of the obstacles ahead and some of the ways round them. Its mission would have been worthwhile for that alone. We all owe the Eminent Persons Group a debt of gratitude for the dedication and effort it brought to its task. I am sure that the House will join me in extending our warmest thanks to the group.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): I echo the debt of gratitude to the Eminent Persons Group. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has frequently referred to negotiations, as has the Prime Minister, and he has referred to dialogue. Does he realise that the Eminent Persons Group said that the concrete and adequate progress which it looked for has not materialised? It says:

"in recent weeks the Government would appear to have moved consciously away from any realistic negotiating process."

I live in hope, as does the right hon. and learned Gentleman. However, what grounds for hope has he got that the Botha Government will enter into any realistic negotiations?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is because the group concluded as it did that the House is contemplating the motion and the amendment for the consideration of measures in that context. One must still believe that the mission, which went as far as it did, which helped to identify the way in which negotiations could take place, can be our starting point.

Whatever our standpoint, even starting from the position of the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), we must ensure that the contribution made by the group is not wasted. In the end—sooner, rather than later, we must all hope—the only way forward is to be found by dialogue and negotiation. If the task is harder today than it was six months ago—and it surely is—the objectives must surely remain the same as those defined at Nassau.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: There are one or two questions to which my right hon. and learned Friend has not yet addressed himself. Is it not the case that South Africa is the only country to which Britain has ever given independence without the entire population being entitled to elect the successor Government? Therefore, does that not give us a particular obligation, which we have in no other circumstances?

Secondly, my right hon. and learned Friend rightly refers to peaceful negotiation and the consequences. However, if South Africa threatens or executes military action against its neighbours such as Botswana, or strangles them economically, should we not warn South Africa that that is an act of war, which will be met accordingly?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend has raised two points which he obviously intends to develop later. They are both points which deserve further examination. In answer to my hon. Friend's first question I would say that I am not sure that he is right in his historical analysis. He generally is right. Certainly, the background of South African independence is one reason, not the only reason, for substantial and continuing concern by this Parliament on the future of South Africa.

Two propositions stand out today with even greater clarity than before. First, it becomes increasingly clear that, in the long run, the forces of law and order in South Africa will be able to maintain the peace only if their authority is founded clearly upon the consent of all the races in South Africa. That lesson must be learned and applied.

Secondly, it is also increasingly clear that the key to the commencement of dialogue, if one has to try to find one key, is the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela. That must be seen as the most important act of reconciliation that is necessary to pave the way for peace.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington) rose—

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is to secure swift progress in that direction that we need, as our amendment points out, effective and co-ordinated international action. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on 13 June:

"We have to consider what would be the measures that would be most likely to bring about the change we all wish to see, which is the end of apartheid and the black people of South Africa having rights which they do not have now, rights to take part in the democratic process of the country."

My right hon. Friend's words are an accurate description of our objectives. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East has argued that only the imposition of sweeping measures aimed directly at the South African economy can force that progress. The Eminent Persons Group reaches no conclusions as to the measures which should be adopted.

Mr. Healey: The right hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that the Eminent Persons Group says:

"We are convinced that the South African Government is concerned about the adoption of effective economic measures against it. If it comes to the conclusion that it would always remain protected from such measures, the process of change in South Africa is unlikely to increase in momentum and the descent into violence would be accelerated. In these circumstances, the cost in lives may have to be counted in millions . . . it is already the case that their absence, and Pretoria's belief that they need not be feared, defers change."

If that is not a demand for economic measures to influence the South African Government, what the devil is it?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Eminent Persons Group plainly leaves it, as the Commonwealth Heads of Government did, which is absolutely right, for the Commonwealth Heads of Government to consider and decide what measures should now be taken. It is in those circumstances that the House is now considering it.

All experience teaches us that such measures directed at the economy of a country, punitively on a universal basis, are most unlikely to be effectively enforced worldwide. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East cited the case of Poland. He must know that in that case economic measures did not produce the effects intended. He cited the case of Rhodesia and he must know that they did not produce the effects intended in that case. If ever they were to be applied in that way to South Africa, their effect would be almost entirely negative. No one should under-estimate the length of time for which resistance within South Africa could be maintained if that economy was seen to be under seige. Meanwhile, there would be severe and long-term consequences for the whole of southern Africa. That is the basis on which the Government are now considering, in consultation with the international community, what measures should be put in place. I shall tell the House the principles that we should have in mind when considering that question.

If such measures are to be effective, any steps that we take must be directed not at the destruction of the South African economy but at influencing opinion in South Africa more firmly in the direction of reform. If they are to be effective, any steps that we take must give the South African Government the incentive to respond positively rather than the excuse to retreat still further into isolation. If they are to be effective, any steps that we take should be designed to encourage the South African Government and the South African business community to press ahead with the agenda of reform. If such measures are to be effective, any steps that we take should be calculated to command, and should secure, the fullest international support at every stage. In the absence of such support, any action would be no more than an empty gesture.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House last Thursday, we shall now be in touch with "our Commonwealth partners, our European partners, and our economic summit partners to discuss this report."—[Official Report, 12 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 490.]

As the House knows, the seven Commonwealth Heads of Government appointed at Nassau, including my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, will be meeting for that purpose in early August in London. We shall of course be in touch with the other Commonwealth Heads of Government long before then.

Meanwhile, we are consulting with Governments of the summit seven. Within Europe, consultations have already begun. At yesterday's meeting of the Community's Foreign Affairs Council in Luxembourg, we had an exchange of views, and commissioned an urgent report from our Political Directors. The Government will be taking a leading and active part in all of these discussions.

As stated in the amendment, which I commend to the House, we shall be working for measures that will be effective in helping to achieve a peaceful solution in South Africa.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose—

Sir Geoffrey Howe: South Africa is a land that we all know to be rich in human and other resources. Yet today South Africa stands closer to a future of violence and misery than ever before. That prospect can be averted only by a process of genuine dialogue and reconciliation. That requires two things: first, the total renunciation of apartheid in all its forms, and secondly, the suspension of violence. Only the Government and peoples of South Africa can achieve those things. Above all, it is for the South African Government to act, and act now.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle) rose

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The international community acting together, can and should take steps to encourage the South African Government to take that action. This Government can and will work actively with our international partners to promote that action now, before it is too late. I invite the House to support the amendment.

4.42 pm

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): It must be clear to anyone who listened to the Foreign Secretary's speech that the Government have not made up their mind what, if anything, they intend to do. That may be an advantage to us all, because this debate has come early enough to influence possibly some of the decisions. Indeed, it is helpful to us that the Prime Minister is in her place in the Chamber. No one is under any illusion but that it is the Prime Minister who will determine whether this country takes the responsible action now necessary to maintain the unity of the Commonwealth.

I believe that an important crack has appeared in the solid facade that white South Africa has presented to the world. There are signs of a crack in the moral judgment of the Dutch Reform Church. Its council is meeting in October, and there are signs that if we can bring international pressure to bear, through the whole international body of Churches, an extremely important change may be made in those very things that underpin apartheid. I say to the Prime Minister that on this issue, above all, a little more genuine moral indignation about what is going on in South Africa would not come amiss.

Without indulging in moral judgments, there is still a desperate need to show that this country is prepared to pay a price in order to live up to our feeling of moral repugnance at what is going on inside South Africa. We must not judge every economic action that may be necessary by the cost to us. There will be costs. Let us evaluate them carefully and make effective judgments.

There has also been a shift of National opinion. It is only a start, but National Members of Parliament are no longer an absolutely solid block. Many of them have understood that they can no longer mend their fences or build bridges back to the far Right. The far Right has chosen its course, and the Nationals are increasingly having to keep the support of the majority of the whites in South Africa, which often includes the English-speaking population. There is now a grouping that goes across Afrikaner and English-speaking South Africans.

There is a major crack, which could become a fissure, in the business and commercial community. It is only too well aware that the pressures from the international business world are increasing so savagely that it will not be long before the economy can no longer stand the strain. The withdrawal of confidence and the private bank actions of last year and this year were of crucial importance in that regard.

Against such a background, what action is needed? Any sanction or measure must have the support of the entire international community. We saw what happened in Rhodesia without the solid support of the international community. But before the Prime Minister can pray in aid the failure of sanctions on Rhodesia, she should acknowledge that one of the greatest weaknesses was that the common border between Rhodesia and South Africa was openly and totally breached with the full connivance of the South African Government.

Furthermore, only a brief reading of the Bingham report shows that successive British Governments connived in the breaking of sanctions. Therefore, it does not lie in the mouths of right hon. and hon. Members to say that sanctions did not work in Rhodesia. Nevertheless, for 15 years sanctions were one of the only ways of showing the world's condemnation of what was going on inside Rhodesia. Although ultimately the armed struggle was the critical pressure, no historian of the independence of Zimbabwe will ever say that sanctions had no impact on the Smith regime. They did. The tragedy was that they could have been much more powerful, and that if they had been carefully and determinedly applied, the armed struggle would not have reaped such a toll.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Owen: No, because Mr. Speaker has asked us to be brief.

Mr. Spicer rose—

Dr. Owen: All right; I will give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Spicer: The right hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he believes that sanctions can be effective only if they have total support. He was Foreign Secretary when we had an arms embargo that in theory had the support of the whole world. Yet he must have know, as everyone else did, that although we honoured the embargo throughout that period, other countries were supplying arms on a massive scale. There was no problem whatever from the South African Government.

Dr. Owen: The hon. Gentleman has made my point. The arms embargo was dishonoured when it was not mandatory. But from 1977 onwards, when it became mandatory, there were many fewer breaches. There were some minor but important breaches, but a fundamental change came about when mandatory sanctions were applied in 1977. The South Africans have developed an arms industry, and if we take action, they will, of course, develop their own indigenous supplies.

However, I turn to the specific areas in which this Government should lead international opinion in taking action against South Africa. First, they should recognise that we must cross the threshold of economic sanctions. The best way of doing that is to put a ban on new investment. That would not have an immediate impact. It would not immediately create mass unemployment, but it would be the clearest and most positive signal to South Africa's business community that the squeeze was being, and would be, relentlessly applied. The South African Government know that there must be a topping up of new investment year in, year out, if the economy is to deal with the demographic and social problems and the strains which are imposed upon it.

It would be beneficial if we could devise an international strategy that would restrict loans to South Africa, but we should be under no illusion that other than for direct Government-to-Government loans that would be difficult to apply. There has been a good deal of experience in this, following the United States attempt to ban loans to Iran. The legislation that the United States Government introduced then and, indeed, the legislation that is before the Senate and the House of Representatives at the moment on the banning of private loans as well might be helpful. That is the most important economic pressure. It will bite slowly but it will be a clear indication to the South African Government that the patience of the international community is fast running out.

The other measure to which I should like to give serious consideration is a ban on direct intercontinental air travel into South Africa. Understandably that causes concern in this country as there are 800,000 people in South Africa with United Kingdom passports. People feel that they would not be able to visit relatives in South Africa. They are afraid that if relatives were ill, they would not be able to go there to visit them in hospital. But there would not be a total ban on air flights into South Africa; it would be a ban on direct flights. Humanitarian flights through the rest of Africa would still be allowed; people could fly out of and into South Africa only by flying to an airfield which was in the control of a black African Government. For the first time, the balance of power in Africa would be tilted in favour of the black states. The problem at the moment is that the black states, particularly those surrounding South Africa, are dependent on rail links into South Africa and out through South African ports.

The House has only to think what would happen were there to be a ban on all intercontinental direct flights into South Africa. The ban would have to be applied by the Swiss as well. It is no use having an exclusion clause for flights to Zurich and Geneva. If there were a total ban on intercontinental direct flights, business men would have to travel through black African countries. If the South African Government carried out a raid against Gaborone, Harare or Lusaka, as they did in outrageous circumstances a few weeks ago, those black African states would no longer allow direct flights between their countries and South Africa and the whole balance of power would have shifted—

Mr. John Carlisle rose—

Dr. Owen: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman can make his statements in support of the South African Government later in the House or, as he frequently does, elsewhere.

The banning of direct flights would exert powerful pressure, which should be applied now.

One other sanction has been much discussed—it has been suggested by the Commonwealth and also by the Dutch Government in the European Community—namely, whether we ought to take action against trade in fruit and vegetables. I need to be convinced about that. The best argument for it is that it would be a way of impacting on the Afrikaans farmer. I think that such action could be evaded and would not have much pressure, but, in singling out the different groups of people to whom we have to bring home the impatience of the world, the Afrikaans farmer is an important element. That sanction might be undertaken in the full knowledge that over the medium term it might not have a great impact, but in the short term, until it could be evaded, it might have a psychological impact.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that many people in fruit farming in South Africa are not Afrikaners? Much more important, does he accept that the people who work on fruit farms — the blacks — are often the worst paid and that they would immediately be the most severely hit by that sanction?

[Mr. Robert Jackson]

Dr. Owen: I agree that that is an objection, but we have to take account of the fact that those black workers, not just their leaders, are saying loud and clear that they want sanctions to be applied. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Time and again we hear from Conservative Members, who risk neither their lives nor their income, that no sanctions should be taken. The fact is that black South Africans are now prepared, as events increasingly show, to risk their lives. They are prepared to lose their income. They went on strike yesterday to remember the massacre in Soweto. They lost their income when they did that. It is not a question that they are not prepared to make a sacrifice. Is this country not prepared to make any sacrifice?

The honest answer must be faced: that there is now a mood in South Africa among the blacks that they are prepared to endure sacrifices to win their freedom. The whole history of the independence movement in South Africa has been that people have been prepared to make immense sacrifices. Look at the sacrifices that were made in Zimbabwe and in Kenya before independence was gained. Hon. Members should consider what was said in the House before Kenyan independence came and before Robert Mugabe became Prime Minister of Zimababwe. It needs to be remembered that there were great massacres. That same pattern of violence will occur again. It is tragic. None of us wants it.

What we want and have the right to demand are genuine negotiations. It is not for us to dictate the constitutional settlement that will have to be reached in South Africa. All we can say is that there must be an open agenda and that there cannot be consultation by hand-me-down. We cannot have the South African Government setting the agenda and choosing the people with whom they should negotiate. They must recognise that genuine negotiations mean an open agenda to be discussed with the true representatives of black opinion. That means recognising that a charismatic figure like Nelson Mandela is necessary to keep the unity of black Africa in any negotiations in which compromise is to be struck.

Looking back over the history of Kenya, how much easier it was for the compromises to be achieved because there was an outstanding leader, Jomo Kenyatta. The same can be said of many other African countries as they went from a period of armed struggle and violence towards the transition to independence and democracy. It may be different democracy from what we have here. I should like to see much better democracy. But let us remember that little Botswana, which was taken out by the South Africans, is one of the best representatives of democracy. [Interruption.] Conservative Members should look back at what they said would be the fate of Kenya. They should remind themselves that Kenya, which is a one-party state, nevertheless has a stable Government who rule, broadly speaking, in the interests of most of its citizens.

I say finally to the Prime Minister that there is not much time. The right hon. Lady thinks somehow that it does not matter if she is the only one who is left out, but it does matter. There are one or two countries — Nigeria is certainly one — which are not enthusiastic about continued membership of the Commonwealth and might like to have an excuse to leave the Commonwealth on an emotive issue. We ought not to give them the opportunity.

Furthermore, even if the Commonwealth staggers through, and the Prime Minister, kicking and screaming, struggling to the last comma, eventually concedes and we cross the threshold of economic sanctions, great damage will have been done to our standing. We may be the 19th industrial nation in the world, but we still have moral values and a commitment to democracy that needs to be heard. Many Commonwealth countries want to hear that voice, and they want to hear it from the Prime Minister before it is too late.

4.59 pm

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridge, South-East): There is not the slightest doubt from the speeches that we have heard so far that the House appreciates the gravity of the issue. I see two aspects to that. The first is related to the lives of the people in South Africa, the hardships that many of them know, the privileges enjoyed by some, and the aspirations of all. It is the people who are suffering. The second aspect is the perception of South Africa by the rest of the world. The disquiet that has long existed has grown over the years to a detestation of that regime. It has reached the point where there is almost a universal feeling that it is no longer adequate to be a spectator and wring our hands. Very few of us find it acceptable to do nothing. That international reality is clearly of the utmost significance.

We must also understand something of the history of the issue. The issue is more complex than the language that we use can express. The racial conflict in South Africa — and that is what it is — has deep roots. The present generation are the innocent inheritor and victim of events of long ago for which they bear no responsibility. I have no doubt that there was some kind of discrimination in the days of the great leaders such as Smuts and others. However, they were inspired by their vision of a promising future for their rich country that benefited all races and the whole population. Discrimination was no part of their outlook. Only in the past 30 years has discrimination become the basis of policy.

I would like to remind the House of the words of my noble Friend the Earl of Stockton when he was a Prime Minister. In a debate in the House on 22 March 1961, when the House was debating South Africa leaving the Commonwealth as a result of its vote to become a republic, the then Prime Minister, my noble Friend, said:

"the Prime Minister of South Africa, with an honesty which one must recognise"— and here my noble Friend was referring to the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference that he had just attended—

"made it abundantly clear beyond all doubt that he would not think it right to relax in any form the extreme rigidity of his dogma, either now or in the future. And it is a dogma. To us it is strange, but it is a dogma which is held with all the force of one of those old dogmas which men fought and struggled for in the past."—[Official Report, 22 March 1961; Vol. 637, c. 445].

That dogma has been pursued ruthlessly ever since, to the point where millions in South Africa, who suffer under it, can take it no longer. They are sending out a cry for help, as would any drowning man. The most valid and authentic expression of the present position is the report of the Eminent Persons Group with its compelling opening sentence and its conclusions.

The meaning of the report is clear. All endeavours to influence South Africa in its internal policy have so far failed, and evidently there is no prospect of South Africa changing if left to its own devices except in so far as internal violence might force that. However, no one would wish that course to be pursued. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs referred to some changes in his speech. However, I believe that the drift of those changes is that the South African Government are maintaining rigid control. The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said that he had detected the possibility of hopeful changes. I hope that he is right.

A great many countries, including virtually all of the Commonwealth and the whole of Europe, have reached the stage where it is too uncomfortable to continue to do nothing. The feeling is that inaction in this case is immoral. I am especially glad to note that Her Majesty's Government share the desire for some form of action, that they accept the need for that and, in the amendment, they are asking the House to support a policy

"to work actively . . . for effective measures."

I would hope and expect the House to support that.

However, there is an urgent need for action. The problems are self-evident and people's patience is running out. The period immediately ahead must be one of vigorous activity to carry the words in the amendment into practice. That brings me to the issue of sanctions. That issue is overloaded with emotion on both sides of the argument. We have already seen that expressed this afternoon. There is a place for emotion but policy, especially on such a delicate and difficult issue, must be based on rational argument.

I believe that the arguments against comprehensive sanctions or economic sanctions are intellectually strong and intellectually valid. The case against them is not proven by experience. However, it must be said that that experience is not encouraging. It is also true that sanctions would inflict hardship on individuals in South Africa and on the national economy with all the consequences that that would bring. But it must also be said that the opposite policy of not applying sanctions or doing nothing has not resulted in political progress, let alone power-sharing. Rather, the result has been to increase the laager approach and the use of emergency powers. That has also inflicted hardship on individuals just as the policy of sanctions would although they are different in detail.

It is a Catch 22 position. I believe that the Eminent Persons Group report shows the way. The hope was that the group would find a way forward, and that it would set in motion a peace process based on negotiations and a greater degree of mutual understanding within South Africa.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pym: The hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way.

That is why the group came into existence after the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference. However, it has failed. The report clearly implies that, in its unanimous view, further measures are required. I would like to see my right hon. Friends and the British Government take a positive lead in identifying those measures. I do not want to see the Government being a reluctant co-operator. I want to see the Government set their objections aside. I did not feel that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, for all that he said this afternoon, had any great enthusiasm for the task ahead. He did not appear to be approaching such an immensely difficult task with the vigour and enthusiasm that are required.

We have reached the point when further measures are essential and we must use our experience and international position to help the Commonwealth, the European Community and all our friends around the world, to find a solution. We must have the support of the United States, Japan and Germany as well as the Commonwealth — and I speak as an enthusiastic supporter of the Commonwealth. The task is formidable and urgent. I do not believe that any other country can fulfil that task as we can and we must look to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to take the initiative and lead the way. The sooner the first measure is put in place, the better. If that turns out to be a restriction on investment, so be it.

There is an added and important reason why, in my view, together we must succeed. On any geopolitical or strategic analysis, the so-called free world — the Western democracies, call it what you like — need South Africa for its huge resources and its geographical position. It matters that South Africa is a part of the free world. No wonder the Communists do all that they can to undermine South Africa.

We must find the way to bring South Africa back into the fold of our civilised democracies. That, aside from the great disarmament issue, or even despite it, is the greatest challenge facing the world today. We look to the British Government to meet that challenge.

5.8 pm

Dame Judith Hart (Clydesdale): I would like to tell the House something about another panel of eminent persons. I am sorry that the Prime Minister is leaving the Chamber, because I do not think that she has had an opportunity to read our report. I was a member of a panel of eminent persons appointed by the Secretary General of the United Nations last autumn, which reported the weekend before the Nassau conference and before the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group was set up.

Our group was set up to hold public hearings in New York for a week on transnational corporations, South Africa and Namibia. We heard from, put questions to and had discussions with people, such as the International Chamber of Commerce, the South African Chamber of Commerce, the African National Congress, economists and various representatives of interest groups, and we produced a report.

I tell the House this because it has not been reported in the British press. I am probably giving the House information of which it is not aware. The report was accepted by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations in April by a vote of 23 to two. Britain and the United States were the two countries that voted against. The report goes to the General Assembly in the autumn. It is also before the United Nations conference on sanctions against South Africa, which is being held in

[Dame Judith Hart]

Paris this week and which I shall attend tomorrow. However, again, it is not being attended by the British Government.

I shall refer to the report's recommendations in relation to today's debate. Everybody who has spoken so far, from both sides of the House, has been in agreement about one simple proposition—that we all hate apartheid and we all want to do what we can to end it. I know that one or two Conservative Members might not agree wholly with that point of view, but 98 per cent. of the Members of the House of Commons do.

Mr. Winnick: That is what they all say.

Dame Judith Hart: I give them credit for believing it.

Mr. Winnick: They say that.

Dame Judith Hart: I give 98 per cent. credit for believing it.

Today we are attacking the question of measures. Personally, I hope very much that the Opposition will not vote against the Government amendment to our motion. I am prepared to welcome any study of measures, because it takes us further forward. I believe that our motion is stronger and better, but I hope that we shall not oppose the Government amendment.

The real issue at stake is what those measures should be. If we agree that measures are to be taken, and that measures to try to influence an end to apartheid in South Africa are to be welcomed, we are in the ball game of deciding what they should be. We should be absolutely clear about that. This is where the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) was indulging in a fair amount of mudge and smudge. We must decide. Do we seek measures, which we hope will make Botha and the South African Government feel ashamed of themselves, and make them say, "The international community does not really like us very much. We are disapproved of very much. We had better do something about it."?

I say to those who take that view that measures should seek only to influence opinion in South Africa. The former has been tried for a long time now has not succeeded. What is more, the partial action envisaged, such as banning air flights and avocados, is designed to stiffen the resistance of the extreme Right in South Africa. If nasty things are being done to someone, which he does not like and which make him feel guilty and bad, such things do not change the person. He says, "What horrible people they are who are doing these things." Such measures are likely to be counter-productive. Therefore, I reject any measures that seek merely to say to South Africa, "Behave better. We do not like you."

I am after the sort of thing that the Prime Minister talks about—effective measures. I now come to some of the recommendations of the report by the panel of which I was privileged to be a member. We were dealing with transnationals, which included transnational banks. We dealt with the activities of the transnationals in a country in which, as in all other countries, they have to obey the law. South African law includes the key point, that every transnational corporation operating in South Africa is bound to secrecy. That is part of the law. On behalf of the South African Government, the transnationals have to operate legislation against various people whom the Government do not like. The transnational corporations have to be wrapped up in that; they have to be part of it if they are to obey the laws of the country. They may not operate if they cannot obey the laws of the country.

The transnationals are involved in the supply of various things that are absolutely crucial and critical to the South African economy. I am talking not about destroying the South African economy, but about the elements in the economy that depend almost entirely on the support of foreign transnational corporations in critical areas.

Examples are the supply of computers, electronic equipment and vehicles. South Africa cannot operate its apartheid system without the direct involvement of transnational corporations that supply not only the equipment but the know-how in computers, electronics and vehicles. One needs computers to operate a sophisticated system such as apartheid. It is not a casual system. We have seen that in the arrests in the past week, whether of 1,000 or 3,000 people. The South African Government know precisely where everybody is. A computer system is needed for that. South Africa has that system because it has had the assistance of the transnational corporations which are operating in South Africa.

I am not criticising the transnationals at this stage. South Africa has had their co-operation in the supply of know-how, equipment and managerial skills, and in the transfer of technology in the nuclear industry.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: What about the exchange of high technology and the provision of cheap food to the Soviet Union?

Dame Judith Hart: What has that got to do with it? The hon. Gentleman is so foolish as to be abysmally unworthy of being in the House.

Mr. Winterton: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dame Judith Hart: I am not giving way.

Mr. Winterton rose—

Dame Judith Hart: I am not giving way. The hon. Gentleman can attack me later or report me to the Freedom Association. I do not care which.

Therefore, certain trans-nationals in some sectors are crucial to the South African economy. The banks are particularly important. I agree with the right hon. Member for Devonport about loans. The activities of the transnational banks are probably the most critical factor of all. I hope that the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, and the group of officials in the EC who are to report to Heads of Government next week, will have noted that the period when it seemed hopeful that change was occurring in South Africa, when Botha was introducing certain important reforms, was the very period when the banks and the International Monetary Fund, following last August, said, "We are not sure whether we shall reschedule. We are not at all sure whether we shall help you." When did it all go sour again? When did the South African Government begin to tighten up again and abandon all hopes of reform? In January, when the IMF and the banks agreed to reschedule and let the South African economy tick over as usual.

I am in no doubt whatever about that, and the Bank of America, for example, which has withdrawn from South Africa, is in no doubt. Other American banks, way ahead of our British banks, see the writing on the wall. As the Foreign Secretary said, there was less investment because of the judgment in world capital markets. He was right. But what the banks do is not just a matter for their private judgment. What they do is largely influenced and determined by what the IMF does. It was what the IMF reported in December that led to the rescheduling in January. Governments play a key role in the IMF, as they do in relation to the major banks in Britain and in the United States.

What our report suggested was simple. I offer this as one kind of measure. I am not necessarily saying that there should not be others, but this should be included on the agenda of measures. Our proposition, which has been accepted by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, is that transnational corporations operating in key sectors should disinvest if they consider that obedience to South African law is in conflict with their asserted moral duty to oppose apartheid. They should not just decline to participate in any new investment; they should disinvest. If they do not disinvest by January 1987, there should be international resolutions to ensure that they do.

As many people have said, there is no doubt that influencing, not destroying, the economy of South Africa is the key factor. When the South African chamber of commerce talked to us in New York, it made it clear that it considered the future of business enterprise in South Africa as dependent upon the existence of a multiracial democracy. It wants that and, as we know, it has already talked to the African National Congress. Only by that sort of effective financial measure and disinvestment in key sectors of the transnational corporations' activities which are so essentially involved in apartheid shall we strengthen the hand of the business community in South Africa. Ultimately that is probably the only voice that will count against the extreme Right in South Africa which is forcing Botha, or with which he is willingly going along, towards an increasingly Fascist type of repression.

Whatever decisions are made about effective measures there are other criteria which should be taken into account and against which judgments must be made. One of those criteria is whether what is proposed is likely to command effective international support for trade sanctions. I do not understand why, in any logical analysis of the problem before us, so much emphasis has been placed on trade sanctions. They are just one of the measures that can be taken, but they are open to evasion by commercial organisations or countries. I do not understand why, when people talk of sanctions, they automatically assume that sanctions equal trade sanctions. There are many others, as I am trying to suggest.

It must be right that whatever measures are adopted are capable of universal application. In that regard it is important to recognise, according to the information that we have, that three countries command or control most of the transnational corporations operating in South Africa: 142 transnationals are West German, 341 are British, and 407 are American. Other countries have comparatively fewer transnational corporations in South Africa.

However, we must consider the need for self-protection and minimising the damage to Britain. Of those many transnational corporations, probably 90 per cent. have only a minute fringe marginal involvement in South Africa. They will not be damaged if they have to leave. Of the others, even of those major transnationals which have a considerable involvement in South Africa, I doubt whether their involvement represents more than a relatively small proportion of their total economic activity.

This is where we need to apply some economic analysis. I do not know what proportion of the activities of the British Oxygen Co. Ltd. – whose director, Sir Leslie Smith, is now the chairman of the British Industry Committee on South Africa – are dependent on its South African activities. I suspect that it is only marginal. I was cheered when I heard Sir Leslie Smith say, "If we think that sanctions will be effective, we will sacrifice our own self-interest." That is splendid.

Effective financial sanctions and disinvestment by key transnational corporations in key sectors of the South African economy need not present great damage or loss of jobs to the British economy.

A further criterion is that in our judgments about what are the best measures to take against South Africa, we must also take into account that some measures which we ask all countries to adopt could produce the maximum retaliation against the front-line states. That would not be sensible because the front-line states are immensely vulnerable. It has already been seen that South Africa has no hesitation whatever in taking ruthless military retaliation against the front-line states. We must consider that factor.

It would be all very well to say, "Stop the supply of fruit and vegetables; stop the supply of avocados; stop the supply of exports from South Africa through the southern African routes." But we must bear in mind what the consequences of that might be for the front-line states. That is a valid factor that we have a duty to take into account. That is not to say that the front-line states are not prepared to accept tremendous sacrifices, but it is something to be put into the books when one considers the pros and cons.

Out of what I regard as a fair amount of muddle and confusion surrounding the issues that we are debating, I hope that we can now move to sensible economic analyses and judgments which take account of all the information available to us and the fact that we are not only meeting a demand from our colleagues in the Commonwealth when we study the matter and seek to produce satisfactory answers, but that we are also likely to be answerable to the wider forum of the United Nations, at least by, if not before, the autumn.

5.29 pm

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): I agree with much of what the right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) has just said, as I am sure do other hon. Members. The problem, as the right hon. Lady said, is not whether we want to get rid of apartheid but the best way to do that. Some of the solutions that the right hon. Lady suggests should be adopted.

However, I do not agree with what the right hon. Lady said about the transnational corporations. She omitted one thing. The presence of the transnational corporations in South Africa can be beneficial provided that they take with them the practices, especially the employment practices, which they have in their own countries. I believe that that can help.

In general, I join those who believe that trade sanctions are not appropriate because I do not believe that Botha intends to relinquish power, whatever the pressures and whatever the cost. That is the opinion of the Eminent

[Sir Anthony Kershaw]

Persons Group and many others. It was, for example, the opinion of Dr. van Zyl Slabbert, who, as the House knows was the leader of the loosely described liberal party's national party in the South African Parliament. He came before the Foreign Affairs Select Committee and described his parliamentary policies and activities. He then returned to South Africa and almost immediately resigned from the House there. I had the advantage of seeing him later and I asked why on earth he had done that; he gave us no hint that he would do it. The reason, he said, was that he had had four interviews with President Botha as soon as he got back, and after the last one he was convinced that President Botha did not mean a word that he said and had no intention of introducing any meaningful reforms.

If that is so, neither sanctions nor anything else are relevant to changing Mr. Botha's mind. That is where the Eminent Persons Group went wrong. Sanctions will be an exercise by us in moral indignation. Of course, as the Eminent Persons Group says, the South African Government fear sanctions. They will obviously make life more difficult and less comfortable. But it does not follow that they will change their mind because of them. The idea that the present regime in South Africa will turn to one man, one vote and agree, in effect, to commit suicide, which is the prospect before them, is vain.

Sanctions will have an effect all right. They will bring, if universally applied, and are intended to bring, unemployment, poverty and despair, leading not, as I have argued, to surrender by Botha, but to revolution or attempted revolution and then civil war — in fact, the bloodbath foreseen by the Eminent Persons Group — sooner rather than later.

My second objection to sanctions is less important but it should not be overlooked. History warns us that sanctions will be not universally observed. We shall probably witness much damage to our air routes, interests, markets, investments and employment. We shall see those opportunities being snapped up by others less scrupulous. There are also those who stand to lose nothing at present by sanctions but who do stand to benefit by the alteration in trade patterns which they would bring with them.

Some states and peoples, besides ourselves, will suffer, and suffer badly. They, or perhaps their leaders principally, are, we are informed, willing to endure the hardship which trade sanctions would bring upon them. That is their decision and one cannot but admire their courage and fortitude in that matter. But we should put down a slight caution: let them not come running to us to make up what they have lost in South Africa.

Furthermore, there are 800,000 British passport holders in South Africa who have a right of abode here and who may, if there is a war, come to the United Kingdom. Zola Budd would be only the forerunner—if that is the right word. We might see an influx of refugees——

Mr. John Carlisle: Let us hope that they are cricketers.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Those refugees will have left their possessions behind them. Their chance of livelihood destroyed.

Mr. Carlisle: They can bring their cricket bats.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: They can do various things with cricket bats, but not earn much money with them.

Those refugees would be entitled to stay here and, bereft of the resources that they have left behind, would have to be supported by the state.

My last objection to sanctions is that they do not bring the parties to the conference table. Rhodesia has been mentioned this afternoon. Sanctions in Rhodesia did not end the Rhodesian problem. It was the war which ended that. If it is said, "So be it. Let us have sanctions. Let us provoke a war," I say that that is not the price which we, from outside, are entitled to ask the peoples of South Africa to pay.

It may be right — the right hon. Lady referred to this — that some lesser measures than universal sanctions should be taken to show our abhorrence of apartheid. Her Majesty's Government have already made clear their feelings about that matter. Our policy that Mandela should be released without conditions and that the basic changes should take place in the South African state is something which we can only continue to affirm with ever greater resolution.

It may be right to do that, apart from anything else, to meet the deeply held feelings of other Commonwealth countries. It would be a diplomatic disaster in many ways — not for Britain alone — if the Commonwealth were to start to break up because of this matter. But the measures which could be taken must be universally agreed and applied and should not be such as to ruin South Africa and to bring about quickly the tragedy that we seek to avoid.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will my hon. Friend consider the vast possibilities of economic pressure such as having a Marshall plan for southern Africa and the front-line states for development, of which South Africa deprives itself if it does not immediately put a line through the word and legislation of apartheid?

Sir Anthony Kershaw: My hon. and learned Friend is right. I see political difficulties in turning 180 degrees and starting to invest heavily in South Africa at present, but it would be desirable if we could bring prosperity to South Africa. It is far more likely that we would get our way about apartheid in that way than otherwise.

But we do not, as the right hon. Member for Clydesdale said, have to pass many resolutions in the House or anywhere else on economic measures. They are happening by themselves. If we were to pass a decree now that no one should invest in South Africa, it would not be necessary. Who is investing in South Africa? We can tell the bankers how to behave, but they are already behaving in the way that we would wish. That is unnecessary. Nevertheless, we must consult our partners in order to agree what the object should be. I am sure that it is possible to do that in a way which would bring home to South Africa that the time has come when it will have to bend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) said that fruit and vegetables should be allowed to come to Britain. I agree. The people who produce the fruit and vegetables are the poorest in South Africa, and it would be a tragedy and a great mistake to strike at them.

The senior leadership on both sides in South Africa appears to be beyond redemption. They both demand all or nothing and no compromise is possible for them. But surely, in contemplation of this, many of the younger people in South Africa, not only whites but blacks and not only the English but the Afrikaners, are starting to see that a compromise must be found.

The business world is very much against sanctions. No managing director could stand up and ask for sanctions which would ruin his company. Nevertheless, they are inclined to think that a compromise is possible. They see that it is inevitable. I can think of many compromises, as could any hon. Member. One which has been bruited around — I do not know whether it has any chance of success — is that Natal, which is largely English speaking, should have a provincial Government, mixed with black and white. It has been said that the obvious candidate for the president or leader would be Chief Buthelezi. Once that sort of thing was started, it could never be stopped. Such important changes could be made.

We must also recognise, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said, that President Botha has proposed some remarkable changes. The trouble is that we do not believe him, and nor does anybody else, but I hope that they can be done. If he finds that he has support, perhaps he will change his mind and do what he says he wants to do.

Has diplomancy really been exhausted? Is our only policy that intended to provoke civil war in which the voices of the moderates would soon be drowned by the bombs and the machine guns? I hope that we shall not be stampeded by the shouts of those behind us — I am speaking metaphorically — who in many cases stand in no danger and perhaps even hope to gain. Let us not be stampeded into a policy of all-out sanctions which can justly be described as a policy of "Cry havoc and let slip the dogs of war."

5.38 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I was encouraged, as was my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), by the terms of the Government's amendment to the Opposition's motion. The Opposition's motion refers to

"the imposition of effective economic measures against the Government of South Africa",

The Government's amendment refers to "effective measures" leaving out the word "economic". That presumably means that the Government are prepared to consider, with our partners, other forms of pressure on the South African Government provided that they are seen to be effective in influencing the way in which the South African Government operate.

One measure, which is presumably included in the terms of the Government amendment, is the supply of arms to the African National Congress in order to strengthen it in putting pressure on the South African Government. The Government amendment leaves out the word economic, so presumably it encompasses the possible use of force by Britain, by other countries in the Commonwealth or by countries which believe that the future of South Africa could become so disastrous as a result of doing little or nothing or by using economic sanctions that prove ineffective, that the use of force would be the only way to solve the problem.

It has been said in the debate that economic sanctions were ineffective against Rhodesia, and that it was the use of force that finally got rid of Ian Smith and his racialist regime and led to the birth of Zimbabwe. We may find all too quickly that that will happen in South Africa and in that sense I am encouraged by the terms of the Government amendment.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) Before my hon. Friend becomes too enthusiastic in his textual analysis, will he note that the Government amendment leaves out the United Nations?

Mr. Barnett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. I do note that the United Nations has been left out of the Government amendment. Nevertheless, it is interesting to see that the phrase "effective measures" is included in the amendment. I, and I daresay many of my hon. Friends, were disappointed by the terms of the Foreign Secretary's speech. It seemed that he had either not read the Eminent Persons Group report or was not living in the real world. That report contains an introduction by the Secretary General of the Commonwealth in which he says:

"Apartheid must end. It will end; if necessary through a bloody struggle."

In concluding their report the members of the Eminent Persons Group used the following horrifying sentence:

"There could be little doubt that the alternative to a negotiated solution would be appalling chaos, bloodshed and destruction."

That is the situation facing the House. With due respect to the Foreign Secretary, he did not give a proper picture of the urgent problem that we face. In his speech the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) said that Dr. Botha is intransigent. Because of that we must find effective measures to deal with a situation that will not be dealt with by peaceful negotiation, a phrase of which the Foreign Secretary was fond. If there is not already a war in southern Africa there soon will be, and certainly, the amount of violence in South Africa and the violence committed by South Africa against its immediate northern neighbours are the first signs of developing bloodshed that will affect the whole of southern Africa. For that reason this is a desperately urgent problem, and the Government's present attitude does not measure up to it. The attitude is that we can wait until the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in August. That is, if there is not some need now for a strongly worded statement in the face of the deteriorating situation in South Africa and nearby.

There is violence in South Africa's townships and there are signs that that violence is moving out of the townships and into the white areas, into the cities and the towns. As I have said, there have already been examples of violence in South Africa spreading beyond its borders and affecting innocent countries such as Botswana. This is not merely a minor civil war, something going on within the borders of another country; it is taking place on the international stage, and for that reason it directly concerns the Commonwealth. That was clearly recognised at the last Heads of Government meeting.

Events in South Africa directly concern the Commonwealth because Heads of Government meetings year after year have been characterised by an interest in racial equality, a hostility to racialism, and an interest in the contrast between the wealth of the West and the poverty of the South. The Commonwealth Heads of Government in Nassau were bound to take seriously events in South Africa. Those Heads of Government could not stand aside from something that not merely affected South Africa but was certain to engulf, as has been said before, much of southern Africa and which could have disastrous consequences for the African continent.

[Mr. Barnett]

For a long time I have believed in the unique value of the Commonwealth in world affairs. It may be that an accident of history brought the Commonwealth into existence, but it has flourished with very little encouragement from British Governments. The latest example of the way in which the Government devalue the Commonwealth is that the post of the head of the Commonwealth co-ordination department in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has been degraded. That is another example of the attitude taken in Britain to an association that is more deeply valued in other Commonwealth countries than it often appears to be in Britain.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Did the hon. Gentleman see an article in The Daily Telegraph yesterday by Mr. T. E. Utley, who spoke of the Commonwealth as more of an encumbrance than a reality? It is sometimes from Fleet street that we get the worst advice.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) will be well aware of the long hostility of The Daily Telegraph to the Commonwealth and of the general hostility that exists in large sections of the British press. That causes enormous distress in the Commonwealth and does Britain great damage in Commonwealth countries. Many hon. Members travel abroad, either with the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association or under their own auspices and, it is to be hoped, we do something to restore the balance by demonstrating that at least many hon. Members value the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth has enormous relevance to the current situation, just as it had relevance to the situation in Zimbabwe. It also has enormous relevance in drawing a contrast between wealth and poverty. It would be the most appalling disaster if, through action or through a failure to act by the Prime Minister and the Government, the future of the Commonwealth were to be endangered or if, as an association, it came to be devalued and people looked elsewhere for international association and co-operation. The Commonwealth has an enormously valuable contribution to make not just to members of the Commonwealth but to international peace. We ought to take seriously the fact that we currently find ourselves in a minority of one. We should do everything that we can, through debates in the House and through the way in which those debates are represented outside, to reassure other members of the Commonwealth of our commitment to a non-racist policy and to effective measures, economic or otherwise, that will change the course of history in southern Africa.

Mr. Peter Thomas (Hendon, South): The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) made a helpful contribution to this sensitive, difficult debate which contrasted with the speech of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who adopted a characteristically belligerent and partisan tone which does not accord with the general type of speech we have had so far.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Commonwealth group's report, and it is right that he and others should have done so, because the debate has been brought about by it. The Commonwealth group of seven eminent persons from five continents have produced a report which will inevitably have a major impact on international opinion and which cannot and must not be ignored. One may have reservations about some of its conclusions and regrets about some of its omissions, but when unanimity is shown by eminent and to some extent disparate people on a sensitive, contentious subject such as South Africa, their views inevitably command respect.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned Lord Barber, who is well known to many hon. Members. No one could accuse him of being prejudiced against South Africa or of being other than an objective realist. He wholly supports and endorses the report. The group visited South Africa to try to find a path for peaceful change. Its objectives along that path were the dismantling of apartheid and the establishment of a non-racial representative Government. Sadly, it felt that its efforts to promote those objectives had been unavailing and that its mission was a failure. Therefore, its report is one of considerable gloom.

The group saw a country in upheaval and witnessed great human suffering. It expressed little doubt that the alternative to a negotiated solution would be appalling chaos, bloodshed and destruction. It is the group's considered view that, despite appearances and statements to the contrary, the South African Government are not yet ready to negotiate a non-racial representative Government, except on their terms, which, in the group's view, fall far short of reasonable black expectations and well accepted democratic norms and principles.

The only hopeful part of those views are the words "not yet". It is the Eminent Persons Group's opinion that the South African Government are seeking not to end apartheid but to give it a less inhuman face, and that their commitment to power sharing when analysed means that overall white control would never be surrendered. The group also reached the conclusion, with which I agree, that there can be no possibility of meaningful negotiations without including the African National Congress.

The EPG was by no means unaware of the many difficulties facing the Pretoria Government. I have no doubt that President Botha is anxious to bring about reform. Indeed, many changes have been made, and were mentioned by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw). But when those changes have been made the President has received little appreciation or encouragement from outside. That has intensified the anxieties and demands of the Right wing of his party. That and organised black violence have produced a white backlash which is a major obstruction to the acceptance of meaningful reform. The EPG was left with the impression of a divided Government, but its avid impression that white opinion as a whole may be ahead of the Government in significant respects and ready to respond positively if given a bold lead is an important matter to bear in mind.

Mr. Fairbairn: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that when we are discussing the matters to be undertaken it is important that we ensure that the white opinion which is at present ahead of the South African Government is not driven back behind that Government?

Mr. Thomas: My hon. and learned Friend is right. Obviously, that is the implication of what I said and the reason why I raised the matter, but I am grateful to him for elucidating it beyond doubt.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that Mr. Botha is in a not dissimilar position to the Prime Minister because 42 of her back Right-wing colleagues have signed an amendment stating that they are "resolutely opposed" to sanctions? That also creates similar problems for the Minister who will reply.

Mr. Thomas: I am rather sorry that I gave way. I hoped that the hon. Gentleman would try to assist me in making my speech and even try to assist in the debate, but his intervention was wholly outside anything that I said or was likely to say.

It is sad that the EPG found that not one of the five steps of the Nassau accord which the Government of Pretoria were called on to take as a matter of emergency had been taken. It has found that there is no genuine intention to dismantle apartheid; that the state of emergency, far from being terminated, has been further strengthened; that Nelson Mandela and the other political leaders remain in prison; that political freedom is being more rigorously curtailed; and that the cycle of violence and counter-violence has spiralled and there is no prospect of a process of dialogue leading to the establishment of a non-racial representative Government.

That is a sad, sombre picture. What can be done? What remaining influence does the international community have? In the words of the report:

"What can major states do to help avert an otherwise inevitable disaster?"

The EPG recommends effective, concerted action and suggests, without determining their nature or extent, the adoption of effective economic measures. The operative word is "effective" — measures which will be effective and help to promote clear objectives. What are those objectives? For most of us they are the end of apartheid, the end of violence and the promotion of a structure of non-racial democracy.

I agree with those who believe that full economic and financial sanctions which put South Africa into economic isolation will not be effective in promoting those objectives. They would achieve precisely the opposite effect and would not persuade Pretoria to succumb to international opinion. All experience has shown that states which are treated as outcasts behave as outcasts. Comprehensive economic sanctions on South Africa would fortify strong Afrikaner isolationism, pander to the siege attitude and mentality there and, above all, divorce South Africa, particularly that white opinion which is ahead of the Government, from all worthwhile outside influence. The only justification for such sanctions is that they promote moral uplift for those who propose them. It is an interesting question whether such moral uplift can be sustained when it becomes clear that the effects of sanctions could be large-scale black unemployment and increasing black deprivation and depression.

I agree with Sir John Killick, the eminent ex-diplomat, who, in his letter to The Times today, wrote:

"There has surely never been a time when it has been more necessary to apply cool and dispassionate judgment to the problem of South Africa."

I therefore wholly support the Prime Minister's amendment. The EEC, the Commonwealth and the economic summit seven must consult and co-operate coolly and dispassionately and try to agree measures which will be effective in helping to achieve a peaceful solution for South Africa based on negotiations and a suspension of violence on all sides.

The measures must not be designed to drive South Africa into isolation and possible chaos but must be politically effective. The measures must show Pretoria that the international world is determined that apartheid must go and progress must be made towards the other objectives. The measures must not finally close the door to outside contact and influence but must be effective in their impact and carry with them a united international warning that more will follow should progress not be made. I wish the Government and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State all good fortune in their task.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The right hon. and learned Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Thomas), in common with many of his hon. Friends, once again opposes meaningful sanctions. Once again Tory Members offer no solution to the House on how to deal with this problem. I am afraid that this attitude is all too typical, not only in this debate but in many debates we have had on the subject over the years.

It is true — many Conservative Members have said this — that it may well be impossible to make progress in South Africa and to achieve a multiracial society without there being sacrifices. This has been accepted by all who are in favour of progress. Throughout our history few meaningful achievements in democracy have been made without individual sacrifices. We are seeing that before our very eyes today.

What is astonishing — I felt this when the Foreign Secretary was making his speech and referred to the jobs that might be lost in Britain — is that the Government pay such little regard to the passionately held views of the British public who want to see social justice and freedom emerge in South Africa. They have made it clear that they are prepared to pay a price.

There is nothing new in this. On 26 July 1833, the Bill for the abolition of slavery passed its Second Reading in the House. It was a Government measure and its success was assured. When Wilberforce heard the news he said:

"Thank God, that I should have lived to witness a day in which England is willing to give twenty millions sterling for the Abolition of Slavery."

I believe that the spirit that inspired those remarks and which helped towards the abolition of slavery, despite the fact that there was a cost, still exists. I will not accept that the British people, the people of the Commonwealth, of Europe and the United States are not prepared to contribute towards a solution to the problem, even though the Government gave no suggestion that they are searching for that solution.

What worries me — this emerged in the debate today — is that, sometimes, the Government give the impression that they simply do not want to listen. The facts are there, even though they are not always widely reported because of the restrictions in South Africa. It is absolutely absurd that we could not hear of the meeting of Bishop Tutu and President Botha on Sunday because the South Africans decided that, somehow or other, to report such an event would represent a challenge to their state. Is it not also absurd that a Conservative Member could say on TV-am today that Bishop Tutu does not have much of a following? Does anyone imagine that the President of South Africa would have spent a single minute, far less one and a half hours, with Bishop Tutu, if that were the case?

We are arguing over a serious issue and the background to that problem has been absolutely plain over the years and especially in recent months. We have all witnessed years of oppression, the denial of human rights and state-sponsored killings. Indeed on Sunday, The Observer mentioned that even today, 2,000 people are in detention. The black majority are reacting, as we would expect them to do, to the existence of oppressive rule by the minority 15 per cent. of the white population. I am not for a second suggesting that all the white minority agree with what the regime is doing. Nevertheless the kind of reactions we are seeing are inevitable when democratic institutions are not available. The majority cannot assert themselves or assess the values which Bishop Tutu and many others share.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke) rose

Mr. Clarke: I am sorry, but many hon. Members wish to speak and I do not want to stand in their way.

The British Government's position is shamefully negative. Nothing we have heard today will alter my view. The Government, at the United Nations, the EEC and within the Commonwealth, when they have had every opportunity to influence the direction of history, have been weak. They have been ambiguous and have failed to offer the kind of solution that I believe the British people want.

Meanwhile, in South Africa the shout for progress and freedom has become louder still, and why not? On every test, from the rate of infant mortality to educational expenditure, to the payment of wages, coloureds and Asians are at a disadvantage and the Africans are the most underprivileged of the lot. Many blacks are receiving a fifth of the average monthly wages of their white counterparts for doing exactly the same jobs. In 1983 to 1984 the South African Government spent nearly six times as much on education on every white head as on every African one. I regard that as shameful.

Discrimination is evident in the health service. There are two distinct patterns for blacks and whites. Whites have a much lower infant mortality rate and a much greater life expectancy. Obviously, there must be a challenge to that type of society within South Africa and it is clear that there is.

It is equally obvious when we consider the regime's response to that challenge—oppressive Acts, detention without trial, bans on meetings and organisations, curfews, news censorship and so on, many of which were practised even before the emergency was declared—that it accepts that kind of approach to a very difficult and delicate problem but is also in the process of institutionalising powers that enhance the role of the military and the police to continue the oppression that my hon. Friends and I regard as absolutely repugnant.

We have recently witnessed developments in that direction. At the very time when the Eminent Persons Group might have been making some progress—even President Botha was giving the impression that he was trying to co-operate—President Botha panicked, pandered to his extreme Right wing and there were dramatic military raids on Zimbabwe, Zambia and Botswana, as well as related actions. As a result of such an indefensible record, 70,000 people are homeless. It is no wonder that The Observer reported:

"Those are the actions of a government which has shut its mind to world opinion."

That is extremely sad, but just as sad is the fact that our Government do not seem to be responding to world opinion. The future of the Commonwealth is important. It appalled me to hear at least one Conservative Member say "good riddance" earlier today—I understand that it was the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). That is no way to peace and co-operation between nations. Nobody fought an election on that programme and I believe that such an idea is utterly inconsistent with the attitudes and aspirations of the British people.

While we have behaved like Pontius Pilate, other members of the Commonwealth have spoken for themselves and for freedom in South Africa. We have witnessed the passing of a new American sanctions Bill by the House Foreign Relations Committee, which reflects growing opinion in the United States. The United Nations mandated world conference on sanctions started in Paris yesterday. It is a pity that we were not represented.

The march towards progress and democracy will go on. The Government's stance on sanctions represents a lost opportunity for Britain, to say the least. I hope that even the Government will reflect on the influence of their passive approach and that they will accept that it does not help even long-term British investment to go along with what is happening in South Africa.

Before more people lose their lives and before the real bloodbath, which can still be prevented, takes place, Conservative Members—I accept that there are many who take this view—should stand up and be counted and urge on the Government the fact that the time for sitting on the fence has long since passed. We can make a contribution to freedom and progress in South Africa. The sooner the Prime Minister and her colleagues listen to that plea, the better it will be for all concerned.

Sir Patrick Wall (Beverley): When I hear the phrase, "social justice and freedom in Africa" I begin to wonder what kind of world the person speaking lives in because I cannot think of many, if any, countries in that continent which enjoy social justice and freedom.

We are discussing apartheid, which is the denial of rights to the majority race. The issue becomes especially emotional because the minority are white. I am often worried at how little emotion is displayed when black oppresses black as in Uganda or Ethiopia.

We all know that the National party of South Africa set up apartheid by gerrymandering the constitution about 40 years ago. I believe that it is now in the process of dismantling apartheid. I admit that it is going far too slowly, but it has started. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary gave examples of that, such as influx control, property rights, which are now available, the restoration of citizenship and so on.

As politicians, we must consider what happens to politicians in other countries. The result of the reforms that I have described is a move to the extreme Right. That move is enhanced by external pressure and the traditional laager mentality of the Afrikaners.

The object of the debate is to decide how best to get rid of apartheid. The Government, pushed by the Commonwealth, advocate "effective measures . . . based on negotiation and a suspension of violence".

That is a limited objective, as are the measures. The Opposition advocate

"effective economic measures against the Government of South Africa."

If English means what it seems to, the Opposition want to overthrow the Government of South Africa and presumably replace it with an ANC Government, which will obviously veer in the Marxist direction. I believe that one man, one vote is unacceptable in South Africa as it would mean chaos and civil war, although I know that that is what some non. Members want.

What would be the result of economic sanctions? In Africa, the South Africans would return about 1 million blacks to Lesotho, Zambia and Zimbabwe, among others, which would immediately destroy their economies. For the rest of the world, some countries would gain. Those that sell gold and coal would gain by having no competition from South Africa. The USSR would gain a great deal because she would then have a monopoly of supply of chrome, manganese and various other strategic minerals. For the United Kingdom, the effects of sanctions have already been outlined. They would involve 120,000 jobs, £12 billion worth of investment, £1 million worth of exports would be at risk and—perhaps most important, as the Opposition always seem to want to increase coloured immigration to Britain—800,000 poverty-stricken whites might come to Britain. I wonder how the Opposition Front Bench would react to that.

More sanctions would mean less freedom of action for the South African Government. They would mean a continuing move to the extreme Right. They would mean the laager and civil war. I do not believe that, in the short term at least, the blacks would win that civil war.

I entirely disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) about the Commonwealth. I believe that it is important. I also believe, however, that the Eminent Persons Group has made a rather one-sided report. It has not dwelt enough on ANC violence. I think back to how the Monckton commission report started the destruction of the Central African Federation and wonder whether this will be a similar story.

I do not know whether hon. Members listened to the BBC at lunchtime, but if they did, they will have heard Colin Eglin, who is the Leader of the Opposition in the South African Parliament, coming out strongly against economic sanctions and what he calls coercive action from outside. He rightly said that the problems must be solved in South Africa.

In Britain, the far Left seems always to side with the extremists, in this case with the ANC. I agree that there must be talks with the ANC, but I wonder whether it can now control the wild young men of the townships. Perhaps that time has passed. I am all for the release of Nelson Mandela, who has now said that he will agree to end violence. According to the Eminent Persons Group, the ANC has agreed to eschew violence. I wonder, however, whether the time has gone when even the ANC can lead the black people of South Africa.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): What is the answer then?

Sir Patrick Wall: I am just coming to that. We should give much more credence to Chief Buthelezi. I believe that his scheme of amalgamating Kwa Zulu and Natal should be a good pattern for the future of South Africa. What is more, I believe that it is possible, as Natal is mainly English speaking. We should also remember that the Zulus are the most powerful tribe in South Africa, especially if it comes to a fight, as many past generations in Britain discovered.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is entirely right when she says that if pressure is to be exerted—and there may be a case for pressure, not for economic sanctions—it should be positive and have limited objectives. It took us 15 years to get off the hook of Rhodesian sanctions. We do not want the same pattern to apply to South Africa. Effective economic sanctions, which is what the Opposition want, would mean revolution. That is what some people on the Left—not necessarily in this House but in the country—would like to see. We, on the other hand, want evolution, although not necessarily through a European-style democracy, which has not worked in Africa. That is why I referred to one man, one vote. The House knows the phrase so well, but throughout Africa there has been one man, one vote only once.

The answer probably lies in President Botha's original concept of a kaleidoscope of states. Unfortunately, he seems to have moved away from that concept, presumably because he has been pushed by his Right wing. I visualise the future of southern Africa as a confederation of small states: some white-led, some coloured-led, some black-led. Some of them will perhaps be led by people of mixed race, and others may be multiracial. A kaleidoscope of small states in a confederation could overcome the difficulties that face southern Africa today. I do not believe that the whites will transfer power to the blacks without the bloodshed that has been mentioned already in this House. It is only right for us to do all that we can to try to encourage, by all possible means, a peaceful solution to this racial problem, which is probably the most difficult problem that our world has ever faced.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): On 25 and 26 June 1955, just outside Johannesburg, 2,888 delegates gathered from all parts of Africa. After that two-day congress, what is now commonly known as the "freedom charter" was adopted. It is referred to in the report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group. I wish to put on record the preamble to the charter, as many things have been said this afternoon about the African National Congress. The charter said:

"We, the people of South Africa, declare for all our country and the world to know: that South Africa belongs to all who live in it, black and white, and that no government can justly claim authority unless it is based on the will of all the people; that our people have been robbed of their birthright to land, liberty and peace by a form of government founded on injustice and inequality; that our country will never be prosperous or free until all our people live in brotherhood, enjoying equal rights and opportunities; that only a democratic state, based on the will of all the people, can secure to all their birthright without distinction of colour, race, sex or belief; And therefore, we the people of South Africa, black and white together—equals, countrymen and brothers—adopt this Freedom Charter. And we pledge ourselves to strive together, sparing neither strength nor courage until the democratic changes set out here have been won."

I recommend Conservative Members to read the full charter. It lays down in simple terms a system that operates in the United Kingdom, a system for which the House of Commons has stood for centuries, and that operates throughout the Western world. I refer those hon. Members who are highly critical of the African National Congress to that document, because the ANC sponsored the 1955 Congress. The charter was adopted after more than half a century of trying to obtain freedom through dialogue, discussion and consultation. The Government of South Africa had been asked to meet the wishes of the people and the international community had been asked for assistance in getting round the negotiating table with the Government of South Africa. The people of South Africa wanted a peaceful transition. For more than 300 years they had been confronted with racialism, and for decades since the nationalists came to power racialism had formed part of the constitution. That racialism—apartheid—is based upon more than 300 laws. South Africa is the only country that has enshrined in its constitution laws that segregate people because of the colour of their skin.

After the 1955 charter had been signed, 156 people were arrested on treason charges. Those charges were based upon their support for the charter. However, they were asking only for fundamental and basic freedoms. For four years the South African courts heard the cases of those 156 people. All of them were found not guilty.

At the same time, the African National Congress and other organisations that were fighting for peaceful change were banned and pushed underground. In 1960 there was Sharpeville, although that was no more and no less than the ANC and other organisations in South Africa asking for a dialogue and for the right to put their case, resulting in a peaceful transition to black majority rule. However, 69 blacks were shot in Sharpeville.

For how long can we expect people to suffer the indignation of apartheid? More than 300 laws upholding apartheid are enshrined in the South African constitution, and 85 per cent. of the population hold only about 15 per cent. of the land. The reverse of that is that only 15 per cent. of the population—whites—own the majority of the land. The fact is that 3·5 million people have been lifted out of their homelands and displaced by the authorities. There are over 3,000 doctors for every group of 1 million white people, whereas for the same number of black people there only about 11 doctors. The average income for white people is four times greater than that for the blacks, and spending on education is seven times higher for the whites than it is for the blacks.

After 15 years of trying to bring about peaceful change in South Africa is it any wonder that the African National Congress was left with no alternative but violence? There was no alternative because countries throughout the world did not hear the cry of South Africa. The international community did not respond to that cry, even after the publication of the freedom charter and even after the ANC's case had been placed fully before the international community.

In 1960, therefore, the ANC took its decision to turn to the gun. However, it was made clear in 1960 that this would mean acts of sabotage, not acts against the person. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said that the report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group shows clearly that only about 20 people have been killed in South Africa by the ANC. It is deplorable to hear Conservative Members referring to members of the ANC as terrorists. It is Conservative Members who are destructive.

I draw an analogy with the people in my city who fought Fascism in the second world war. I was taught at school about the resistance movement in France, Germany and Holland. I was a member of the European Parliament and sat side by side with many people who fought in the resistance movement. They were fighting Fascism, the kind of Fascism that has been clearly indicated in the report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group. That type of regime exists today in South Africa.

On that analysis and parallel, these people are not terrorists. They should be put alongside the freedom fighters who fought in France against Nazi Germany in the second world war. They are the same type of people.

It is inevitable that pressure has continued to grow on South Africa. A state of emergency has recently been applied in South Africa because of the 10th anniversary of Soweto. Let us consider what happened then. Some 15,000 schoolchildren were objecting to being taught Afrikaans. I have already said there is a ratio of 7:1 in the way that resources for education are divided between the whites and the blacks. The young blacks decided that it was better to be taught in English and that the limited resources that they got should be employed in giving them the skills and basic education that they needed than to be taught Afrikaans. They then had a demonstration in Soweto on 16 June 1976. The police opened fire on those 15,000 schoolchildren, and, in the weeks after that event, nearly 1,000 blacks were killed on the streets of South Africa because those children had decided, despite opposition from the boards of the schools and teachers, that they should be taught in English.

The Foreign Secretary told the House, and Conservative Members have repeated, that the system of apartheid is being changed and that the President is making concessions. I refer to two paragraphs in the report of the Eminent Persons Group that demolish the Foreign Secretary's arguments. Paragraphs 50 and 51 read:

> "Indeed, the State President has specifically ruled out 'the principle of one man one vote in a unitary system.' . . .
> The concept of white domination — of power-sharing without losing white control — is enshrined in the present Tricameral Constitution in which whites, coloureds, and Indians are given their own parliamentary chambers, with some power over their 'own affairs'. Not so blacks, responsibility for whose 'own affairs' is vested in the State President."

To tell the House that the Botha regime is prepared to start conceding is nothing less than misleading the House. The ANC and many other organisations asked for a boycott of the tricameral elections and received much effective support. That shows that the blacks and the coloureds were not prepared to accept the further departmentalisation written into the constitution by participating in such an election. The fundamental point about South Africa is not about messing around at the edges, or the cosmetics, but about whether there will be universal suffrage. [Interruption.] We know the rubbish talked by Members of the Conservative party. The realities will come through. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) can make all the noise that he wants——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: It was not me.

Mr. Caborn: The hon. Gentleman has been making a noise all afternoon. I have no doubt that his constituents will hear him.

The Foreign Secretary said—in this he was supported by the Prime Minister—that if we apply economic sanctions we shall lose 120,000 jobs in the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom South Africa Trade Association is saying that it will cost 250,000 jobs. The then Minister with responsibility for southern Africa, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) said that there will be about 50,000 job losses. The United Kingdom South Africa Trade Association brought out a report in 1979 and again in 1982 that would not pass O-level economics. That was shown in the way in which it did its calculations and arrived at its total of 250,000 jobs.

Two reports on this subject have come out, one from Bailey and Rivers and one from Rogers and Bolton. The former report was based on the Treasury model of the British economy and concerned a loss of export equivalents. That showed that if full economic sanctions were applied immediately—which is most unlikely—there would be a loss of about 20,000 jobs in the first year, which would taper off. The Rogers and Bolton report was slightly more sophisticated and said that in the first year, again on the scenario of immediate sanctions, there would be a loss of 13,000 to 14,000 jobs. However, that does not consider what jobs would be created if the investment of companies which previously invested in South Africa were to be invested in the United Kingdom. Nor did it take into account the point made by a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends of what will happen after the apartheid regime is removed and how relationships will change not only with the people in South Africa but with the front-line states.

How the Conservative party can support a Government such as this I do not know. Only today I had a telephone call from the Sheffield branch of Oxfam, which is an active organisation. It said that yesterday somebody working under the auspices of the Council of Churches, to which it had given money to try to develop some harmony in Crossroads, had been picked up off the street and held in detention. This man has never carried arms and was merely trying to help.

How the Conservative party can support a Government who are illegally occupying Namibia against United Nations resolution 435, have bombed three Commonwealth countries and perpetrate acts of terrorism on their neighbours, I do not know. People can read the history and judge, as the Eminent Persons Group has. By the criteria of humanity, basic democratic needs and the rights of people within a country to determine their own destiny, the only course is to support the Opposition motion.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): I was interested in the parallel that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) drew with the resistance fighters during the war. I shall return to that later. First, I should declare an interest. I have been associated over a number of years with the Anglo American Corporation of South Africa and that association has given me the opportunity to explore the country in considerable depth and to meet people of all races.

I think that we are all agreed that apartheid in uniquely abhorrent. This is not because it is uniquely oppressive. It is not as oppressive as a great many other regimes. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said that he thought that it had become as oppressive as the countries in the Soviet bloc. I understand from the newspapers that he is going to South Africa on Monday. I do not think that such a visit would be allowed to many Soviet bloc countries in a crisis, any more than a visit from Mr. Waite, the Archbishop of Canterbury's representative. Nor is it uniquely a minority Government.

I agree with the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central that South Africa is the only developed country of which I can think whose regime is based on racial discrimination enshrined not in custom or convention, but in law. That is what we find unacceptable and difficult to swallow. When we talk about dismantling apartheid, surely what we mean, in logic, is the repeal of the laws which discriminate against sections of the community—the majority of the community, as it happens—on grounds of race.

I think that we would be on common ground in saying that most of the pillars of both petty and grand apartheid have been dismantled over the past five or six years. More dismantling has taken place in the past 18 months. Two pillars remain—the Group Areas Act and the exclusion of the black population from the political process at national level.

The group areas have been substantially eroded in the big cities. The local authorities have turned a blind eye to the movement of more prosperous non-whites—Indians, coloureds and blacks—into some of the surburbs. It will not need much of a push to get the Government to accept that that process should continue, subject always to good provisions of town planning to prevent shanty towns being built up around the big cities.

As far as the inclusion of blacks into the political process is concerned, the President has proclaimed publicly what he seeks to do. He has said that there will be a national council, and that he will discuss with representative blacks how it should be brought about.

I had hoped, when the Eminent Persons Group visited South Africa, that it would have assessed the prospects of dismantling those last two pillars which, if dismantled, would mean the end of apartheid in the strict sense of a regime that discriminated, in law, against sections of the population.

Because I hoped that that would be the case—and here I must say that I had some encouragement from my right hon. Friends—I urged the President to co-operate with the eminent persons and to give them all the facilities they required. Having read the report, I regret that I did so. I cannot endorse the view of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary that we should be grateful to the eminent persons. I shall say what I think about their report in a few minutes.

The eminent persons agreed that there have been substantial reforms, but they condemned what they called the "quest for power sharing without surrendering overall white control."

That is a rather surprising statement. When the British aristocracy accepted the Reform Act 1832, it did not agree to a transfer of power. It agreed to the association of the rising middle classes with itself. That was also the case with the later reform Bills. Had we accepted the Chartist proposals, I doubt whether Britain would be a democracy today.

I think that the eminent persons stretch beyond logic when they say that dismantling apartheid means a transfer of power and a social and economic revolution. I am not saying that a transfer of power is wrong or that a social or economic revolution is wrong, but it is not what dismantling apartheid means. Dismantling apartheid means repealing the laws which entrench white supremacy by law. Once those laws are gone it becomes a state, such as many others with which we do business, where minorities dominate, as they do in the Soviet bloc and in many military dictatorships in other Third-world countries.

The eminent persons claim that they should not dictate South Africa's future. No one who has read the EPG's report can possibly doubt that it regards the African National Congress as the natural successor to the present regime. The extent of the emotional commitment to the ANC goes beyond anything I have read in any state paper. In the report Mr. Mandela is canonised and Mr. Tambo is beatified. Nothing too praiseworthy can be said about him. No one else receives such encouragement. Chief Buthelezi gets a mention. None of the other homeland chiefs are treated with any regard at all. The Ministers in the regime are regarded as, at best, machiavellian demons and, at worst, devils incarnate. It is an odd way to approach the problem. The commitment to the ANC is underlined by the negotiating conditions which the eminent persons proposed to the South African Government.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Amery: I wish to develop the point.

The eminent persons' second condition was that the South African Government should withdraw the police and the army from the townships while negotiations took place — the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) may think that is a good idea — and that the townships should become no-go areas. Some of the townships might, during the negotiations, come under ANC control. I cannot imagine any Government in their right senses accepting such a condition.

I think that the eminent persons felt that on that point they were on weak ground. Instead of the eminent persons arguing that the dismantling of apartheid involved a transfer of power, they went on to a new line of argument. They warned that there would be a blood-bath unless the transfer of power took place. They tried to make British flesh creep by suggesting that unless we helped the process of the transfer of power, our interests would be seriously damaged. Mr. Malcolm Fraser developed the idea at a press conference in the United Kingdom.

I think that the eminent persons may have exaggerated the effectiveness of the ANC. It is perfectly true that there have been casualties, but nothing like the Lebanese, Ugandan, Sri Lankan and, as far as I can make out, the Punjab casualties. I would not underrate the danger that there could be further casualties in future, but I think that the eminent persons failed to understand the basic position in South Africa.

Over the past 15 years, a generation of black middle class intelligentsia has arisen. Some are lawyers, doctors, journalists, teachers, churchmen, shopkeepers, and business men. In the homelands, some are Ministers and Government officials. Others are skilled workmen and trade union leaders. Some are radicals and sympathise with the ANC and other radical movements. Many — although they are by no means supporters of Mr. Botha's Government — have no love for the ANC and no desire to see repeated in South Africa the kind of semi-Communist experiment that has taken place in Mozambique and Angola, or even the Socialist experiment still in the making in Zimbabwe.

Both the radical and the moderate blacks know that the whites must do a deal with the blacks. The question is, which blacks? Attachment to private enterprise, tribal structures — we have seen in Matabeleland how strong the tribal influence still is — and anti-communism, inculcated by the Churches, favours co-operation between the moderate blacks and the whites. It would be foolish to brush aside the moderate blacks. Chief Buthelezi probably commands the allegiance of some 6 million Zulus. His Inkatha organisation has bashed the ANC hard in some townships. The Church of Zion, which claims 2·5 million supporters, gave President Botha a tremendous welcome at Easter last year. Bishop Mokoena, who has visited Britain, claims the support of more than 4·5 million. Add up numbers and jot them down, and one will find that more than 10 million blacks are already in the. I would not say Botha camp, but anti-ANC camp.

The real confrontation is between not black and white, but between radical and moderate blacks. That is why I am interested in the analogy drawn by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central — I am sorry that he is not present — with the resistance movement during the war. Those who have studied the movements — I lived through them — saw that, as the end of German domination became clear, they began to fight each other, even before the Germans had gone, to see who would be in charge. That is what is happening in South Africa. I would not underrate for a moment the radical forces of the ANC or the moderates. I believe that the white-moderates combination, if it comes off, is more likely to prevail than the radical revolution, and it is in our interests that it should. It is anti-Communist and pro-private enterprise. It would be, on the whole, more favourable to our way of thinking. I think that it will develop if South Africa is left to itself.

The real danger of the report of the Eminent Persons Group — tendentious, one-sided and emotional as it is — is that it will discourage the moderates and the whites from doing a deal. The moderates will feel that the outside world is going towards the ANC and will ask whether they should go with the tide. The whites will feel that they must batten down the hatches. That is why I deprecate the report and the tone of much of what has been said in the House today.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to stand absolutely firm against economic sanctions. A great deal of progress has been made in South Africa, especially in the past 18 months. More is in the pipeline and more could be obtained by quiet diplomacy. I see no justification for punitive measures. Indeed, if progress is made on the Group Areas Act and on bringing the blacks into the political process, I think that that would justify lifting existing sanctions on oil and arms.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Amery: I urge my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to avoid what are called "measures". The setting up of the Eminent Persons Group was a measure, devised at the time to gain time. It has proved to be a Frankenstein monster. To yield any further and adopt measures to push the South African Government in the direction of the report of the Eminent Persons Group would be, in effect, to accept that the transfer of power to the ANC is our aim. It should not be our aim. Even to move towards it is to place ourselves on a slippery slope, and it will not be easy to find a sure foothold on which to draw a halt.

Great national interests are at stake. Great national interests are at stake for the Americans and the Germans. I agree that strong emotions are engaged, but not just on one side. There are 2 million people of British descent, or almost, living in South Africa. On my best estimate, that means that 8 million or 10 million of their relatives are over here. To embark on an anti-South African policy — my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary came close to it — would be to divide the nation and, I may add, my right hon. and learned Friend's own party.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I do not believe that I would be doing the right hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) an injustice if I said that he has always associated himself with the South African Government's point of view. He wants some changes in South Africa, and I would not wish to deny him that, but he wants no fundamental change. I remember one of the few conversations I have had with the right hon. Gentleman outside the Chamber, 16 years ago, when he put forward a view very similar to the view he advanced today. I said to him that history would prove him wrong. We shall see whether he is right or I am.

In the past 18 months, we have seen the increased determination of the black majority in South Africa to win their freedom. They have demonstrated that they are no longer willing to tolerate in silence a system of government that totally denies them any effective say in how their country is governed, simply because of the colour of their skin. It is an indictment of Western Governments, especially Britain and the United States, that so little has been done over the years to apply effective pressure to the South African authorities to change their ways.

I must make one point clear about the Conservative party, because we should be perfectly frank in debate. My view, which I am sure is shared by my hon. Friends, is that that party has always been extremely reluctant to take any action against the apartheid regime. Of course, as we have seen today with the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary and other Conservative Members, they always tell us how much they oppose apartheid. I have not forgotten that, within days of the Tories returning to office in 1970, they reversed the Labour Government's policy and allowed arms to be sold to South Africa. It is just as well that, since 1977, there has been a United Nations Security Council arms embargo binding all member states or, I am sure, the Government would have been in favour of selling arms to South Africa. One Conservative Member has already told us today that arms should be sold to South Africa.

The Government constantly tell us that economic sanctions would be counter-productive and would only make the regime in South Africa more determined to resist change and be more self-reliant. If so, why are the South African Government so strenuously opposed to sanctions? Why are their defenders and apologists in the House and elsewhere so determined to prevent sanctions being applied?

It is interesting in this regard to read the letter of 24 April from the South African Foreign Minister to the two co-chairmen of the Eminent Persons Group. In that letter, which is in the report, the Foreign Minister expressed concern about what he called "punitive action" against South Africa. Clearly, the last thing that the South African Government want is action — sanctions or otherwise. Those who resist such measures are bound to be seen to be defending the South African regime.

Mr. Fairbairn rose

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) rose

Mr. Winnick: I apologise for not being able to give way, but time is short.

The report of the Eminent Persons Group states that South Africa consistently applies sanctions to its neighbours. That is certainly so, but obviously, as the report adds, the South African Government have no wish for the international community to follow suit against that regime.

One thing is clear: whatever the limited and mainly cosmetic changes which have occurred in South Africa — I agree with the right hon. Member for Pavilion that changes have occurred — they come about only because of pressure, both internal and external. If it had been left to the South African authorities no such changes would have occurred. Surely that explains why it is unlikely that the changes, which are so essential and which many Conservative Members and Ministers agree should be applied in South Africa, will come about unless effective measures are taken by the international community. The report of the Eminent Persons Group concludes that if the South African Government believe that they will always remain protected from economic measures, the process of change is unlikely to increase.

The report also makes it clear that if the blacks believe that such international measures will not be applied by Britain or other Western countries they will come to the view that there is only one option left, that of increasing violence. I do not like some of the violence undertaken by the blacks in South Africa recently. I would not wish to defend or act as an apologist for such action in any way. However, if people are denied their legitimate rights and aspirations, see no possibility of change and are denied political and human rights and their representative organisations are outlawed, is it surprising that violence comes about? Is that not one of the most important lessons of history through the ages?

We know how the leaders of the South African blacks have been imprisoned. Nelson Mandela has been in prison now for well over 20 years and his only real crime is that he was the representative of his people. Mandela is by no means the only one. The African National Congress, undoubtedly the main representative organisation of the blacks in South Africa, has been outlawed. Therefore, it is understandable that there is the view there that only violence will shift the South African authorities. If we want to change that view we must ensure that the Western community, in particular, is determined to take effective action against South Africa.

I can understand the right hon. Member for Pavilion being disappointed by the report of the Eminent Persons

[Mr. Winnick]

Group. I am sure that many people came to the view, when the group was appointed, that it would report in a very different way. I am pleased by the report. I think it is an honest report because the people concerned, some of whom have not been so much involved in South African matters over the years, saw for themselves what was happening and they came to their conclusion, which I endorse.

In the past few days the repression in South Africa has got worse. When one sees what is happening in South Africa one can only come to the view that it is almost a police state. We know about the ban on reporting and the actions taken by South African authorities to hide the news, not only in South Africa but from the outside world. We know of all the measures of banning and arrest and of people being questioned for days on end and then being re-arrested and continuing in detention. That is an illustration of the determination of the South African authorities not to change their ways in any effective manner. It is an illustration of the way in which the South African authorities are telling the world that they will not be willing to undertake fundamental changes.

The Labour party wants to declare its solidarity today with all those people in South Africa, black, coloured and white, who are opposed to the system of repression in their country, many of whom are in prison. We declare our solidarity because we believe that they are right and that they are victims of repression. For so long Ministers have been telling us that they are opposed to apartheid and they recognise that change is important. However, at the end of the day, a choice has to be made. It is a simple choice. Are the Government on the side of the oppressed or the oppressors? They cannot remain neutral. They cannot give the impression that they are against apartheid and, at the same time, do whatever they can to prevent international measures, such as sanctions, being applied against the regime.

What has caused much understandable concern in this country is not only that the Government are opposed to effective measures being undertaken but they are trying their best to prevent other countries undertaking such measures. They are acting in a manner which can give only comfort to the apartheid regime. That is why we are so critical of the Government and the stand they have taken. It is Britain's misfortune that at this time we have a Government who refuse to take a lead over South Africa and are doing their best to deny effective measures against the regime.

Last year, after the Commonwealth meeting, the Prime Minister boasted about how little had been done about sanctions. We all saw her on television as she mocked the limited action being undertaken. She made her position clear. Labour Members want to make their position clear in this debate. We are in favour of sanctions.

In the past the House, perhaps after a long struggle, has always come out on the right side. My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) referred to the debate over 150 years ago about slavery. It would not be too difficult to imagine some hon. Members, if they had been present, who would have been arguing for slavery.

Mr. Tony Banks: They probably still do.

Mr. Winnick: That is probably so. Some years later the House declared itself on the side of the Government of the United States against the South, which was defending slavery in that country. Nearly 50 years ago the House decided, at long last, that a stand had to be taken against a monstrous racist tyranny, which was intending to enslave all Europe. The right hon. Member for Pavilion knows much about that and he played a distinguished role in that war. I believe that the same is true today over South Africa. As I have already said, one can no longer be neutral. One is either on the side of oppression or the oppressed. The Labour party is on the side of the majority of people in South Africa who want their freedom and who are sick and tired of being denied their basic human rights and are determined to win their freedom. We are on their side and we are proud to be so.

Mr. Speaker: I remind the House that at the beginning of the debate I said that because of pressure I would operate the 10-minute limit on speeches between 7 o'clock and 8.50 pm. We are now in that period.

7.8 pm

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): Three weeks ago my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and myself paid a visit to South Africa and Zimbabwe at the behest of Christian friends. We went not as a parliamentary delegation but as brothers in Christ. We would like our speeches to be seen together and in breach of a convention in the House, we will refer to each other as hon. Friends. I hope that Hansard will take note and will understand why we would prefer to refer to each other in that way.

Each of us will describe a different part of the visit but we believe that together they form a rather different pattern and a different sort of trip from trips that the House has heard about for some time. Convinced as we are that our political activity is only one way in which the Lord wishes us to follow His will for the world, we went to see our friends in South Africa and learnt of their problems at first hand. It may embarrass others, but not us, to admit that mankind alone will not solve the world's problems. We proclaim that the love of Jesus Christ was never more necessary than it is in South Africa today.

I address my first remarks to those we met and left behind. There is a large group of people in South Africa whom many have ignored. They are those of all races who are working patiently for simple fellowship and reconciliation in pure human terms by meeting each other and sharing their lives and experiences. It was largely with those people that we spent our time, and through their friends across the political spectrum that we had contact with their politics.

Some of those with whom we stayed were white opponents of apartheid and had been so for decades, but all were people who realised that the abolition of the legislative structure of apartheid is almost secondary to the struggle to change hearts and minds. They should not be ignored, for if any group epitomises hope in South Africa, it is that group.

When Michael Cassidy began the National Initiative for Reconciliation last September, he lit the fuse for people to come together and then spread such a message throughout the country. But with so many political imperatives facing us, why should this one be so important? The fear and suspicion that apartheid represents and that so polarises communities in South Africa is built on the ignorance of one race for another. I do not say that from my own observations; eight days in South Africa would not give me the right. I simply repeat the comments that I heard there.

The reason for that ignorance is simple but chilling. The tragedy of South Africa is not that apartheid has failed but that it has succeeded all too well. It has prevented the ordinary human contact between people which allows one to know another, to learn his point of view, to evolve beliefs and to resolve fear of the unknown. Such separation is at the root of the South African tragedy. So to those whom we left behind we must say, "God bless you and your work in Cape Town, Mitchells Plain, Crossroads, Soweto, Alexandra, Johannesburg, Durban and Ulundi. We saw it, we shared it, and we shall not forget your fellowship and kindness nor your excitement and hope for a new South Africa amidst all your worry."

The task is how best to help South Africans to build a future for their country. I believe that it is self-evident that their political system is inadequate to meet the aspirations of those people. We should address ourselves to encouraging the process of reform which will allow all in South Africa to have a voice. The main political question is no longer apartheid but power. The question is not "whether change"? but "when". It is not good enough for the House to promote steps that will lead to change for the sake of change. We must look beyond, and not destroy the inheritance of South Africans even before it is claimed.

Quick change, based on violence and not constitutional reform, would be a dangerous road to follow, but only as dangerous as not responding to the urgent demands for reform now.

The experience of going to South Africa has changed my understanding of the situation, which is hardly surprising. All three parliamentarians revised their views whilst there, and I express my support for my two hon. Friends the Members for Southwark and Bermondsey and for Burnley, who may be saying slightly surprising things to their parties.

Why should Conservative Members consider a change in policy? The first reason for considering a change is the urgency of the matter. I say that not just because the security situation is dire but because the polarisation of views within the black community and the white community, and therefore between them both, is increasing frighteningly quickly: hence the breakdown between generations in the townships, the anarchy and the frightening necklaces. That undermines the work of reconciliation. It is vital that such polarisation is arrested quickly, for it contains the seed of an African Lebanon. It calls for prompt action internally and begs the question of action externally.

The second reason for considering a change in policy is that I must honestly report to my colleagues that, although our view on sanctions is understood intellectually by both blacks and whites in all sections of South African society, sometimes wholeheartedly and sometimes with reservations, there is genuine scepticism among black South Africans about whether we are doing all we can. Despite assurances of our position, that we oppose apartheid, seek the release of political prisoners, and support the unbanning of political groups, there is a feeling that that is not enough.

I report that feeling objectively, but I stress to colleagues the respect in which Britain is held, the need for Britain to be a leading part of the international community and the Commonwealth, and the crucial point that such a view of our position must not be lost. I firmly believe that the Government's position until now has been right. I suggest only that, in response to the EPG and other opinion, we should take note of the pace of change and of developments in South Africa.

Between full economic sanctions, which I do not support, and the measures that we have already taken, which I do, there is a fair gap. Moving into that gap, in concert with others – for it must be so – in a limited way should now be an option for the Government to consider. But there is another side. I return firmly convinced that the people of South Africa need more support, not less, more encouragement and persuasion and less isolation. Any effective reform process must be fuelled from inside and not outside South Africa. That is where the pressure now comes from.

The political imperatives for positive support must be obvious. Give those who are attempting reform nothing – and they include members of the white Government – give them no credit or support whatever, and what does one put in their hands with which to defeat the white Right wing? Even more obviously, we must put something in the hands of moderate black African leaders. They must have some fruits for their patience and non-violence – otherwise, why should their people follow them? I believe that the key to such positive action lies in identifying the priorities in South Africa for the development of black aspirations both outside and inside the political arena. The political agenda is already well developed, and I hope that I do not need to elaborate my support for a quick end to apartheid and for constitutional reform. But there is an urgent need for equality of health care, for improved housing and, above all, for education.

Those are areas in which the international community can assist further, and in which this Government are already working. By identifying non-governmental agencies through which to act, some of the basic problems of poverty and ignorance, which fuel political instability throughout the world, could be tackled. That must be coupled with, and be in step with, internal political reform. I believe that that represents the best hope for the development of a sound future for all races in South Africa. I commend it to those who seek only the negative road of sanctions, for this is a positive way of showing support for the black community, and I believe that it would do us much credit.

I shall develop just one of those points, that relating to education. The scale of the problem of education for black South Africans is immense. South Africa has huge rural areas, and townships where some blacks claim that there has not been effective black education for 10 years. Over generations the failure of black education has removed a generation of moderate, effective black African leaders who could, even now, join those who already exist to resist the radicals. Of course, educational reform is long-term. However, there is no time to lose. We might think seriously of supporting the calls to give black education back to the churches. That is how things were in the past, and it may ensure goodwill and success for the future.

I turn finally to those who believe that the bulk of the trouble is caused by Communist agents among the black South African people. Let me tell them that, if a western democracy is to be created in South Africa, if capitalism is to survive there, and if we are to remain friends with the South Africa of the future, some of the things in which we believe will have to work. One cannot lecture the black migrant worker who earns nothing and lives in a hostel in Alexandra about capitalism and tell him that it is good for him. One cannot lecture the disfranchised and tell them that Communist state control will take from them the wealth and power that they have never had. One cannot lecture those with no aspirations, or hope of advancement for themselves and their families in the present system, that something else will be worse, and genuinely expect to remain credible.

If we are to secure a commitment to ideals that we hold dear in democratic, social and economic terms, all South Africans must have the benefit of them now, and we must make sure that they system works. That is the best and only way — not repression — of reassuring those who propose alternative political and economic systems. We should have the courage to support reform in South Africa, to join those working for reconciliation and fellowship there, and to show that we are on the side of those who say no to oppression, no to fear, no to injustice, and no to revenge. They include all good black, white, coloured and Indian people working with the spirit of God in South Africa — truly the South Africans of the future. We have seen them; give them a chance.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): I intend to be brief, as there is nothing new to say about this subject. All hon. Members seem to agree — that is, if they mean what they say — that apartheid is an evil and inhumane system that should go. There seems to be general agreement about the remarks of the EPG that the South African situation threatens the worst bloodshed to be seen since the second world war. Consequently, I wish merely to ask what hon. Members would do if they were black South Africans faced by that situation. What would they do in a situation where the normal democratic rights and processes do not exist? They do not have a vote or access to any of the normal democratic institutions to deal with the assault on their fundamental human dignity, nor do they have the right of peaceful protest. They are banned when they try it; they are shot and gassed.

In such circumstances is it not remarkable that there has not been a great deal more violence? Martin Luther King said of South African blacks 20 years ago that they had withstood abuse and persecution with a dignity and calmness of spirit seldom paralleled in human history. How much more is that tribute due to the South African blacks today? The right hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) listed many areas in which there had been massive violence and admitted that there had been a great deal less in South Africa. The question that Conservative Members have to ask themselves is, what would they do as blacks with no access to any peaceful method of redressing injustices?

What are the blacks doing? Those who see that violence brings its own evils are asking us for something moderate. They are asking Britain to do less than it did when its territorial rights were threatened in a small dispute in the South Atlantic affecting only 1,800 people. Then the British Government asked for international sanctions, which they backed up with great physical force. The blacks in South Africa are not asking for that. They are asking simply for international sanctions to help them create circumstances in which dialogue can begin between black and white about the creation of a non-racial democracy in South Africa. That is all they are asking.

In Tokyo some weeks ago the leaders of the most powerful industrial nations met, rightly, to discuss the threat of international terrorism and to take action to deal with it. I say "rightly" because it is a serious problem, but it is in no way as serious as the problem which, in the eyes of eminent world statesmen appointed by the leaders of the Commonwealth, threatens violence and bloodshed on the scale of the second world war. Mr. Shultz, the American Secretary of State, walked out of that Tokyo meeting and said, "Gaddafi, pal, you have had it; you are isolated." What is wrong with the same leaders meeting again to discuss the serious situation in South Africa and with Mr. Shultz, or anyone else, saying, "Botha, pal, you have had it; you are isolated."? What is wrong with taking the necessary steps to ensure that he is isolated?

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Like the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) I recognise the horrors of the apartheid regime in South Africa. There has been virtually no disagreement in the House all day on that. The question is, how can we in this country help to change that regime? I want to make a vital distinction between general economic sanctions, which I do not favour, and particular measures about which I shall say more in a moment.

President Kaunda was quoted as calling for sanctions to shorten the agony of the front-line states. That remark reminded me of a statement by Lord Wilson of Rievaulx, then Prime Minister of this country, at the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference in Lagos in 1966, when he said that it was likely that the rebellion in Rhodesia would be over in weeks rather than months. Yet it lasted for another 15 years. I do not think that the duration of the Rhodesian UDI gives much guidance about how long the problem may last in South Africa before apartheid is removed. If anything, the chances are that it is likely to last longer than the problem in Rhodesia. That is what makes me nervous about any suggestion of all-out economic sanctions.

The ratio of the population in South Africa makes it more difficult for the blacks to achieve success. The ratio of black to white in South Africa is 5:1 against 22:1 in Rhodesia. The economy in South Africa is stronger and it is in the hands of the whites. There would be more incentive for outsiders to evade sanctions because the pickings of evasion would be richer and buccaneers from all over the world would be plunging in to take those pickings.

It would be easier than in Rhodesia for people to evade the sanctions because South Africa has thousands of miles of coastline. Rhodesia did not have a coastline, although it had an opening to South Africa. To the north of South Africa there are front-line states that could not be expected to impose full economic sanctions because they are so totally dependent on commerce with South Africa. For example, 94 per cent. of Zimbabwe's trade goes through South Africa.

Another factor that leads in the same direction is the history and nature of the Afrikaner. Very little has been said about that. The white population of Rhodesia was largely of British stock. We can be stubborn at times, but I do not think our stubbornness is a patch on the stubbornness of the Afrikaner. Those who call for full economic sanctions fail to take that into account.

The Afrikaners have been in South Africa since 1652. They believed from the beginning that they had a covenant with God to rule that country. That required them to be top race, and the black man, by God's ordinance, was inferior.

Mr. Fairbairn: He was not there.

Sir Peter Blaker: The Hottentots and others were there. The British arrived in South Africa only in 1805 – many decades after the Afrikaners. The Afrikaners have only one passport. Unlike many people of British stock in South Africa, they do not have the option of going to another country.

The right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) said that influencing the economy was the key to solving the problem. I think that she is wrong. Influencing attitudes is the key to solving the problem. If we think that influencing the economy is the key, we are deluding ourselves dangerously. Influencing the economy may indirectly influence people's attitudes, but it is the attiudes that we have to consider, and the stubbornness of the Afrikaner should not be underestimated. The road through general economic sanctions would probably be long, hard and bloody. Indeed, general economic sanctions might arrest the processes of change in South Africa, such as they are at present.

I do not rule out more measures. Some are mentioned in the report of the Eminent Persons Group. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary spelt out some of the criteria that we should apply in considering measures. I agree with the criteria that he stated. We have to choose them carefully and make sure that they stiffen white resistance as little as possible. We have to make sure that they will do the minimum harm to the blacks. They must be applied internationally. It is no good if just a small group of countries applies measures.

My next point echoes the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) who made an excellent and constructive speech. Incidentally, I have not found much constructive content in the speeches of Opposition Members. We must try to remove the fear of the Afrikaners and the whites in general so far as we can. We should be looking for non-confrontational ways to encourage the South African Government to release Nelson Mandela. From what I have heard of Nelson Mandela, that would be a positive and helpful move to achieve a dialogue. Those who have met Mr. Mandela speak highly of his moderation and good sense. His involvement in a dialogue would be a key to progress.

If there is to be a dialogue, there must be an agenda for dialogue. That is missing at present. It would be a mistake to imagine that we could impose an agenda. An obvious impression of interference from outside will not work. The agenda must be South African generated and there must be a South African solution. Many of those who call for drastic sanctions overlook the fact that the solution can only come from inside South Africa.

We should be assisting those who believe in peaceful change. I agree with earlier comments that we should support Chief Gatsha Buthelezi. The experiment in Kwazulu-Natal and the indaba there is enormously interesting. Under that experiment, 30 organisations are sitting down to thrash out how to achieve a common administration and a common assembly. As I understand it, the principle of a common administration has already been conceded by the Pretoria Government.

I was very interested in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North about help for African education. That idea is worth following up.

Those who call for all-out economic sanctions may find that such a call makes them feel better – my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Thomas) made that point very well – but they will achieve very little else that is positive. Their policies might result in more bloodshed than is likely at present, and they certainly would not work for decades.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): It is 11 years since I visited South Africa and Kwazulu and witnessed some of the things described by Conservative Members, but which Opposition Members have described more accurately. I visited the Legislative Assembly in 1975, and black after black went to the microphone and declared that they were not afraid to die for their freedom. It is now 1986 and little has changed. If the blacks were saying that 11 years ago, what can they be saying now?

Kwazulu was supposed to become one of the eight viable, independent states within South Africa, where the black man could enjoy separate development. An article in the Rand Daily Mail stated:

> "In practice, they will amount to little more than a chain of labour reservoirs to which white South Africa will send requisition orders for workers. There cannot be many who believe in the theory any more."

The Zulus do not believe it and to suggest that they do is a totally inaccurate portrayal of their feelings.

Having reluctantly agreed to implement the Government's policy of separate development, the Zulus are beginning to realise that the homelands policy is based on diverting the attention of the blacks away from clamouring for justice and equality in a common society.

Speaker after speaker in 1975 argued that agreement must be reached soon on a fair share for all in the considerable economic wealth of South Africa; anomalies in land, development, education and opportunity, and the long list of inequalities and discrimination had to be ended. That was said 11 years ago.

Many Conservative Members have quoted from Chief Buthelezi's speeches. I interviewed Chief Buthelezi 11 years ago while I was working as a journalist. He said:

> "We have been prepared to endure abuse in the hope that the Government's policy may be a road to real fulfilment for blacks. If this road is leading only to a cul-de-sac, then our only alternative is to seek fulfilment not in unreal separate freedoms, but in one South Africa and the only seat of power which is Parliament."

It is obviously a false premise to suggest that Chief Buthelezi has adduced the argument that some Conservative Members have put forward.

The speeches made in that assembly 11 years ago were very interesting. The guest of honour was the Minister for Bantu Administration and Education. Among his several platitudes was a remark which, taken in the context of South Africa's annual expenditure, completely gives the lie to Nationalist claims that their policy for the blacks is one not of separation, but of equality. He said:

[Mrs. Ann Clwyd]

"I think that we are all agreed that a properly educated and trained people is the most essential prerequisite for a developing country and can perhaps be regarded as the cornerstone of the infrastructure to be provided."

A simple look at the Government's figures shows that they count defence and the maintenance of white privilege as their top priorities. In education, as some of my hon. Friends have said, the gap between the amount spent on whites and that on blacks has widened year by year. Six times as much is spent on white education as on black education.

How long must the blacks wait? Does the House recall the "Give us six months" speech of Mr. Vorster in 1975? That certainly raised expectations, but little has happened.

I address my next question to people who have not been to the homelands. How would they feel if they were black, living in the homelands and had to watch their children die from measles because they could not afford the vaccine to treat the measles? How would they feel if they were in hospital and the surgeon had to send the instruments 30 miles down the road to be sterilised? That is the reality of life in the homelands of South Africa. If anyone needs to confirm that evidence, they can speak to the Dutch doctors who are trying to provide medical services in some of the poor hospitals in the homelands.

To see children dying from measles and other dseases, which could be treated, simply because they are black, lays the lie to any arguments that equality is being sought in South Africa, which is one of the richest countries in the world. By choosing the publication day of the Eminent Persons Group report to declare a state of emergency and to gag the media, the South African Government have destroyed their last vestige of credibility — if they ever had any.

People have argued that there have been reforms. For the blacks, probably the most important reform since apartheid was first introduced has been the abolition of that document of repression—the pass—without which a black could not work in an urban area. Failure to produce that meant immediate arrest. Even its abolition has not give blacks a feeling of freedom, according to the Eminent Persons Group. The report stated:

"The abolition of the 'pass' . . . has evoked at best scepticism, at worst indifference."

The idea that black people are to have a new form of mobility and will be able to move into urban areas is clearly nonsense when the housing shortage is acute in all urban areas. The system will continue under which men and women are separated and prostitution is encouraged by the South African Government. Men are herded into hostels; the women are left to scratch a living in the non-viable homelands and to raise their children in great poverty. That is the reality of life in South Africa today.

Surely, sanctions are the least and the most at the moment that the outside world can do to put pressure on South Africa. The Government's reluctance to make any credible suggestions today shows how deeply involved they are financially in propping up that abhorrent way of life in South Africa. The City of London and some Conservative Members have more than a passing interest in retaining the status quo. Otherwise, why not have a boycott on South African gold, which is so essential to its economy? That could be changed overnight—as soon as a policy that will do justice to the majority in that country is put into action.

Sanctions, even at this late stage in the history of South Africa, would represent an attempt to alter the course of history. Now is the time to stand up and be counted. The Government's feeble response to the tragedy that is now unfolding before our eyes in South Africa is an indictment of their refusal to face reality. I ask them tonight to change their mind on this issue, before they are indicted for more murders in South Africa.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): The hard truth about South Africa is that the South African Government are determined to keep control of the country in the hands of the white community, come what may. We British, on our colonisation of Africa, never seriously pretended that we would be there permanently, because our ethos of government is and was democratic. We who worked in the African colonies know that we were working ourselves out of a job. We trained Africans to take over from us, and we taught them our values and our standards of government, many of which remain, despite outward appearances. We always believed in government by consent. That is why the empire developed into a Commonwealth.

However, the South Africans of the National party, the majority of the Afrikaners, reckon that they are there to stay, as an alien minority. They have nowhere else to go. They intend to buttress their position. In order to do so, they evolved a theory of racial superiority, which gave them a spurious moral justification to disregard democracy. That theory, when applied at ground level, person to person, is inevitably cruel and offensive. The South African regime, in its determination to retain power at all costs, is as vile and wicked as anything that we can see in the contemporary world, despite the outward trappings of civilised society.

I see no difficulty in supporting the Government's amendment. Indeed, I see no difficulty in supporting the Opposition's motion; I would not vote against it. It is wrong for people to suggest that there is a split in the Conservative party or in the House as a whole. We are talking about the practical difficulties of securing fundamental change in South Africa, not about the principles of the matter.

It is clear that the Government wish to see an end to apartheid and a fundamental change in the political control of South Africa. The question is what sort of change and how to achieve it. We must not allow ourselves to be regarded as being on the side of South Africa simply because we do not know what to do to change that control. We have to do something, both as a moral duty in dissociating ourselves from what is going on there, and because, like it or not, inaction will surely bring greater disasters both for South Africa and for supposed friends such as ourselves.

We do not want to bring about changes by destroying the South African economy, nor do we want to take measures ourselves that will not be effective and supported by all the countries that matter. But action—real action —of some sort there has to be. Our need to defend South Africa's right to pursue its own domestic policies without outside interference, taking into account our investments there and its strategic position, has been like a millstone around our neck. If we do not cast it aside and insist on significant and fundamental changes, it will be our interests in Africa that will perish.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), and particularly the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt). I share his Christian faith, but, alas, I lack his strength to carry it out with the same commitment. I see the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) smiling again at the expression of someone's Christian faith, in the same way as he did when his hon. Friend was speaking. I do not know why he should be embarrassed by Christ. Many people in the world are not.

More so than any other hon. Member who spoke, the hon. Member for Bury, North reached the essence of the argument. Stripping away the economic, political and social arguments that can be put up, at the end of the day the debate is essentially about morals, as the hon. Member for Orpington said. Those two hon. Members should bear in mind the attitude of many of their hon. Friends. As has been said by my hon. Friends, the Tory party is a friend of apartheid. It is strange that Conservative Members preface all their remarks by saying, "We do not like apartheid. We deplore apartheid, but . . . We do not like it, but . . . "

The Tories think that the National party rule in South Africa is very good, and that President Botha should be given the benefit of the doubt. They welcomed him to Britain in 1984. They now welcome his reforms, calling them positive measures and denying that they are irrelevant. But only two out of the 317 apartheid laws have been removed, and Botha has made it clear that he is opposed to any removal of white minority rule.

The opposition of Tory Members of Parliament and the Tory party to apartheid is half-hearted for a particular reason. At least 34 Conservative Members have declared directorships and interests in companies with assets in South Africa. At least six Tory Members of Parliament have been on South African Government-sponsored visits since 1983. Indeed, with the hon. Members for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Luton, North, we wonder whether they represent South Africa in this country as their paid lackeys.

The Liberals make fine remarks about apartheid, but they still have their sister party in South Africa — the white-led Progressive Federal party, which supports the notorious federal solution. The Social Democratic party talks of a confederal solution in southern Africa, but its economics adviser, the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), is a paid adviser of Barclays Bank, a key bank in South Africa.

The arguments against apartheid have been made on many of the levels that I mentioned at the beginning of my speech, but I should like to look at the role of Wales and the relationship of Welshmen to South Africa. I am not pleased to say it, but some of that relationship has been grossly shameful. It does not apply to all Welsh people. It is long ago that Dai Francis, the general secretary of the National Union of Mineworkers, with Glyn Simon, Archibishop of Wales, held a vigil on the night when Nelson Mandela was sent to prison. He has since been incacerated for an obscene number of years. Many good Welsh people have struggled continually over the years in the fight for the anti-apartheid movement. But not all of them. To personal and national shame, many people have sought to forge cultural and sporting links with South Africa, giving succour and credence to the anti-Christian regime there.

On Friday 11 February 1983 The Guardian published an article entitled "How South African money is made to talk in Britain." I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Brigton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) has now left the Chamber because I wanted to ask him to explain his role as a council member of the Foreign Affairs Research Institute, which is a Right-wing publishing house and lobbying group with which the hon. Members for Luton, North and for Macclesfield and the noble Lord Chalfont are associated. The institute is funded by South African secret service money. The South African secret service also funds the Freedom of Sport Association, of which the noble Lord Chalfont is president.

Mr. John Carlisle: Rubbish.

Mr. Rogers: The hon. Gentleman knows that what I have said is so. He knows the truth.

When Lord Chalfont was challenged as he got off the plane at London airport on his return from South Africa, he said, with a convenient lapse of memory, when he was asked who had paid for his ticket, "I have forgotten," or, "I do not know." One cannot imagine someone making a visit to South Africa and then not knowing who had paid for his ticket.

The record of people, as outlined in many publications during recent years, is shameful in their connection with the filthy money that is given out by the South African secret service.

Mr. John Carlisle: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice on whether it is in order for an hon. Member to cast aspersions on Members of this House and another place with an accusation that we are in receipt of money from a South African source?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Hon. Members should not cast doubt on the integrity and probity of Members of either House. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) did not go quite that far, but I hope that he will bear in mind that, when the 10-minute rule applies, it is difficult for an hon. Member to seek redress by intervening.

Mr. Rogers: It is indeed. That is why I went out of my way to mention the Foreign Affairs Research Institute and the Freedom of Sport Association and stated that those organisations receive their funding from the Bureau for State Security — BOSS — the South African Government and from the South African Rugby Board, which incidentally, got a quid pro quo grant from the South African Government equivalent to the amount of money that they gave to the Freedom of Sport Association.

Those are the links between Britain and South Africa that are funded by that money. We know why those people are associated with those links. I wish that they would be honest about it. If they wish to advocate their views for whatever political reason, it is up to them; but it is not for them then to come to the House and say that they are against apartheid and that they do not support the regime in South Africa when they have bent all their efforts for many years to be apologists for South Africa in the same shameful way that the House many years ago had apologists for Hitler and the Fascist regimes that were developing in Europe.

[Mr. Rogers]

Opposition members have no problem. We have laid down our markers. We are against apartheid and we wish to do something about it. That is the essential difference between the two sides of the House.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): It is extraordinary that the House should be subjected to such a corrosive flow of cynicism on the subject of South Africa. It is extraordinary that the view of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) should be that no hon. Member — this is the conclusion that I am compelled to draw — can ever adopt any view based on genuine personal conviction; there must always be some rather nasty association. The hon. Gentleman can wave papers at me but that does not dispute my point.

It is important to note that the distinction that the hon. Gentleman and many like him fail to make about many Conservative Members is that we do not support apartheid. We do not support the South African Government, but we have a genuine interest in South Africa and all its people and we wish to see them improve their position, flourish and survive. That is an entirely genuine and legitimate aspiration for any hon. Member. Having that aspiration does not associate an hon. Member with any part of apartheid. That point must be made repeatedly.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. David Owen), the leader of the SDP said that there was not enough moral indignation. I am sorry that he is not in his seat. It seems to me, listening to the debate this evening, that so great has been the flow of moral indignation on the subject, year after year, decade after decade, that it could be described as the longest running political show in town.

Does it matter whether we show moral indignation at this time? We are trying to do something effective; the word "effective" appears in both the motion and the amendments on the Order Paper. We should direct our attention to the word "effective". In that context I remind the hon. House of the warning given long ago by the great German poet Goethe who said:

"Beware those in whom the urge to condemn is overpowering."

We see a lot of hon. Members tonight in whom the urge to condemn is overpowering. I should like to see the urge to help, to analyse, to assist and to find solutions coming forth from the House rather than the urge to condemn.

The wheel has turned full circle since we debated Rhodesia and sanctions on that country nearly 20 years ago. I shall not attempt to make any ritual condemnation of apartheid to make my purpose clear. My purpose is to define the objective and to examine, if time permits, the Eminent Persons Group report.

It is not difficult to define what is needed in South Africa. We all want a stable, prosperous, self-confident society in South Africa, which enjoys self and international respect. No one would dispute that. What are the conditions of recovery? First, they are partly a constitutional process, which as several right hon. and hon. Members said, only the South Africans themselves can devise, so complex is their position. Let us never forget that. It is without doubt the most complex political system on the face of the earth today.

Secondly, we want to see equality of opportunity and treatment. How do we get there? We want to see an acceptable and defensible structure of power. How do we get there? We want to see an acceptable amalgam — again that is something which is unique to South Africa — of racial relationships and attitudes, which will be not offensive but acceptable. How do we get there?

The problem is not so much to interpret the problems, each of which in itself is profoundly difficult, as to find the route to solving them. How do we get from the position in South Africa today to what will exist in perhaps three, five or ten years' time? I would be the first to concede that there is not much time left.

The best definition that I have ever heard of racial prejudice is "false fears leading to real sorrows."

South Africa has got beyond that. It has reached the point where those fears and sorrows have been fulfilled and extended. Real sorrows now lead to real fears and real fears to intransigence and intransigence to the entrenchment of prejudice, violence and destruction. That is the vicious circle that we must break. The political processes are increasingly frozen into immobility. The road back is difficult. The road back from any cauldron of hatred and suspicion — whether it be Beirut, Sri Lanka, the Punjab, Soweto, Uganda or even Ulster — is not known or signposted for political tourists, even those who go to those countries for visits of two or three weeks. There are no route maps. There is plenty of advice but few listen. We are deafened. They are deafened by the violence. The only criteria which the communities out there obey are the criteria of day-to-day survival.

Will sanctions break the cycle? No, they will compound the difficulties. They will entrench the attitudes. They will justify the "I told you so's". They will postpone the solutions. The choice has never been better put than it was put in the House nearly 200 years ago by Burke. It is a choice between "change by insensible degree" and "the unfixing of old interests at once."

Burke outlined the difficulties for us. Of the former, he said that it "has all the benefits which may be in change without any of the inconvenience of mutation".

Of the latter, he said that it

"is a thing which is apt to breed a sullen discontent. A gradual course . . . will prevent men under long oppression from being intoxicated with a large new draught of new power, which they always abuse with a licentious insolence".

Burke was as correct then as he would be today.

Anything that aggravates the political or economic discontent in South Africa or anywhere else will stimulate insolence and enlarge license. But my main objection is much more fundamental. Sanctions are an indiscriminate method of attacking a particular objective. They are totally indiscriminate and undiscriminating in their consequences. They could be described, although I would not seek to press the anology too far, as a form of political terrorism.

What are we attacking? We are attacking a detestable political perversion, not unlike the psychopathic behaviour of an individual. But for the individual we identify the symptoms, we give treatment that is specific, we isolate if all else fails and we do not starve and assault the patient.

Do sanctions differentiate between those who detest and those who support apartheid? Do they differentiate between those just born and those about to die? Do they differentiate between those who have the power of decision and those who have no power of decision? Do they differentiate between those – there are such in South Africa – who love freedom and those who have nothing but contempt for it? Do they differentiate between the poor and the rich? Do they differentiate between those who understand our motives in this House and those who have nothing but contempt for them? Do they differentiate between those who value western opinion and those who hold it in contempt? Do they differentiate between those whose fathers and grandfathers died in Flanders and at Alamein and those who sympathise with Hitler? Do they differentiate between those who nurture and nourish racism and those who are ashamed and disturbed by any lapse of human dignity and courtesy, whether it occurs in South Africa or anywhere else? Do they differentiate between those who have devoted their lives to bettering the conditions of Africans everywhere in southern Africa and those who, for whatever reason, have done nothing? Do they differentiate between those who have £1 million in their bank accounts and those who have very little in their bank accounts? Finally, do they differentiate between those who wish to negotiate change and those who are intransigent about change?

The answer, as the House well knows, to everyone of those questions is no. Sanctions do not differentiate. They are a blunt and ineffective weapon. I entirely support Her Majesty's Government in refusing to support sanctions.

8.3 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Until three weeks ago my justification for speaking in the debate would have been my theoretical and political opposition to apartheid. But, as the House has already heard, three weeks ago my hon. Friends the Members for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) and for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and I went to southern Africa. All of us would now say, as the Foreign Secretary implied about his visit to South Africa, that that experience has probably changed our lives more profoundly than any other experience to date.

To be in Crossroads a matter of a day or two after 20,000 to 30,000 people were made homeless from that squatter camp, where their homes had been only corrugated iron shacks; to be in Soweto talking to somebody who had survived necklacing, but only just, a matter of a few days before; and, on the other hand to be in Alexandra township in a church with people who are still prepared to keep faith and believe that it is possible for justice to be done; and to be with Christian politicians who are prepared to meet across political parties and colour boundaries to work for reconciliation, has left us all profoundly changed. We all share the words that the Eminent Persons Group used to begin the first chapter of its report:

"None of us was prepared for the full reality of apartheid."

That visit was a privilege. It was a privilege to be invited by Christians in southern Africa as Christians from Britain. We came back more than ever convinced that the future of South Africa is the most important moral, spiritual, political and international issue today.

The United Kingdom has a uniquely important responsibility. As a former colonial power, as head of the Commonwealth in practical terms over the years, as a key European Community nation, as one of the seven economic Western powers and as the country with nearly 45 per cent. of direct and indirect investment in South Africa, we have probably the key international responsibility. What is more, in South Africa we are perceived as having probably the key international responsibility. I say in all honesty, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North said, that, whatever the words used by the Government and whatever their honesty, the other perception is that we are not committed to bringing about a change in time.

The goal is obvious. The House has enunciated it often. It is to dismantle apartheid. It is to achieve a just society. It is to bring about a prosperous non-racial South Africa. What are the realities? The realities are that there is a third world country for the black peoples of southern Africa and a first world country for the whites; that the inequalities are enormous; that the economic situation is declining with rising unemployment, a worsening financial situation and companies increasingly pulling out; and that the Government regime is on the defensive.

The Government have wanted reform but they have not yet committed themselves to the dismantling of apartheid. Reform, as the Eminent Persons Group has clearly said, is all that the Government are willing to support so far. Many are people who have prejudice and fears. Some have accepted the need for fundamental change. Many have moved out of their laager, which has been taken by the extreme Right. Many know that they cannot go back, but do not yet have the courage to go forward. They probably have all sorts of inhibitions about doing so.

There has been superficial desegregation. Some legislation has been repealed, but, as hon. Members have said, the two pillars of apartheid – the lack of political equality and the Group Areas and Registrations Act which underpin apartheid – are still there. Increasingly, in the white, Indian and coloured communities people are desperate for the Government to move in South Africa. But in the black communities there is a far more severe problem. Increasingly large numbers — thousands, probably millions, particularly of the younger peoples in townships — of black youngsters are losing patience and many are taking the law into their own hands because they have concluded that white capitalist Christianity has not shown them any solution.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): How does the hon. Gentleman know that?

Mr. Hughes: I know that because they have told us and because we have seen that. It is because it is not in anybody's interests that that should continue that my right hon. Friends the Members for Bury, North and for Burnley and I, as three politicians from different parties, have a duty to say that to the House today. The black archdeacon whom we met in Johannesburg said:

"You Europeans came here and preached your faith and European culture on the basis of Christian equality and then you rejected us as equals."

What can people feel like after that? That leads to violence.

South Africa will never be able to accommodate all people. There will always be extremists who will not be willing to accept any solution, but we must push them to the margins to reduce their numbers and we must not overplay the Right-wing backlash. Only 15,000 people turned up at a rally at which 60,000 were expected on republic day at the Voortrekker monument at the end of May. But many more people are willing to become extreme in the townships, and that is something that the international community cannot allow to continue.

[Mr. Hughes]

What action can we take that would be in the interests of all the people of South Africa? Action is taking place internally and political pressure is mounting to end apartheid and to see the beginning of economic, social and political justice. We should judge other action by its effect on South Africa and on Africa and only then on the United Kingdom and the West. Events in South Africa are leading towards bloodshed and death and are reducing the prosperity of Africa as a whole. Events are alienating the United Kingdom from a future black South Africa and from the greater continent, and are leading to alienation of the West, which will prevent us from playing any key role in the future of that black continent.

How may we judge which action is effective? The test, as people have begun to enunciate, is what brings about a change of attitudes in South Africa. We may have differences of view, and so do people in South Africa. Increasingly, however, more people, black and white, are saying that economic sanctions are now the only course to follow. That is the only peaceful way of filling the vacuum between diplomatic sanctions, which are too meagre, and the military option, which is too severe. The South African Government know the effectiveness of sanctions as they periodically use them against their neighbours. Sanctions have proved effective on them.

It may not be in our short-term interests, but it will be in our mid and long-term interests to use sanctions, and we must base our decision on that and not on the interests of tomorrow or next week. The issues are not simple, but pressure has to include economic pressure on South Africa. If the House did not believe that before, it should believe it now after the Eminent Persons Group has made that very clear.

My party's policy on this issue has been clear for many years. In 1959 the Liberal party called for a national boycott of South African goods in Britain. In the same year, we condemned the Conservative Government for voting against a motion condemning apartheid at the General Assembly of the United Nations. In 1969 we called on the Labour Government to stop the South African cricket tour that was to take place in 1970. In 1974 we attacked the Labour Government for carrying out naval exercises with the South African navy, and in 1977 we called upon the Labour Government to implement effective economic sanctions against South Africa. People in South Africa have heard about those policies and they complimented me on the position which the Liberal party has been taking for many years.

As an example of bringing about reconciliation we ought to look at Zimbabwe. It has a non-racial society. It does not have a Westminster-style democracy but people are beginning successfully to live together. [HON. MEMBERS: "Zimbabwe is a tyranny."] No, it is not a tyranny. Black and white people believe that Zimbabwe can have a prosperous future, and I share that belief.

My party says that now is the time to tighten the screws on South Africa. The matter is urgent because we do not have much time. As a British newspaper recently commented, Britain has reached a watershed in its policies on South Africa. I know that, traditionally, the advice to the Foreign Secretary by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has been that sanctions are not very effective, but increasingly the advice he is now getting is that they must be used and that we must take the initiative in those international organisations of which we are members.

We must not be seduced by arguments about constructive engagement. Lord Barber, of the Standard Chartered Bank Ltd., a former Conservative Chancellor, says that we must now take effective economic measures. Lord Barber is the Foreign Secretary's former Cabinet colleague and friend. The Foreign Secretary should listen to him and give our Government credibility. Our constituents require that we now begin to move. The timetable is urgent and a window of opportunity is still open. We must take that opportunity on behalf of all the citizens of South Africa. In large part, their hopes rest with this House.

8.15 pm

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): I should like to start with a comment on some of the Opposition speeches. When they reflect on this debate tomorrow some of them will, or should, regret many of the things that they have said and especially the tone in which they were said.

Let me declare a personal interest because I was born in South Africa. My father's family emigrated there in the 1840s to farm sheep in the Karoo and many of them are still farming there in that strange arid landscape. I was educated in South Africa and came to Britain for the first time at the age of 18. I go back to South Africa frequently and I have a deep concern for the future of that beautiful, complex, and tragic land. It is against that background that I support further sanctions, not as an expression of moral outrage—because it is far too late in the day for that in Anglo-South African relations — but as an instrument of diplomacy: if I may use the expression, I support them in the spirit of continuing constructive engagement.

This diplomacy should be aimed in two directions: first at the internal situation in South Africa, and, second, at the shaping of international policy towards South Africa.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) analysed correctly the growing divisions among South African whites, between the verkrampt and the verligt within the Government, within the South African military — an important factor — and notably, as the right hon. Gentleman stressed, within the National party. There is a growing convergence between many nationalists and a majority of the English speakers, and I believe that this is a more important political change than the growth of the Afrikaner Right wing because it opens up the possibility of a return to the formula by which South Africa was governed between 1910 and 1948—as long a period as that since 1948. There is also growing pressure from South African business. Criticisms have come from that quarter in the past, but now they are becoming more anguished and more effective—and more and more it includes Afrikaner business.

British diplomacy and the diplomacy of the West as a whole should be directed to play on those divisions and to promote dialogue, negotiation and accommodation. I was hopeful that this could be done without sanctions and when I returned from South Africa in February I was optimistic about the noises we were picking up about the Eminent Persons Group. But as I should have probably foreseen, the verkrampt tendency has prevailed in the recent attacks on South Africa's neighbours and in the declaration of the state of emergency. The hard-liners have prevailed for the time being, but not necessarily for all time; and so we are inevitably in a new phase — the phase of sanctions.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, pavilion (Mr. Amery) made an excellent speech. He concluded that further pressures would be unnecessary and potentially counter-productive. That of course is a matter for judgment and, for what it is worth, I do not agree with my right hon. Friend. International pressures have already played a big part in bringing about those important measures of progress that have occurred in South Africa.

Moreover, I say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Pavilion that we need also to think in terms of influencing the trend of international policy towards South Africa. There is a worldwide drift towards sanctions against South Africa and this drift is now irresistible, whether in the EEC, or in the Commonwealth—where I think we now have an implicit commitment flowing from the Nassau accord — or in the United States where the pressure is coming from within the Congress, if not from the Administration.

Outside South Africa no country's interests are more deeply affected by this drift than Britain's, and it is crucial that we should be able to influence and, to the extent that we can, direct this irresistible international trend towards sanctions. But we can do this only by joining in that trend.

So we should commit ourselves to further measures against South Africa in order to be better able to promote constructive developments inside South Africa and a constructive international policy towards that country. That raises the rather basic question of what developments we should regard as constructive and especially that of the sort of sanctions that we want to encourage. I submit four criteria. The first is that we should avoid unnecessary hardship. I note an element of inconsistency in the speech of the right hon. Member for Devonport, who urged a ban on new investment because it would be less harmful than other forms of economic pressure, but then went on to talk about a ban on fruit and vegetable imports. As I pointed out in an intervention, that would be very damaging immediately to a lot of very poor people. Secondly, the sanctions we adopt should be such that everybody will operate them—and that must mean that they must be limited. Third, they should also be capable of being effectively monitored.

My fourth criterion is more controversial: our sanctions should be specifically targeted. Here I take up a hint from the speech of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) who spoke about a rolling programme of sanctions. Implicitly, he was saying that we should convey the threat that if nothing is done sanctions will be further increased. I would add the further thought that we should offer the prospect of some relief from those sanctions, if progress were made. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that this important point is another implication of his concept of a rolling programme of sanctions.

Finally, what sort of steps within South Africa should we regard as progress? Here I strike a note of dissent from my right hon. Friend the Member for Pavilion in that I believe we must get the South African Government to recognise that it is no longer merely a question of the reform of economic and social apartheid, where admittedly there has been some real progress. Now we must get the South African Government to recognise that the issue is not what they do for the blacks, but what they do with the blacks. It is a question not of economic and social apartheid being abolished, but of political apartheid being abolished.

On the political front, I agree with the right hon. Member for Devonport that we should not seek to dictate the future shape of the South African constitution. In particular, we should not prejudge the difficult, indeed the central, question of the balance between the ethnic principle and the principle of a common South African citizenship. Both elements are likely to be present in any settlement. Certainly a common South African citizenship is fundamental for us; but I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Pavilion that ethnicity also reflects a fundamental reality in South Africa which probably cannot be disregarded.

Those are, however, matters for the people of South Africa to work out for themselves. The basic objective of our policy should be, not so much to press a particular outcome but to promote a process—a dialogue which involves all parties, all personalities and all interests. Let that dialogue and those negotiations take place and then we may have to have a genuine debate in this House about the acceptability of its outcome. Meanwhile, the reality is that we are not much divided, so let us unite behind a policy which is designed to get that dialogue going.

8.21 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this important debate as I, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) and my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), have recently returned from South Africa. My speech is slightly different from what it would have been if I had not visited South Africa. I have been a member of Anti-Apartheid for 26 years and the only reason why I visited South Africa was because we were invited as three Christian Members of Parliament, and were sponsored by Christians in this country and in South Africa. The arrangements for us were made by Anthony Cordle, who is following this debate closely, and who co-ordinated our Christian contacts in this country and in South Africa.

We had a busy time in South Africa at 39 meetings. We met well over 90 people in formal settings and many people in informal settings. Obviously, our visit to Crossroads, Soweto and Alexandra in Johannesburg had a drastic impact on us. While one may be aware of the position in South Africa from newspaper and television reports, one cannot judge it until one sees it at first hand.

The basis of our visit enabled us to meet people and speak frankly and openly with them, something that would not otherwise have been possible. We met people across the political spectrum of South Africa—from the extreme white Right-wing Members of the Herstigte Nasionale party and Conservative party to the younger Left-wing black extremists in Soweto. It was interesting to meet them and to discuss matters with them.

It is important that the House recognises the importance of the Church in South Africa. Seventy-eight per cent. of the population profess and practise a Christian faith, as is evidenced by church attendances and the way in which people lead their lives. It became clear that whatever legislative decisions are taken by the South African Parliament—they are important and essential—apartheid will not be ended by a parliamentary decision. Only a change in people's hearts and minds will finally resolve the policy of apartheid.

At times when we spoke to members of the HNP and Conservative party I was tempted to wonder why we were wasting our time speaking to people with extreme views who not only believe that no further concessions should be made, but that far too many concessions have already been made. I am in no doubt that we were right to speak to them because it put the issues and difficulties into perspective.

Whether we like it or not, we must accept that, under the tricameral system, the white Parliament has supremacy over the other two Chambers and can take the final decision. The white Parliament and State President Botha have the power. I have grave doubts about whether President Botha genuinely wants to make changes. One of our hosts, who knows the President well, said that 20 years ago President Botha would have been the person least likely to want to make changes. He now believes that President Botha genuinely wishes to make changes but is trapped by the Right-wing extremists in his party. He believes that President Botha needs support and encouragement to make the type of changes that he wishes to make. I do not know whether that is correct.

I listened to the television coverage of Pik Botha's comments at the Pietersburg meeting at the weekend. He is said to be a potential leader of the National party and a more liberal member of that party. I do not know how to judge him from those comments and I wonder how much pressure he was under to make that type of speech.

The clear message from all sections of the community was the urgency of resolving the matter, as there was not much time to resolve it without major bloodshed. We all wish to avoid that. If we fail to negotiate a settlement peacefully the white extremist Afrikaner Weerstandsbeweging will grow in strength and there will be a further white backlash.

If the South African Government do not recognise the African National Congress and release Nelson Mandela, in a few years' time they may not have to deal with the ANC and certainly not with the ANC as it is at present. More people want to take more extreme measures to achieve their desired solution. Can one blame them when for 40 years they have tried to negotiate an end to apartheid around a table? How would we feel if we were blacks in that position? Without the power to vote and elect representatives, they have few options.

There is a narrow borderline between the French Resistance movement in France during the second world war, who are celebrated as heroes, and the ANC, whose violence is condemned without question. I am totally opposed to violence and hope that we can achieve a settlement in a negotiated and sensible way. One must remember that that country has been occupied by colonial powers for many years. I do not dispute that the colonial powers developed the country but the country is occupied —[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Hon. Members may say no, but the people have a right to speak.

I believe there is time to negotiate a settlement to achieve a solution but that opportunity must be seized before it is too late; otherwise the non-violent option will cease to exist. I believe that the majority of ordinary white people in South Africa share that view and the blacks and coloureds also believe that there should be a negotiated settlement rather than a bloody settlement.

Within the next few months there will be a key conference of the National party followed by a special session of the South African Parliament. Those opportunities should be positively seized if the right solution is to be achieved. It is absolutely essential that we should end the Act which requires people to be classified and registered by their race. That Act is fundamental to the apartheid system and once it is ended it will remove a fundamental plank of apartheid. It is also essential to abolish the Group Areas Act.

There must be positive change. Many people have argued that some of the changes that have already taken place are not positive and genuine. Although, in theory, a black can now marry a white the question arises where that couple may live because they are restricted as to the areas in which they can reside.

It is no good saying that apartheid has ended on the trains and that there are two mixed carriages on trains when there are still three white carriages at the front. The positive changes are essential because time is fast running out for South Africa. The Dutch Reform Church has its synod within the next few months and it must take a decision to end apartheid within its Church.

If the opportunities are seized a peaceful solution is possible. I hope that that is the case because that is what this House wants, as do the blacks, whites, coloureds and Indians in South Africa.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Time does not allow me to comment on the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) or to refute fully the allegations made by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers). The disgraceful attack made by the hon. Member for Rhondda upon Lord Chalfont and myself will be remembered by the House. He devalued his own argument, if indeed it had any value. His speech was a disgrace to his party, to himself and certainly to the good name of the House.

Apart from that speech and the belligerent attitude of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey)—his speech was characteristic, if not, as per usual, ignorant —the debate has been sensible with rational argument from both sides. It is clear that there is an absolute determination on the Labour Benches that revenge should be sought on P. W. Botha and his Government on the basis of sanctions and any measures which can be imposed upon South Africa.

It is appalling that those in South Africa who are now desperately seeking some form of reform are to be visited with the sins of their fathers. There are people in South Africa of all colours and races who genuinely want to see peaceful change. On the whole, this debate has been a useful contribution towards that change. If Opposition Members continue to wear their consciences on their sleeves and to try to parade various untruths, the argument is lost.

In the short time available to me, I wish to explode one or two myths which have been advanced both inside and outside the House. The first and obvious myth—it was put forward by Opposition Members — is that the African National Congress represents all black opinion in South Africa. That is blatantly untrue and the figures prove it. It is not representative of all the blacks, although it is representative of a section, be it a minority. It is apt at catching media coverage, and one cannot deny that.

The ANC is the perpetrator of many of the murders which have been committed in South Africa in the past few months. It is the perpetrator of the intimidation which has occurred. That was obvious yesterday in Soweto when it kept people from work. It is the perpetrator of the horrific necklace murders supported by Winnie Mandela. It is the perpetrator of the bombings in black and white areas, and the perpetrator of the campaign to undermine the South African Government and those who are moving towards some form of change.

I am pleased to see that my hon. Friend the Minister is here, but I must disagree with her assertion in the House the other day that she was worried that the ANC would fall into Communist hands. The ANC has always been in Communist hands.

Mr. Caborn: Where is the evidence?

Mr. Carlisle: The South African Communist party has always had members in the ANC, and I believe that their influence has grown. The greatest threat that faces South Africa is the onslaught of Communism and the fact that it has given some respectability to the ANC. The Government have no business to be talking with the ANC unless it totally refutes the violence which it has perpetrated.

The South African Government are right to assert that, if Nelson Mandela is to be released—I hope that that will happen in the short run—it must be on the basis that he and the ANC renounce all violence and the policy of violence.

The other common myth is that, because the Eminent Persons Group report has failed, there will be bloodshed. The report said that. I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) that the tragedy of the situation is that many of us held out great hope of the report. We believe that there was a genuine dialogue between the members of the Eminent Persons Group and members of the South African Government. The fact that that dialogue has broken down and that the group has produced a one-sided report must be regretted. Many of us on this side of the House, knowing the nature of the Commonwealth secretariat in London and its continued opposition to anything to do with South Africa, will not be surprised that that type of report has been produced.

One must criticise the report because of its lack of evidence. I do not deny that many people were seen, but unfortunately many people were missed out. There is virtually no account or condemnation of the black versus black violence which has now taken over from the violence which previously occurred. I totally condemn the violence which has been perpetrated by some people in South Africa.

There is scant regard in the report for the position of Chief Buthelezi and the 7 million Zulus whom he represents. The report states that there are virtually no reforms in South Africa, but that is nonsense. Many substantial reforms have taken place. Although the reforms may appear to be inadequate to us, we must acknowledge that the situation in South Africa has changed and we should encourage the South African Government to make further changes.

The report has gone wrong and appears to be a failure when one considers its various recommendations. The first recommendation is that the South African Government should terminate the state of emergency. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) that if that were to be done and the security forces were withdrawn there would be terrible bloodshed within the townships. That would not only make them no-go areas: they would be under the total control of the violent section of the ANC. The report declares:

"the system of apartheid will be dismantled and specific and meaningful action taken in fulfilment of that intent."

The South Africans are on the road and still have some way to go. The report also recommends establishing

"political freedom and specifically lift the existing ban on the African National Congress and other political parties."

The South African Government would be quite willing to lift that ban if only the ANC would abandon its violent policies.

Perhaps the greatest myth which has been espoused by Opposition Members and, to some extent, by some of my right hon. and hon. Friends is that sanctions would help. The report almost argues that, if there were sanctions, the violence would cease immediately. That is nonsense. Everybody admits that sanctions would mean more unemployment. I am rather amused by Opposition Members, who blamed the recent inner-city riots in Britain on unemployment and bad conditions, who now advocate measures against the South Africans which would have exactly the same effect. How can they believe that there will be change against a background of violence and unemployment?

Sanctions would stifle the aspirations of the black middle class, much of which has been encouraged by British companies. The tragedy is that the Opposition's criticism of British companies is quite unfounded. Some of our great companies such as BP and Barclays bank have done an enormous amount of good in South Africa. They have lifted black employees into much better conditions than they would otherwise have enjoyed.

I intend to support the Government on the basis that the effective measures of which the amendment speaks can be positive rather than negative. The Government should be encouraging British companies to invest more in South Africa to help the blacks in their employment and social problems and to raise their wages.

I must tell my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary that, if they take one step towards the escalation of sanctions, they will alienate a large section of the Conservative party inside and outside the House. We are very encouraged so far by the unique stance that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has taken. She is held in respect throughout the world and many look to her for a solution of the problem. There should be no more punitive measures. Rather there should be encouragement, dialogue and participation.

8.42 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North): It is always a distasteful task to speak after the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) when he is acting out his role in the House as an apologist for apartheid and racism. I should like to remind him of something that he wrote in a pamphlet entitled, "South Africa and the West:"

"The myth that the Republic is a police state and the non-whites an oppressed race should have been buried long ago."

So should the views of the hon. Member. They are not fit to be heard in the House.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

The Government's attitude to South Africa and apartheid is one of breathtaking hypocrisy. The Eminent Persons Group, of which we have heard so much today, was originally a device designed by the Prime Minister to try to delay taking any action. She expected it to come back saying, "Do nothing," or, "Do very little." She certainly did not expect it to come back saying that economic sanctions should be imposed. We had evidence to suggest that from the hon. Member for Luton, North, who clearly expected the group to come back with just such a judgment.

Lord Barber is alleged to have said that he would not have become a member of the Eminent Persons Group if he had known at the outset that it would recommend sanctions. In my opinion, it is clear that he was colluding with the Prime Minister in thinking that the group would be a means of delaying definitive action.

We have heard today from the Government the ritual denunciation of apartheid, but they revealed themselves to be steadfastly opposed to any effective measures to end it. The Government are apartheid's greatest friend outside South Africa. They are as much a mainstay of apartheid as the whips and guns of Botha's police. Whatever twisted justification the Prime Minister can now devise to prevent effective sanctions, the world knows the truth — when it comes to South Africa, the present British Government are unprincipled, hypocritical and racist. They will take no effective action against South Africa because of the profits that British companies are making out of apartheid. That applies especially in regard to the profits being made by their Tory friends in the City. Why can the Government not be honest and admit that? They would not get any credit from the Opposition for saying so, but at least we would be able to understand their honesty.

This is a moral issue, not a narrow economic one, although there is an economic perspective. Britain's long-term economic interest also demands effective sanctions now. If South Africa eventually goes up in flames, all British investments now in South Africa will be lost. It will be pointless for a future British Government to go to the new majority black Government and ask, "Please can we have compensation for all the British interests that we lost in the civil war which followed our failure to do anything to prevent it?" We will not be able to do that—we will just be laughed at.

I should like to pick up three arguments which I have heard Conservative Members advance — I have sat through the whole debate. It is argued that what happens in South Africa is not our business and that anyway, we do not impose sanctions on the Soviet Union. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) dealt with that argument at the beginning when he said that we must be involved if South Africa is involved with attacks on Commonwealth states.

Mr. Fairbairn: So is Russia.

Mr. Banks: So is Russia, but Britain owns half of all foreign investment in South Africa. I was not aware of our owning a large slice of foreign investment in the Soviet Union. That makes a difference. Britain's direct investments in South Africa are worth about £3 billion. I heard the Foreign Secretary say that South Africa is part of the free world. That also should make what happens there our responsibility. I do not accept, however, that South Africa is part of the free world. The hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) should try to tell that to the 24 million blacks who are denied the right to vote or organise. Living in the free world is a pretty sick joke for them.

We also hear that sanctions will seriously damage the interests of blacks in South Africa and the front-line states. That concern comes ill from Conservative Members. They have never before shown any interest in the blacks in South Africa. Where have they suddenly discovered it now? I prefer to listen to the genuine representatives of black South Africans such as the ANC and representatives of front-line states such as Kaunda and Nyerere. I should also like to know what damages the interests of blacks most, sanctions or apartheid. It is not surprising that, although they know that they will suffer from sanctions, many blacks and their representatives are prepared to say that they want sanctions now because the evils of apartheid are so much worse.

The third argument is that South Africa has made some progress in dismantling apartheid and that, if we impose sanctions, we will imperil that progress. Whatever miserable concessions have been made have been made only because of domestic unrest and external pressure. The people who tell us now not to impose sanctions are the very people who resisted earlier pressure, even the Gleneagles agreement on sporting sanctions.

The truth is that Botha and his Government understand only force. They are terrified of that force and look to the Tory Government to protect them from it. In his speech, the Foreign Secretary made no positive suggestions. He referred only to the need to negotiate. I believe that he deceives himself, and that he deceives himself willingly. President Botha will not negotiate apartheid out of existence. He has said as much, and the Eminent Persons Group verifies it. He will concede only when he is faced by force.

The Government's amendment to the Opposition motion calls for an end to violence on all sides. Apartheid is institutionalised violence. The black majority is denied a part in the political process of South Africa, it is denied the right to form its own organisations, and it is not allowed to vote. We know that Botha will not negotiate, so what is the black majority to do? Is it to sit and wait for the Conservative Government to introduce a few mild sanctions that will not work and that are designed not to work? What options does the black majority have, other than armed resistance?

The fuse in South Africa has almost burned down. Total economic and political sanctions might—but only just—bring about fundamental change. I feel that South Africa is now firmly set on a course for civil war. The cause of the coming bloodbath relates entirely to the brutal system of apartheid. That system has been supported for years by the British and American Governments. We have surrendered any moral influence that once we might have been able to exercise. We are now effectively isolated from the rest of the world. We are in the laager, with the racists of South Africa, and it will remain an eternal stain on the reputation of our country.

8.51 pm

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I shall not attempt to follow either the tone or the manner of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). In the few minutes that are available to me, I want to make what I hope will be a civilised contribution to a very complicated problem.

In case any hon. Member does not understand the frightfulness of apartheid, let me remind him that it was thought up by the British in order to try to give to the Dutch whites a share in the wealth of South Africa. It is equivalent to me, as a Scottish Member of Parliament, coming to London and being forced to live on the Broadwater Farm estate. That is an absurd and offensive concept, but it is illustrative of the idiocy and frightfulness of apartheid.

When I was in South Africa in October, I said to the South African Government that apartheid cannot be dismantled letter by letter. One cannot take off the "a" and make it "partheid". One cannot take off the "p" and make it "artheid". Apartheid must go, and it must go at once. That is a fundamental concept, whose difficulties I comprehend. Nevertheless, its removal is an essential condition for progress in South Africa. Apartheid must go. It must not go with reluctance. It must be given away — destroyed — with celebration. I tried to leave that message with the South African Government, and I believe that that message should go forth from this House.

However, compared with the last time that I was in South Africa, which was about 18 months previously, I found that there had been a fundamental and huge change. Everybody I met — Indians, blacks, Chief Buthelezi's family, with the exception of a few freaks among the whites and a few freaks among the members of the African National Congress — agreed that we must strike at apartheid and its legislation and work for a constitutional form of government, which will not be and which cannot be the Westminster form of government but which must accommodate what we are all trying to preserve: the prosperity that could be the prosperity of any other African country that had had the benefit of European genius for 300 years. Mozambique could have it and Angola could have it; so could Zambia and Malawi. We must try to preserve South African prosperity for the African so that he can share in it. That prosperity must not be destroyed because of a fictional desire to create what are called democratic rights. That is only the right to share in poverty.

The danger in South Africa is that the whites look to the states to the north for their lesson. They say, "Look at what has happened in Zimbabwe, Zambia, Malawi and Mozambique." They are entitled to look with fear at what has happened in those countries. But the blacks do not say to themselves, "Ah, yes, we have better education and better hospitals in Soweto than they have in Malawi or Zambia." They look to the white areas of South Africa and make different comparisons.

Let us remember that there is apartheid in Russia against the Jews, that there is apartheid in the middle east against the Palestinians and that there is apartheid in Zambia against those who are not party members, as there is in Poland and in a dozen other countries. When we say that we are against apartheid and that we are for human equality, let us remember that although apartheid is a word that emanated, thanks to the British, in South Africa, it is not a word that applies only to South Africa and that the concept of apartheid is practised in many other countries.

What do we want to achieve in South Africa? Do we want South Africa to have a Government similar to that in Zimbabwe? There is active, tribal persecution in Matabeleland. Do we want to let loose the terrible conflicts of religion and race that South Africa prospectively is undergoing? I watched the funerals of some of those who were the victims of necklace killings. I saw the fear. Is that what we want to let loose?

Let us not imagine that this is a simple problem. South Africa is not a colonial territory. The blacks, as they are condescendingly called in South Africa, did not live there before the Europeans came. When the Europeans arrived, the Hottentots were there. The Europeans removed the Hottentots. South Africa has a problem that is even bigger than apartheid. It is migration. Blacks are consistently migrating from Mozambique, Malawi, Zambia, Zimbabwe and Angola in order to participate in the wealth that is created by the Europeans.

There is no point in us saying, "Should they not equally share in it?" if we are not willing to think of an intelligent change that will enable the wealth-creating system to continue? There is no point in ruling over a society in which only those who happen to be in power have any wealth, as in Zambia. Let us not be so aesthetic as to say, "Forget these Zambians, Malawians and Mozambicans and sacrifice them all for sanctions." What I noticed most in my recent visit was the vast change by those who are Afrikaans-speaking and previously immoderate to a path of moderation and acceptability. We must not alienate them.

We could do one thing. Knowing that the Afrikaners have "tendencies of contrasuggestibility", and that they have many weapons that they could use not only against us but against the world and their neighbours, we could adopt the policy of what I call "positive sanctions". We could offer a Marshall plan for Southern Africa, to the constellation of states around South Africa, from which it will be excluded until the weight of moderate opinion has been able to use its force in South Africa. The weight of moderate opinion in South Africa is now overwhelming, but if it is driven away from that moderation, to which it has only so recently come, we shall have created the reverse of our intention.

Therefore, I hope that the industrial countries will create what southern Africa could be — a place where dignity, prosperity, the inheritance of the European tradition, the Christian Church, the African characteristic and the Indian contribution shall thrive and survive with all the area's great benefits and natural resources. However, South Africa will be cut out of that for ever if it does not, now and forever, strike out the obscenity of apartheid.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Talking to an hon. Friend a few weeks ago at 9 o'clock, I forecast that the Shops Bill would sail through and that we would not be so stupid as to allow the Americans to use our bases to bomb Libya. Any hon. Members who doubts my forecasts on South Africa is in an understandable position.

Although the media give the impression that apartheid is about to disappear and that the Government of President Botha is about to be struck off the map, I would say, to the contrary, that they have great strength. Small boys throwing rocks against Casspir armoured cars will not bring down the Government. The army has hardly been used to any effect. When the Botha Government do collapse, there is every chance that they will be replaced not by a nice moderate black Government but by a nasty immoderate white Fascist Government, who will use the police and the well-equipped army with far greater vigour than President Botha has. We should brace ourselves not for a clear-cut reform in that great country but for seeing another Lebanon in the south of Africa, and the country disintegrating into a conflict of black against black and white against white, with much further bitterness and bloodshed.

In 1977 I spoke in favour of sanctions against Idi Amin's regime in Uganda. That tyrant might have come straight from the pages of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire", as he was responsible for the deaths of 100,000 people. In his prisons, a prisoner was told to smash the skull of the man in front of him and then the same thing happened to him. Rightly, the Labour Government of the day did not back sanctions against Idi Amin's Uganda, on the grounds that if one knocks down a regime one does not know who or what will replace that regime. Secondly, there must be some respect for the principle of sovereignty, which is a strong principle in the United Nations.

On 25 May 1979, I had an Adjournment debate on trade with South Africa. It was noticeable that the Minister replying had been given a draft speech, I suspect prepared for a Labour Minister, as he was ad libbing and changing as he went along. The comments that I made in that debate are still valid. If one is backing full-blooded economic sanctions, one must consider military means to enforce those sanctions. If South Africa runs short of a crucial ingredient, perhaps oil, it will be prepared to use its navy to run the gauntlet. Who will supply that gauntlet? Will it be the Soviet Union, the United States or the Royal Navy?

I remember the words of Lord Salisbury when he was Prime Minister, about not hanging around the carcases of dead policies. Times have changed. We must move on and face reality. I beg the Government to notice the new mood in this country, and the Commonwealth, and to notice the events that have taken place in South Africa since I was there a year ago.

I am convinced that our friends in the Commonwealth do not expect us to throw away our principles. They do not suggest that we should destroy our economy. They are saying to us—I believe that they are entitled to do so—"Your country has a unique historic responsibility for South Africa. Your country is in a position to give a lead. We trust that you will do so."

I thought that the setting up of the Eminent Persons Group was a most remarkable event. I cannot think of a similar mission, representing as it did some 49 Commonwealth countries which in turn represent over a billion people.

We are told by the South African Government that the three raids into the three Commonwealth countries were coincidental. If one considers the military effectiveness of those raids, how can one believe that? Surely we must draw the conclusion that those three raids were launched for the purpose of destroying the Eminent Persons Group.

I believe that the Government are right in seeking to move from their previous position and policies on full-blooded economic sanctions. They are right to look for ways of bringing pressure on the South African Government. I would be the first to admit that the state President has made important moves, but I doubt whether he has been fully supported by all Members of his Cabinet, let alone the white community in South Africa.

It is appropriate for us to re-examine our policy. I conclude by saying—I hope that the Foreign Secretary, who has just entered the Chamber, will consider my remarks—that Britain's role is not to frustrate, thwart and deny the mood in the international community. Rather, it is to participate and co-operate and to make a strong British contribution inside an international framework for action.

9.8 pm

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): This historic and remarkable debate is timely because it takes place at the time of the 10th anniversary of Soweto when hundreds of Africans were shot. The debate has matched the seriousness of the occasion. The matter is of considerable importance for us in the West. That importance was underlined at the beginning of this month by United State's Secretary of State George Shultz, who said:

"South Africa imposes an intolerable moral, strategic, economic and political burden on Western interests."

How much greater a burden does it impose on the black Africans in the front line who have been humiliated and repressed, especially over recent days, in the new detentions, the new gagging of newspapers, and so on? That repression was graphically described in the first 39 paragraphs of the report of the Emminent Persons Group. I witnessed that humiliation and repression when I stayed in Soweto and saw the institutionalised evil that is aparthied.

How should we in the West, especially in Britain, react to such a minority Government who claim to base their system on the same values as ours? In particular, how should we in Britain respond to the call by the Eminent Persons Group for concerted action, which may offer, in its view, the last opportunity to avert what could be the worst bloodbath since the second world war? How can we influence attitudes and bring effective pressure to bear on South Africa? I was immensely impressed, as, I am sure, were all hon. Members, by the spiritual dimension which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and the hon. Members for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) following their visits to South Africa.

On some matters, of course, the Government and the Opposition agree. We agree that South Africa is in crisis, that the pace of change has increased, and that there is not likely to be the lull which occurred after Sharpeville in 1960 and after Soweto in 1976. A new dynamic is now endemic and is developing in South Africa which the most reasonable men may not be able to stop. At one stage, it appeared that the Eminent Persons Group had provided a "god out of a machine" — some form of external mediation which might have prevented the ultimate tragedy. There may still be some hope, as the Foreign Secretary said, but it was probably blasted by the raids on 19 May on the front-line states. As the Foreign Secretary will surely acknowledge, those raids must have been planned by the South African authorities some time in advance. They must have been made in the sure knowledge that they would torpedo those talks at a sensitive stage. The intention must have been to do precisely that. That was the clear message.

We acknowledge that the current period is one of intense anxiety for all in South Africa, whatever their colour, and that there have been substantial changes in the Afrikaner Volk. Some of that overweening self-confidence has gone. Hon. Members may point out the increasing moderation that they see, but I point out the new extreme ultra-grouping, the AWB, to which President Botha clearly reacted in his raids on the front-line states.

When we read Security Council resolution 560 of March last year and the Nassau communiqué, both agreed by the Government, we acknowledge that the Government go at least part of the way with our analysis of the situation. The Government and the Opposition recognise that there is a substantial British stake in South Africa — in financial, commercial and human terms — but we draw different conclusions. The Government argue that that immense stake should make us more cautious in our response to the South African tragedy. On the contrary, we conclude that the stake that we in Britain undoubtedly have imposes an even greater responsibility on us because of our unique position. We have that position by being members of all the relevant alliances. We are members of the EEC and assume the Presidency on 1 July. We are members of the Commonwealth, we have close links with the United States and Japan in the Group of Seven, and we are a permanent member of the Security Council. We are uniquely well placed to play a positive role, if we are prepared to play such a role.

The Opposition begin to differ from the Government in the assessment of the capacity of the South African Government to adapt and as to whether they have the capacity to take the giant steps necessary to reach an accommodation with their own majority. The Government are tempted to trumpet every change, however cosmetic, as something of seismic proportions. However, 26 years after the Sharpeville massacre, and 10 years after the Soweto uprising, the black majority in South Africa is still totally excluded from the national political process. The British Government still appear to cling to the view that President Botha is not intransigent and that the system is capable of being reformed without outside pressure, as if the business interests and those building bridges within South Africa can persuade President Botha to negotiate with his majority and take those necessary giant steps. The Government still cling to the doctrine of constructive engagement.

We are interested not in the reform of apartheid but in its abolition. Constructive engagement should be not just with the white minority but with the black majority. As an indication to the Government on the bona fides of the Botha Government, we point out that nine years after Security Council resolution 435 on Namibia, in spite of all the promises made by the South African Government, Namibia still seems as far from independence as it was in 1978. We point to the mala fides of the Nkomati accord, the clear breaches by South Africa and the attacks on and continued destabilisation of the front-line states — conservatively estimated to have cost the front-line states £10 billion since the formation of the South African Development Co-ordination Conference in 1980.

The Eminent Persons Group concluded that the South African Government are not yet prepared to negotiate fundamental change. The report is a damning indictment. Do the Government concur with that indictment and, if so, what are they prepared to do about it?

The Government's faulty analysis of South African willingness to change has led to mistakes and to their own isolation over the past two years. We should examine some of the milestones in Government policy over that period. Two years ago, in June 1984, the Prime Minister welcomed President Botha to Chequers on the eve of the establishment of the tricameral legislature, that apartheid cul de sac into which South Africa then moved. In September last year at Luxembourg the Government entered "a reservation" at a time when the EEC was agreeing a weak package of measures. The right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) had the humiliation of rushing back to this country saying that he could not agree even to the withdrawal of military attachés from South Africa because, he claimed, they gave us some forewarning of possible South African manoeuvres against the front-line states. We did not withdraw our military attachés until the end of the year. We still have South African military attachés in London.

At Nassau, in October last, we agreed on a strict and rigorously controlled embargo on the import of arms, ammunition, military and paramilitary equipment from South Africa and on an embargo on all military co-operation with South Africa, yet last Saturday's edition of The Guardian contained clear evidence that our own Department of Trade and Industry allows a large South African defence electronics corporation to license a company in the United Kingdom as a front for its own military products. I refer to Grinaker Electronics. Does the Minister seriously suggest that that decision by the Department of Trade and Industry is in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Government agreement at Nassau or with the EEC?

We were, of course, isolated at Nassau. The Prime Minister insulted the Commonwealth thereafter by talking about the "teeny weeny" measures that she had agreed. Subsequently, we prevented the colony of Bermuda from imposing its own sanctions.

We agreed at Nassau to impose a ban on the import of krugerrands. That was in October 1985. But we did not then impose that ban on krugerrands. Tardily and reluctantly, we were dragged into that, but we did not impose the ban until May 1986, after pressure, and after the attack on the front line states on 19 May.

At the Tokyo summit, the world leaders vetoed a move by the Prime Minister to voice concern for the safety of South Africa whites. The majority of blacks identify with the ANC, yet the Government are still not prepared to meet it at ministerial level. Thus, the meeting with President Botha, the Commonwealth Nassau summit, the Tokyo summit and relations with the EEC all represent negative signals. The Government are sending those signals out to the world and thus clearly showing their attitude towards change in South Africa.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Anderson: Throughout those two years, the Government have consistently given the wrong signals, and identified with the white minority Government. It is hardly surprising that the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), as he stated tonight, should find the Prime Minister's attitude "encouraging".

Even if the Government criticise South Africa, the South African Government know that they can still ultimately always depend on a British veto at the Security

[Mr. Anderson]

Council. The Government's massive failure has been that they have not grasped the scale of the human tragedy in South Africa or the urgency of the situation. As several hon. Members have said, and in particular the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), it is not just a question of apartheid. After all, apartheid is just a means by which the elite can impose its power and privileges on the majority. Some months ago, at one of his party conferences, President Botha quoted with approval what President Kruger said in 1898 to the Uitlanders. He said:

"You do not want the vote. You want my country."

That is the signal that President Botha gave to his party faithful, and it shows the measure of the willingness of the South African Government to compromise and negotiate.

Any changes are designed to retain power in safe, civilised white hands, whether they involve a confederal solution redrawing of boundaries or toy with solutions based on ethnicity. Throughout, the purpose is to retain power and privileges in the hands of that elite.

Mr. Hunter rose——

Mr. Anderson: Time is indeed running out. We ignore the inexorable dynamic of developments at our peril. When we talk about the importance of our investments, have we seriously considered what value those investments will be if there is a bloodbath? Already, as a result of the private sanctions that have been so effective since last August, the value of the commercial rand has fallen to less than $0·40. As the Minister of State will probably know, today's definition of a patriotic South African is someone who is unable to sell his house. The EPG concluded that all the changes had left the structure of apartheid intact and that the absence of concerted external pressures would only defer change.

How shall we respond? I concede that sanctions as such are a form of negative pressure. They have to be coupled with positive pressures such as those that were included in the EEC statement at Luxembourg on 9 September last.

What will be the response of the Prime Minister? Has it not been this: "How little can I get away with in response to world pressure? How can I continue to put a brake on Commonwealth and EEC pressures? How can I play for time? Let us delay a decision in the hope that the problem will go away so that we can have business as usual with the apartheid regime. Since the Palace has become tiresome, let us see if we can do something teeny weeny to placate it."?

The Foreign Secretary gives the impression of seeking a reasonable solution and of wanting a civilised chat about the future of South Africa, as if he were in an Oxford common room with congenial colleagues, while the flames are licking around the windows and while the Prime Minister, like a latter-day Canuta, stands vainly against the tide, and that for an inglorious cause.

That response is not good enough. We have to show that we are against apartheid not just in word but for real. We should be interested to find out what objection the Government have to our motion, as we have no particular objection to their motion. They claim that they are against ecomomic measures. What is the ban on krugerrands that was agreed at the Commonwealth summit if not an economic measure? We believe that sanctions or measures —call them what we will—are supported by the blacks. We refer the Government to the surveys that were reported in yesterday's Financial Times. We know that sanctions or measures are supported by the majority of people in South Africa and in the front-line states.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: What about Buthelezi?

Mr. Anderson: I exclude Chief Buthelezi from that majority. He appears to be the only black who finds favour on the Conservative Benches.

Sanctions on their own will not bring the walls of Pretoria down. They can only reinforce and interact with the internal pressures that are by far the most important. Those pressures come from COSATU — the trade union movement—the UDF and all those forces within South Africa that are seeking fundamental change and that rely on us from the outside to assist them in their cause.

We accept the importance of the private sanctions which have already had such an effect on South Africa. The purpose is not to punish; it is to bring pressure to bear on the minority to seek an accommodation with its majority, and to have a dialogue with the majority. Our task is not to prescribe an agenda or to set out the constitution of a new South Africa. Our job is to give assistance to the progressive forces in South Africa and to force the South African Government to talk to their majority and not to exclude them, as they do at present, completely from the national political process.

The British Government should begin by picking up the package that was left on the shelf at Nassau when they persuaded their colleagues in their isolation to go forward with the Eminent Persons Group, which has now failed. The spotlight is again on our Government. They may not respond, but I remind them and the South African Government that there will be a general election in this country within the next two years, and there is a more than reasonable chance of a change of Government.

The Labour party is pledged to isolate South Africa until it changes its policy and to promote effective external pressure. Under a Labour Government, South Africa will not longer be protected by the British Government in the United Nations Security Council and elsewhere. The South African Government and their friends should be left in no doubt that there will be a fundamental change of attitude under a Labour Government. We will not be a brake on developments within the EEC and the Commonwealth. Rather we will take the lead and go as far and as fast as our colleagues will go. We will make the embargo on arms and military material complete. We will support the enforcement of United Nations mandatory comprehensive sanctions. We will end economic and military collaboration with South Africa.

In short, the next Labour Government will not make ritual condemnations of South Africa but will be passionately determined to take concerted effective action as recommended in the Eminent Persons Group report. The next Labour Government will, by word and action, identify themselves with the South Africa of the future.

9.33 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): The hon. Member for Swansea, East, (Mr. Anderson) was right to say that the debate was taking place at a historic time. There cannot be a more tragic time in the affairs of southern Africa.

Tonight's debate has forcibly underlined — more forcibly than ever before—the utter repugnance felt by this House and by the nation towards the system of apartheid and our deep concern at its consequences. Many right hon. and hon. Menmbers have shown real understanding of the details of the complicated problem. We have heard thoughtful speech after thoughtful speech tonight and I would like to mention especially the hon. Members who were sponsored by the Churches to visit South Africa recently.

In the debate, hon. Members have referred several times to similarities between the Government's amendment and the Opposition motion. There is a difference. The aim of both sides is to bring an end to apartheid. In that we do not differ, but the difference is that the means to achieve that objective vary. That is what we are discussing tonight.

As the right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) said, we believe that the measures taken must be effective. They may not be limited to economic measures alone. There is no point in simply penalising South Africa. We need real results, which will bring an end to apartheid. We are pressing for the change through genuine dialogue, to be conducted in an atmosphere that is free from violence on both sides. Violence will not solve the problem.

In saying that we totally reject apartheid, we condemn utterly the sheer waste of a system that attempts to keep power and privilege in the hands of the few at the expense of the majority. We condemn, too, the waste of human resources and endeavour. It is particularly tragic that that should have happened in a part of the world that is so well endowed with resources. South Africa is a country that could offer all its people, regardless of colour or creed, a good life and make an enormous contribution to the economic health of the whole region.

Mr. Amery: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Chalker: I am pressed for time. I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me.

We are aware, especially this week, of the legacy of violence and death that apartheid has left to all South Africans.

Mr. Amery rose——

Mrs. Chalker: But despite what has happened, there must be further effort. We must not turn our backs on the countless numbers of South Africans, black and white, who continue to work towards the goal of a non-racial, democratic system of government. We must redouble our efforts—

Mr. Amery rose——

Mrs. Chalker: —and do whatever we can to ensure that South Africa can be rescued from the brink. I give way to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Amery: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I am sorry to have pressed her. Does she agree that what we reprehend and condemn in apartheid is the existence of laws that discriminate against any section of the population, particularly against the majority section of the population, but if those laws are repealed, it is no part of our war against apartheid to insist on majority rule?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend has long experience of South Africa. Of course we reprehend the laws of apartheid, but the actions that go with the laws are what we find repugnant. They discriminate between persons of different coloured skin or those of different creeds, effectively those from different tribes with different beliefs. That is what we in this country, and, I believe, those throughout the free world, are not prepared to see continue. With regard to majority rule, we cannot support a society that does not give a democratic vote to each and every one of its people.

We have not seen much in the news over the past few days because there has been a state of emergency. We were glad when the original state of emergency was lifted in March. Now it has been reimposed. The House knows more than anyone that muzzling the press will never break the spirit of all those seeking to end discrimination, whether it be in South Africa or elsewhere. A state of emergency has never produced a solution, and will not do so now. The unrest in South Africa underlines the urgent need for genuine debate and a suspension of violence on both sides.

Everybody has been impressed by the immense hard work and dedication of the Eminent Persons Group. We may not agree with all that it has written, but I wish to pay a deep tribute to its efforts. I am sure that it fully shares our regret that in the end, despite its incredible efforts, it was unable to bridge the gap between the South African Government and others who want to be involved in the future government of South Africa. In the end, it certainly achieved much more than some thought might be possible at the outset. Its work will help us to find a way in future to obtain a negotiated outcome.

However, I must refute the bitter speech and downright misrepresentations of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), especially in respect of Lord Barber. Lord Barber is an open and fair-minded person. If I may say so, without giving offence in any way, he is almost a second Lord Soames and that is how he will be remembered for his efforts.

The Eminent Persons Group called for concerted and effective Commonwealth action if South Africa is not to slide into even worse violence and bloodshed. We shall not ignore that call, but, as the report recognises, it is for the Heads of Government to decide on the nature of that action, and, clearly, if that action is to be effective it must involve the countries of the European Community and the seven members of the economic summit as well as the Commonwealth.

Let us hope that, although the Eminent Persons Group's work has come to an end for the time being, it will in time help to chart the way to a peaceful settlement in South Africa. That is what we all seek.

The Eminent Persons Group was particularly impressed by Nelson Mandela and what it believed was his commitment to a negotiated settlement. That strengthens our view that his immediate and unconditional release would constitute an important step towards the reconciliation that is most urgently needed. His unconditional release could play a key role in binding the wounds of bitterness and distrust.

The Eminent Persons Group concluded that there could be no settlement in South Africa without the ANC. The ANC is by no means the only voice in South African black opinion but we do not doubt that it has considerable support. We know that members of the ANC have a wide range of views, but they are united in their determination to bring about the elimination of apartheid. We know that there are Communists in the ANC but they are not in a majority and Communism will only thrive on the lack of dialogue and progress towards a non-racial democracy.

[Mrs. Chalker]

We established official contact with the ANC to make clear our total commitment to the search for a peaceful solution in South Africa.

Mr. Barnett rose

Mrs. Chalker: Let me finish what I am saying.

That does not lessen our condemnation of violence or terrorism to attain political objectives. Nor does it lessen our attempts to persuade all those involved to cease that violence. Those who resort to the violence of the gun and the bomb, on whichever side they may be, are only delaying the day when a peaceful settlement might be secured. Violence encourages those who hope to profit from a South Africa torn apart by a hideous racial war. It does nothing to solve the problems.

Mr. Barnett: I am most grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way. Many of my hon. Friends will be delighted by what she said about the ANC. I rise only to ask, in view of the clear approval of the hon. Member and the Government of the ANC and the part that it is playing in South Africa, what practical help the Government hope to be able to give to the ANC in the position in which it finds itself?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman is taking what I said a good deal further. In the officials' dialogue with the ANC there has always been a call by the Government for a suspension of violence. In discussing the aspirations of black people in South Africa we listened not only to members of the ANC but to other black groups who have made contact with our officials and, indeed, with Members of Parliament.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mrs. Chalker: The most important change has been the change in the role of business. The Eminent Persons Group report recognised the potential of the business community in South Africa for bringing pressure to bear on the Government. We have always firmly believed that the business community is an important element in that irresistible force for change that the economic development of black South Africans represents. Some 13 years ago we pioneered the code of conduct for British firms, and at that time such ideas were extremely unfashionable. We have made it clear to British companies that we expect them to live up to that code which, since 1977, has applied to all European companies. It has been strengthened in important areas by the recognition of trade unions, in education and training, and by community projects. Because we introduced that code, we see more strength being exhibited by the business community to promote change.

I am glad to say that British companies have responded to the code and have set example after example. Most have either recognised independent black trade unions or are willing to do so. Some 92 per cent. have minimum wage levels at or above the level required by the code and many are becoming actively involved in projects to benefit the wider community. No less than £6·5 million was spent by just 10 companies last year on such community projects.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The Minister spoke about the development of the code of conduct. The recent report on ethical investment spoke about underpayment by British firms in South Africa. How can the Government expect to be taken seriously when they say they will not impose sanctions because of the economic harm they would cause the blacks in south Africa, when many of the largest recruting sergeants for poverty are British firms who underpay their South African workers? Will the Minister follow up that report and call in those firms that are clearly underpaying and not abiding by the code of conduct?

Mrs. Chalker: I shall certainly look into what the hon. member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said, but there is no way in which Governments should interfere in an internal matter. Through the British Industry Committee on South Africa we bring the code of conduct to the notice of all British firms in South Africa. I shall look again at the point raised by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): My hon. Friend is strong on diplomacy. I admire that in view of her position. Since the feeling of the House is clearly against apartheid, when will she respond to that opposition with some teeth that will destroy that system?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend anticipates my speech. I should not have given way to him and that would have enabled me to get to the point much quicker. It is not just that which we are pressing companies to do, because foreign companies can and do exert increasing pressure. I would not wish to bring all that to an end by cutting links and blocking our influence. It is not just business that is involved in promoting change. We, too, are giving special shcolarships to black South Africans and looking for ways in which they can be assisted. As my hon. Friend the member for York is tempting me to say, we already have in action restrictive measures against South Africa. I shall not list them all because we have been through the large number of measures implemented by the Government, and they number far more than any other country on its own has begun to implement.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East asked about The Guardian evidence. I think he said it appeared on Saturday. I am aware of the recent suggestions, but we are looking into the allegations in the first report. I have heard nothing to suggest that the Government are in any way in breach of their obligations under the United Nations arms embargo. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman when I have finished the investigation.

Hon. Members have been asking what can be done to end apartheid. Many have made proposals tonight and the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said that this was a good time to have a debate to collect ideas. Obviously, there are many measures that individual hon. Members would like to see introduced and they will all be studied because it will be through some further action that we shall take with our partners that we shall increase the pressure on the South African Government to end apartheid.

I well understand the suggestions for a ban on air links, on new investment, and on the import of agricultural produce, and I share the feelings that caused hon. Members to make those suggestions. I am in no way seeking to duck the possible help which they may bring, but as the right hon. Member for Clydesdale said, we must examine exactly what the impact would be. What would be the impact on black workers in South Africa and on South Africa's neighbours, such as Zambia, Zimbabwe and Botswana? Most important, would they have an effective impact on the South African Government? There is no point in introducing measures unless they have a significant effect on the South African Government.

We must not forget that the objectives are to promote dialogue and to suspend all violence. We all agree that that is crucial. There is a necessity to send clear, effective signals, not to make gestures that would do more harm than good. That is why we have said that we must assess the effect of each and every measure, not only on South African people, but on all peoples in southern Africa, particularly in the front-line states.

Mr. John Carlisle: My hon. Friend said that she would consider "further action" in consultation with our Community partners. She owes it to the House and certainly to some Conservative Members to explain a little more fully exactly what she envisages by "further action".

Mrs. Chalker: As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said in his opening remarks, and as I have said, we shall consider the report of the Eminent Persons Group, the suggestions made in the House and all measures — [Interruption.] because if we do not, we cannot be judged to have come to a reasonable conclusion on what it would be best to do, in order to bring an end to apartheid, which even my hon. Friend said he wanted to see.

For all those reasons, the Government are not prepared to make hasty decisions or to comment in detail on all the many ideas put forward. However, we shall consider all the policy options in consultation with our partners in the Commonwealth and the European Community, and with other countries. Our objective must be to find the most effective way to hasten that real change.

The House is united in praying that all South Africans, black and white, will find a way to emerge together and in peace from the present crisis. We must not contemplate any alternative. We must lead all our potential partners in the EC, the Commonwealth and the seven members of the economic summit to an effective solution which will persuade the South African Government — [Interruption.]—not to erect further barriers against the people of their country but to break them down. That is what everyone seeks to achieve. That can be done only be ensuring that the methods we adopt will have an effect on the South African Government.

The ideas that have been promulgated tonight lead one to consider how the business community will react. These ideas cannot be implemented by Government alone; they can only be carried through in consultation with the business community. That is why I will not respond as hon. Members are seeking to tempt me.

Violence and civil unrest, wherever they occur, will lead only to further violence and to deeper human misery. In South Africa, the current tragedy is a direct consequence of the evil of apartheid and the repression that is used to enforce it. These are sombre times for the people of South Africa. If apartheid is not rooted out and destroyed we shall achieve no settlement and the catastrophe perceived by the Eminent Persons Group will become a reality.

What we need to do is to persuade the South African Government to take an axe to the main limbs of this poisonous plant and to do it now. Nothing else will do. It is the South African Government who must take that axe to the poisonous plant.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): What will the Government do?

Mrs. Chalker: Even the noisy hon. Member below the Gangway on the Opposition side has given no hint, except in his shouts, of what he sees as an end to the matter. Negotiations between all the interested parties on a new non-racial constitution must take place and that cannot wait.

Hon. Members are anxious to know the details. I have already said that the challenge to the international community is to assist that process, but it is a tense and dangerous situation. That is why I have said, and I repeat, that it would be foolhardy to rush into any decision and that is why Her Majesty's Government are looking at all the suggestions that have been made.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose—

Mrs. Chalker: We seek the destruction of apartheid. We do not seek the destruction of South Africa and its economy. The emergence of a non-racial democracy needs to be in an economically healthy South Africa which can grow. To destroy everything in South Africa for the simple and, perhaps to some, totally desirable reason, of ending a Government, but then to leave black people in South Africa with nothing on which to build, would be just as much of a tragedy as some of the things we are witnessing today.

If we are to make a real impression, the United Kingdom cannot act alone. This has become clearer and clearer. That is why we are discussing the issues fully with our partners.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Chalker: That is why we must find an effective way of responding to the call for effective action—

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are three minutes left. The hon. Lady is not giving way and I ask the House to give her a fair hearing.

Mrs. Chalker: Our sole aim is to work for the best interests of the people of South Africa.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Chalker: No, I will not give way, especially not to a Member who has not been in the Chamber for any of the debate.

Our sole aim is to work for the best interests of all the people of South Africa. We have to help them emerge from the present nightmare, free from apartheid and able to take a place in the community of nations. We are not daunted by the enormity of the challenge but we are conscious of the dangers. We cannot, we must not and we will not lose sight of our goal, which is to seek peaceful transition to a system of government in South Africa under which all can live and prosper in freedom and justice.

Mr. Canavan: Absolute hypocrisy.

Mrs. Chalker: I believe it was in the book "Cry, The Beloved Country" that Alan Paton wrote of slavery, fear and freedom. What we have to do is overcome the problem of fear. We have to give all the people in South Africa that freedom. I urge right hon. and hon. Members to support the Prime Minister's amendment.

Resolved,

That this House calls upon Her Majesty's Government, in view of the worsening situation in the Republic of South Africa and in the light of the Report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group, to work actively with the Europeen Community, the Commonwealth, and the Economic Summit Seven countries for effective measures which will help achieve a peaceful solution in South Africa based on negotiations and a suspension of violence on all sides.

Medicinal Products

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9630/84 and 5752/86, proposals for draft Directives and a Recommendation, and Amendments to the proposals, on the marketing and testing of medicinal products, and of the supplementary explanatory memorandum from the Department of Health and Social Security dated 8th May 1986; endorses the aim of strengthening biotechnology in respect of medicinal products within the Community; and welcomes continued progress towards removing the remaining barriers to trade between member States, whilst fully protecting public health.

These proposals deal with European Community rules for the testing and marketing of medicines. This is a complex and highly technical subject. I cannot avoid detail, but the House will be primarily concerned with the principles underlying the detail. I shall therefore concentrate on the principles.

The marketing of medicines in the Community is governed by Community legislation — directives — adopted between 1965 and 1983. Subject to certain specific exceptions, such as vaccines, which have not yet been brought within the scope of European Community rules, national regulatory authorities are bound to apply the provisions of the pharmaceutical directives when considering an application for marketing authorisation. In addition, a Council recommendation has been adopted containing guidelines for the preparation and consideration of marketing applications covering a number of safety and efficacy aspects. United Kingdom arrangements for applying Community legislation in this field operate under the provisions of the Medicines Acts of 1968 and 1971, and subordinate orders.

Some of the proposals now before the House concern veterinary medicines as well as medicines for human use, and as such are a matter for my right hon. Friend, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, but where this is so, the particulars are similar, and DHSS and MAFF interests are identical. My remarks therefore apply to both where relevant.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment, when he was Minister for Health, submitted, on 22 January 1985, an explanatory memorandum which described the proposals as they were drafted at that time, and identified a number of issues which required careful study, and possible amendment before they could be accepted. I shall deal with those issues later.

Discussions in Brussels, which are still in progress, produced explanations and some textual amendment. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Health therfore submitted a supplementary explanatory memorandum to the House on 8 May. I shall also expand on this later. Also, the European Commission forwarded, on 5 March 1986, some amendments to its original proposals. These Commission amendments represent reactions to opinions expressed by the European Parliament, and also, in the Commission's own words,

"take account of scientific and technical developments since the initial Commission proposals were submitted".

This batch of Commission amendments was dealt with in my right hon. Friends explanatory memorandum, also dated 8 May 1986.

It will, I think, help the House if I explain that the primary purpose of all European Community regulation in this area is the protection of public health. That is the overriding consideration, but associated with that purpose is a determination not to hinder the development of the pharmaceutical industry, and trade in medicinal products. In the medium term our aim is to harmonise national regulations and standards of assessment, and so on, so as to achieve the free movement of medicines between member states. In any case, we plan to abolish all Community internal barriers to trade by 1992. This state of affairs is intended to apply to medicines by way of the mutual recognition of national marketing authorisations granted by individual countries. I need hardly add, in this context, that when mutual recognition is eventually achieved, there will be no lowering of United Kingdom standards of protection for the public.

I turn now to the subject matter of the proposals. They represent further progress down the path towards mutual recognition. They extend the opportunities and, in some cases, the obligations for national regulatory bodies to discuss issues concerning particular products before individual decisions are taken. Such discussions will assist the development of mutual understanding which is a prerequisite of mutual recognition. They will help also to identify and to deal with differences of view in a positive way, focussing on specific and concrete issues.

Priority will be given to biotechnology and other "high technology" manufacturing processes. Thus, the exchange of views provided for in these proposals, and the development of agreed opinions, will assist not only progress towards mutual recognition but the pharmaceutical industry by the establishment of certainty in respect of national regulatory requirements on a Communitywide basis in these very important and rapidly developing areas of science. There is no doubt that industry faces problems because of the varying requirements as between member states, and even more so when uncertainty exists about regulatory requirements because of large sums of money need to be invested early to secure a competitive position.

The proposals consist of a package of measures, four directives and a recommendation. Some touch on the general issues which I have already mentioned. Others contain more detailed improvements to the existing rules. The proposed recommendation simply adds another 14 guidelines on safety and efficacy considerations for the preparation and consideration of marketing applications. These guidelines were produced by extensive discussion in the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products which deals with medicines for human use. The guidelines were the subject also of consultation with representatives of the pharmaceutical industry. I believe that they are non-controversial.

The first proposed directive is new. Its most important element is the introduction of compulsory reference to the CPMP or the Committee for Veterinary Medicinal Products for applications involving major biotechnology innovation. The range of applications concerned is identified in the annex to the proposal at list A of the first directive. The directive also encourages reference to the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products or Committee for Veterinary Medicinal Products, in agreement with the company concerned, for other "high technology" products as described in list B of the annex. As I have already said, the Government agree with the European Commission that co-ordination in this highly complex and rapidly advancing area of science is good for the public, manufacturers and the European economy.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As my hon. Friend will accept, this is a technical and complex issue, but perhaps he will answer two questions. First, with a view to what is happening to the LD50 test, does the directive mean that United Kingdom patients are likely to be subjected to medicines that have not undergone the strict testing undergone by current medicines? Secondly, will the directive affect parallel imports—products which are made before the patent has expired in this country but which can be made in another country? If so, will it be to the detriment or to the benefit of the United Kingdom's pharmaceutical industry?

Mr. Whitney: If my hon. Friend will bear with me, I shall come later to the LD50 test. As for parallel imports, the directive will not have a detrimental effect on the United Kingdom's pharmaceutical industry.

The improvements to the text and explanations received have removed the concerns expressed in the 22 January 1985 memorandum. I shall not go into them in detail unless asked to do so.

The first proposed directive, in article 5, also introduces for medicinal products arrangements similar to those already in place for the generality of products, whereby the Commission and other member states are notified of proposed new technical regulations. The idea is to prevent the imposition of unjustifiable technical barriers to trade between member states, by allowing time before new regulations come into force so that all those concerned have an opportunity to raise objections, and to have those objections considered. The Government fully support this measure.

I turn now to the second and third proposed directives. I can deal with these together, because they contain similar measures; the first covering medicines for human use, the second covering veterinary medicines. Each contains two distinct elements. Neither element presents the United Kingdom with any difficulty. The first element introduces arrangements designed to assist the rapid updating of data requirements in support of marketing applications.

The Government agree that data requirements should be kept under review and modified promptly as indicated by experience and the advances of science. We also accept that it is a sensible way to avoid unnecessary delay on such important, if technical matters; we are perfectly content to accept qualified majority voting; and we do not think it essential to progress through all the exceptionally long European corridors involving, as they do, the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament, and so on. I am also reassured to learn that the so-called "committees for adaptation to technical progress" will, in fact, consist of people with special expertise in this field nominated by member states—the same people as form the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products and the Committee for Veterinary Medicinal Products.

The second element amends particulars required in support of marketing applications under parts 1 and 2 of the annex to directive 75/318/EEC and directive 81/852/EEC as relevant, dealing respectively with "Physico-chemical, Biological, or Microbiological Tests" and "Toxicological and Pharmaceological Tests". It may assist hon. Members if I say that the amendments of the annex to directive 765/318/EEC and the corresponding amendments to directive 81/852/EEC were added in March of this year under EC document 5752/86, whereas the amendment to part 2 of the annex to directive 75/318/EEC and the corresponding amendmemt to directive 81/852/EEC were in the original 1984 document.

The "part 1" amendments, as they are known, bring into effect detailed improvements to the text recently agreed by the CPMP and the CVMP. The "part 2" amendments are perhaps of more general interest. They do two things. The first is to require that safety tests are undertaken in compliance with the principles of good laboratory practice. The second removes the absolute requirement to determine the dose level of a prospective medicine which results in death for 50 per cent. of the animals used in the test.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) will recognise that I am referring to the lethal dose 50 test. For other hon. Members I should perhaps explain that the LD50 test is one of a battery of tests to establish the toxicity of a new substance before it is tested in human beings. Scientists now universally agree that the arbitrary choice of a 50 per cent. death rate is inappropriate. The appropriate death rate will be determined on a scientific need basis for each substance and will usually be lower than 50 per cent. This will avoid the unnecessary death of animals, which I am sure hon. Members will welcome.

Mr. Marlow: Will the Minister undertake to guarantee, although we are all quite properly concerned to reduce the unnecessary death of animals, that the level of protection for the human patient will be at least as high as it has been in the past?

Mr. Whitney: Within the limits of my own capabilities. It is a scientific determination and the careful judgment is that the scientific need basis, to which I have referred, will give the sort of guarantee that my hon. Friend is seeking and, indeed, that the Government must insist upon. Therefore, we share that objective.

I now turn to the fourth proposed directive. Yet again, the proposals are in discrete parts. The first, and more important concerns the data which must be submitted in support of an application for marketing authorisation. These are dealt with in article 4 of directive 65/65/EEC. The proposal is for amendment of Article 4.8, which deals with the results of tests and trials.

In general, applicants must provide the results of tests and trials, but where the constituent or constituents of a product have a well-established medicinal use with an acceptable level of safety—like many of the medicines that we can buy over the counter without a doctor's prescription—it would be ridiculous to require detailed data for each new application. What would be the point of using animals to produce unreliable models of possible effects in man in respect of a substance which had already been used by man himself for many years? The general rule to provide data is therefore relaxed in such circumstances.

On the other hand, it is important to take account of the valid commercial interests of innovatory companies, so that the results of their original research and development cannot be pirated. This protection of the results of original work is particularly important when companies are obliged to supply details in several languages for discussion in the CPMP or CVMP, and where patent protection may not be available, or patentable only with considerable difficulty, as with biotechnology medicines such as insulin or interferon, which are analogues of natural substances.

The picture is complicated by differences in practice between the regulatory bodies of the various member states. Some are more stringent than others in pressing for test results in respect of the constituents of products which are already on the market. Others, says the Commission, give an unfair advantage to copiers by using commercial information supplied to the original licence holder when assessing the copy application.

The Commission tried to reconcile the somewhat conflicting interests described above in its proposed amendments to article 4.8. The original proposals were generally acceptable to the United Kingdom. But we are not so clear about the effect of compromise suggestions made during negotiations. There seemed to be a possiblity that efforts to obtain maximum harmonisation of practice between member states would produce a text which went too far towards obliging national regulatory bodies to demand test results for already well-known constituents.

That was the stage that we were at when my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health signed the supplementary memorandum on 8 May. But my officials have now been able to study the new text in detail, and they have satisfied me that their anxieties were unnecessary. The problem, in fact, turned on interpretation.

The second, and comparatively minor part of the revision of directive 65/65/EEC — I interject here, no doubt to the relief of some hon. Members, that this is the last point of detail that I propose to bring to the attention of the House — repeals the obligation to mark external packages of narcotics with a double red band. The intention of that marking was to help pharmacists to keep all such products under proper surveillance, but experience has shown that the markings are also at least as helpful to drug addicts or thieves who, on breaking into pharmacies, can quickly identify their loot.

As I hope I have made clear, the proposals contain useful improvements and additions to the present arrangements for controlling the safety and the marketing of medicines within the Community. At the same time, they provide assistance to research-based pharmaceutical companies, particularly those engaged in biotechnology, and represent useful progress towards removing the remaining barriers to trade between member states. I invite the House to agree that we should welcome adoption of the proposals contained in European Community documents 9630/84 and 5752/86.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The proposals are very technical, and it is extremely difficult to judge their merits. There is no doubt about the content of the proposals, because I can read English, but I have no direct research experience of this matter, and so it is difficult for me and, I suspect, for most hon. Members to judge their merits.

Nevertheless, when drugs are imported, it is important to know exactly what they contain. It is also important to know about the conditions of manufacture, and to know what impurities may exist, particularly in the case of parallel imports. I am not against importing generic substitutes, but the proper concern of British pharmaceutical companies — that they should be able to continue research and development in the United Kingdom — must also be protected. Of course, that can be subject to licences of right, and to generic substitution once patents have run out.

There are now substantial imports from the EEC, and we should know exactly their quality and content, in order to protect the public. On the one hand, the public must be protected and, on the other hand, one must not stifle innovation in research and development.

Given my initial statement about my limitations in understanding the proposals, I can give them a cautious welcome. The amendments ought to strengthen public safety without doing damage to the research and development required in producing new pharmaceuticals using biotechnology. Existing directives will be amended so that a new biotechnological product must be considered first by the CPMP, which is the expert EEC committee, before the DHSS can give a product licence. That is to the good as a principle in itself.

There are limitations, but one does not want to delay unnecessarily the introduction of important new drugs. Provided the committee does not deliberate too long — I do not think it will — it can only be to the advantage of the public if it examines any biotechnological product. Therefore, we have no objection to that.

We have to be careful that we do not remove responsibility from the Minister on product licences. Responsibility for what is marketed in this country should remain with the Minister. He will have his expert committees which should continue to advise him.

There is a danger that if the Common Market produces an expert committee, say, the CPMP, which has all the information available to it, it will perhaps accrete to itself such power that national committees may more and more take for granted the word of the EEC experts committee. Nothing must be taken for granted. Anything that the CPMP considers should be taken into account by our national expert committee, but it would be a pity if the investigative function of the expert committees of member states was not used as much and those committees relied almost exclusively on the opinion of the CPMP. Therein lies a danger. Provided we do not allow that to happen, the referral of products to the CPMP is an advance that I welcome.

I understand that there will be standardisation of data requirements within the EEC. That should speed up the introduction of new products and drugs, so long as public safety requirements are not relaxed.

In explanatory memorandum 8232 on document 9630/84, paragraph 2.4 says:

> "The arrangements for rapid data updating involve the establishment of a Committee for the Adaptation to Technical Progress of the Directives on the Removal of Technical Barriers to Trade in the Proprietary Medicinal Products Sector. This Committee would be chaired by a representative of the Commission, and act by qualified majority (as also would the council of Ministers when considering Committee proposals). The Commission is also given power to effect changes to data requirements on its own account if the Council of Ministers has not acted on the Committee's proposals within three months."

There are certain doubts in my mind about that. I know that the arrangements are for data updating, but there is a possibility of the committee acting by qualified majority.

I wonder whether the Minister can envisage the United Kingdom losing out, perhaps if it voted against a proposal but was outvoted by a qualified majority.

The committee is for the adaptation of directives on the removal of technical barriers to trade, but I do not know exactly what the committee will consider. For example, it could consider the importing of more drugs into this country. Am I right in thinking that the United Kingdom could object to proposals to allow an increase in drug imports, with less stringent controls and safety built into the conditions, but we could be outvoted by a qualified majority? If that is so, or if there is a similar situation, there is cause for concern. I hope that I have misunderstood that paragraph. If I have, I would welcome the Minister's comments so that he can put my mind, and, I am sure, other people's minds at rest.

Paragraph 5.3*(c)* of the same document refers to

"The requirement to consult the CPMP and the CVMP before Member States can grant or revoke marketing authorisations for the listed range of products."

That paragraph will be put into the directive. I welcome it, if it is a matter of introducing new products. Provided that there is no unnecessary delay, the intention to consult the CPMP and the CVMP is good. On the other hand, I wonder what happens the other way round. Let us suppose that a product has a product licence, but for some reason it has to be taken off the market. Again, I may have misunderstood the provision, and I may be asking a naive question, but I believe that it is important. Will the United Kingdom retain its right to revoke a product licence for any product immediately without having to consult the CPMP about it? If the Minister can say anything about that, I should be grateful. Indeed, that requirement is one of the controversial elements in the directives. It is controversial from the point of view of revoking a product licence. But it is not controversial if it is a matter of introducing a new product.

I welcome the extension to medicinal products of the community "stand-still" arrangements concerning draft technical regulations of a member state. That can only be good if there is prior compulsory consultation, and delay if an objection is raised. I also welcome the removal of the absolute requirement in determining dose levels of a drug for human use which results in the death of 50 per cent. of the animals used in the test. The Minister referred to it as the LD50 test. I am persuaded by the scientific evidence, of which I have seen quite a lot, and to which the Minister referred, that it is no longer necessary to have an LD50 test.

I hope that that relaxation of the absolute requirement will be used by the United Kingdom, and that fewer animals will have to die as a result of experiments. I am persuaded that that can be done with no detriment to public safety standards. I say as an aside that, if there are any tests on patients, all patients should be told that they are being tested. There has been some doubt about that in recent times. The matter does not come within the directives, but perhaps the Minister should take it on board. Sometimes there must be tests on patients, and there is no harm in that so long as the tests are properly controlled, and the patients must know what is happening; if the patients are children, their parents should be told. In other words, proper control must be exercised.

Another important proposal is the provision to ensure a 10-year period of protection from the date on which the marketing authorisation was granted. While I do not object to that in principle, I do not want to see it as a first step in extending protection from 10 years to 16 or 20 years or perhaps even longer.

Problems could arise with the phrase "essentially similar products", words which appear in the English translation of the directive. Difficulties may arise with the definition of that phrase. Perhaps the Minister can put our minds at rest on that.

EEC document 5752/86 emanates from a letter from the Vice-President of the Commission of the European Communities, Lord Cockfield, to Mr. Hans van den Broek, President of the Council of the European Communities. It amplifies some of my concern about the definition of substances and the meaning of words. Page 7 contains this insertion in the directive:

"the description of the substance, set down in a form similar to that used in a descriptive item in the European Pharmacopoeia, shall be accompanied by any necessary explanatory evidence, especially concerning the molecular structure where appropriate; it must be accompanied by an appropriate description of the method of synthetic preparation. Where substances can only be described by their method of preparation, the description should be sufficiently detailed to characterise a substance which is constant both in its composition and in its effects."

Probably no substance is absolutely constant in its composition and, therefore in its effects; substances over time change in their composition, and I should not be surprised if the toxicity of some substances changed over time. If the passage that I quoted is all that is being added to the directive, I wonder whether it will enable us to define sufficiently precisely substances when product licences are being granted. Shall we be able to assess them when considering if they are "essentially similar" to other substances? That might be consideration in deciding whether to give them 10-year protection. I am not convinced from the paragraph I quoted that we have the provision sufficiently accurate for there to be no doubt about its application in any of the cases that I cited.

On the same theme is the question of the provision of information. Annex 1 to the Council recommendation relating to tests in document 9630/84 deals with placing proprietary medicinal products on the market. Paragraph 3*(b)* says:

"Whatever species or strain of animals are selected it is essential that the following information should be provided, age, sex, weight, origin and the time in the laboratory before tests, whether or not the animals are classified as being free or specific pathogens, whether or not the animals have been vaccinated or submitted to any other procedure. Details of housing and environmental conditions should be given. Access to and the nature of the diet and the availability of water should be stated. All the above factors are known to affect the acute toxicity of substances."

I am sure that all the information is necessary to make a decision on the toxicity of substances, but is it sufficient? The document says nothing about that. Does the Minister have any information on that?

In addition, there is a problem about the definitions and their interpretation in the various member states. It may well be that some definitions will be applied in different ways. Under the new British legislation there will be licences for animal experiments, and so on, and I hope that there will inspectors to make sure that there is control and standardisation in Britain, so that when any tests are performed the public can be sure that they have been done properly and not on the cheap.

Shall we simply take on board the testing and analyses of other member states and accept that their standards must be high enough? What criteria will the Minister use? Is he worried that the procedures in other member states may not be as good as those in the United Kingdom? I do not say that in any political way. I hope that all hon. Members would wish to be satisfied about that.

Other questions can be asked about the proposals, but apart from matters of detail there are a few essential questions. Will safety and the confidence of the public in medicines and medicinal products be increased, and will research and development into new medicines be encouraged, or at least not discouraged? Will the proposals help in animal replacement in experiments where that is practical and possible? Will there be a greater exchange of views among experts in the various fields? I hope that the House will bear in mind my earlier comments about the European experts committee. Finally, will new important medicines become available more quickly on the market?

The answer to those questions will probably be yes, but I hope that the Minister, with the advice and expertise available to him, will be able to answer the questions before the end of the debate.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): The Chamber may have emptied, but the subject that we are talking about tonight — the generation of drugs through biotechnology — is probably as important in our lives and is likely to be as important in future as the effect of South Africa on our lives today and I am glad to have an opportunity briefly to discuss it.

I think that it was Magnus Pike who pointed out that the creation of drugs through fermentation has been with us as long as there have been human beings and the first thing that Noah did when he came off the ark was to learn about fermentation and then get very drunk.

I take a personal and a constituency interest in the matter as the brewing industry in Burton-on-Trent, which is of long-standing, provides a large volume of materials for parts of the pharmaceutical industry in my constituency through companies such as English Grains Ltd. They will be pleased to see the stand taken by the Government in the Minister's letter of 8 May 1986, to which my hon. Friend referred, which said that full test data, will not be a mandatory requirement for the new applications in respect of well-established products, because that is exactly what the pharmaceutical companies in my constituency are producing — well-established, long-used products. To have to go through the whole business of re-testing them simply to satisfy a Common Market directive would be arduous.

I should also like to congratulate whoever produced "Biotechnology: A Plain Man's Guide." It emanates from the laboratory of the Government Chemist. Perhaps I ought to ignore the sexism of the title, but I am delighted to see that the person on the front who looks so puzzled at the whole business is, indeed, a man. For that reason I refuse to take exception to the title. The book is first-class and I hope that people producing documents in other Government Departments will take a leaf out of it.

It is easy to understand and easy to find one's way around. It links the different departments extremely well and is full of delightful little cartoons, such as two bugs discussing whether to eat a piece of cake.

The sections in the book that refer to Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland are highlighted by, in the case of Wales, a lady with a daffodil, in the case of Scotland, a bearded chap with bagpipes, and in the case of Northern Ireland, a leprachaun with a shamrock sticking out of his hat. Things like that make it easy to follow. The sense of humour and the style of the person who wrote this to be commended.

My own links with this industry started some 20 years ago when I was employed for a while in the product-testing laboratory of Eli Lilley and Company in Speke near Liverpool. Part of my job resulted in my getting the cold shoulder from a lot of the people that I travelled home with, because it involved taking bacteria, feeding them agar agar and Bovril, allowing the bacteria to grow — and, as a result, to become exceedingly smelly — then testing the effect on them of various concentrations of drugs, such as penicillin and penicillin derivatives. The trouble with doing that job was that the pong clung to one's hair and skin and riding home on the bus was a rather unpleasant experience for all the other passengers. For doing that job I was paid £10 a week. I suspect it was quite a dangerous way to test commodities and I sincerely hope that nobody messes about in quite that way these days.

When trying to understand the material that is before the House, I noted with interest that Eli Lilley and company is still very active in the field of biotechnology and last year had the largest single number of patents granted in biotechnology in the United States of America. The company had 28 out of just over 1,000 patents. In the last three years over 3,200 patents have been granted in the United States of America, so we really are into a growth industry. I have seen estimates that the biotech market will grow to 100 billion dollars by the year 2000, which is not very far away. The sad thing is that although two thirds of these patents were of American origin, and one third were not of United States origin, the largest single other country was Japan. The Common Market countries are a long way down the list and last year the United Kingdom had only 32 patents approved in the USA. That is barely more than than patents granted to one company, Eli Lilley. From what I could see, the total from all the Common Market countries came to less than 100 — in other words, less than 10 per cent. of the number of patents granted in the United States. That is sad when we consider that the origins of this extraordinary technology were entirely British and resulted in a number of Nobel prizes, the most recent being awarded to Cambridge university in 1984.

Biotechnology is a strange world. It is a world of immortal cells that will go on reproducing themselves indefinitely. It is a world of activities and ideas that we can only begin to grasp. I suspect that when these changes were first announced and first became the subject of investigation by such organisations as the Common Market we probably overestimated the possibilities. They are certainly coming now.

Recently some hon. Members were given a demonstration in the Commons of some of the diagnostic techniques that are the subject of today's papers. We were shown, for example, the development of the Wellcome Foundation in the detection of AIDS. We were shown the possibilities that are soon to become commercial in which a pinprick of blood will be taken, perhaps in a doctor's surgery, and will be tested for a wide range of reagents and reactants in the blood and will enable us to detect instantly whether someone is suffering from an illness or what the course of a chronic illness might be. Some of these commodities are already on sale so we are not talking in these documents about theory. Human growth hormone, for example, and insulin are already available. Treatments for such diseases as herpes, hepatitis B, thalassaemia, sickle cell anaemia and so on, are being actively worked on and tested under these regimes. It is hoped that a great deal of the work will help cancer patients, and much research is being funded by cancer charities, which is to be welcomed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) asked about changes involving animals and animal testing. The question about the LD50 test for animals is raised in directive 75/318/EEC. I am by no means a qualified scientist, but the material is specifically genetically engineered and intended for a particular purpose and a particular species. Our main concern is about human beings. Therefore, it seems peculiarly inappropriate to use that test. We shall not learn much from the effect of that material on animals. We want to learn of the effect on people. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister will clarify that matter when he replies.

It is nice to know that the new mechanisms for creating this material will to a large degree obviate the use of animals. When the technology started animals such as mice were used for the original antibodies. Now companies such as Celltech are using mechanical bio-reactors on an enormous scale. It is nice to know that this is a British company. It was set up some five years ago by the National Enterprise Board, partly as a response to our complete failure to patent some of the ideas we had been developing and getting Nobel prizes for. Despite the activities of the NEB it is now 85 per cent. privately owned, and it is doing well. It has, for example, the world's first licence to be granted by the United States' Government for bulk production of monoclonal antibodies, and is selling the stuff by the kilogramme. That is absolutely fantastic and will open up the opportunities for research in a big way.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bear in mind the comments made about safety. Recently, in the United States there has been a case, referred to in the literature, not concerning human material but an animal vaccine for use against pig pseudorabies. It was licensed for use last January—not six months ago—and within four months its product licence was removed because of an action brought by the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States in which it was alleged that testing had not been done properly. It was apparent from the evidence circulated that the real anxiety was that genetic material might be leaked into the environment and have damaging effects, like of which none of us could guess at. The response of the health inspectorate in the United States — which rejoices in the acronym APHIS, the Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service—was that the vaccine would go into the pig and no further, and that there would be no environmental leakage. Nevertheless, it is a matter of some concern.

In the light of some of the anxiety about pesticides and the effect of their inappropriate storage and use, these EEC directives on manufacturing and testing are not sufficient. We need to be reassured about storage use, and training for use of those materials, especially when we are talking not only of human vaccines and drugs, but animal and plant use. It is essential that we maintain the highest standards so that we can reassure the public.

Provided we retain an awareness of the dangers of dealing with these powerful commodities, I hope that that with encouragement and careful Government supervision across Europe much more rapid progress can be made.

11.3 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The hour is late and the Minister is facing an unprecedented degree of harmony across the Floor on a health issue. Therefore, I intend to be extremely brief.

Without being flippant about the speech of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), I must say that I endorse her views about the inherent sexism in the presentation of the document to which she referred but which I have not had the opportunity to see. The caricaturing inherent in that title can equally be applied on a nationalist level to display everyone in Ireland as a shamrock-waving leprechaun and everyone north of the Border as a bagpipe-playing Scot. I hasten to say that we certainly play the bagpipes better than we play football these days, but that is another story.

For once, I find myself supporting a Government motion. It seems to be eminently sensible. I will not repeat the qualifications and proper reservations which have already been expressed.

I agree with the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South about the crucial importance of biotechnology to the future of medicine. There is a revolution in primary health care. The Health Service, at local level, through the general practitioner's surgery, can meet many of the demands which hitherto were considered to require specialist treatment of a more exclusive type – I use that word advisedly. The revolution has been made possible by the growth and development of biotechnology techniques.

It makes good common sense to have as free an internal market in Europe as possible, consistent with the maintenance of adequate health and safety levels.

It is important to stress that, in drawing up these directives and the accompanying material, the Commission has said that the "most recent Directive (83/570/EEC) will lead towards the establishment of a genuine common market for medicinal products by evolutionary process, but that medicinal products derived from biotechnology and other forms of advanced technology cannot wait."

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South referred to the briefing, which we both attended, on some of the developments that are taking place. It is evident from the expert and informed opinion of the British companies involved that there is some urgency. I echo what the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South and the companies have said to the Department and I trust that the Minister will make satisfactory progress. We shall certainly give him support.

I am glad that the Government are welcoming the continuing progress towards removing the remaining barriers to trade between member states in the Community. In that respect, I support these measures.

With regard to research and development, reference has been made to the general concerns of the United Kingdom industry. At a recent annual dinner which some of us attended, the Minister for Health laid great stress on the tremendous contribution which the pharmaceutical industry makes to research and development, and to exports. That is correct, and I hope that the Government will see their way to negotiating with the industry a better deal on potent life. That would enable a betterdeal for the industry and permit greater opportunities for the research taking place in Britain to remain a domestically based development capacity and, therefore, an export potential. In the past, patents have passed on to North America or Europe at the expense of the British economy and developments.

Subject to the obvious expressions of concern about the maintenance of adequate standards of health and safety for the public, we welcome these proposals.

11.9 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): We have a successful and innovative pharmaceutical industry. To the extent that these proposals will enable and facilitate the development and marketing of products in the Community, they are very much to be welcomed.

I am worried, however, that in the earlier memorandum, dated 3 October, among the items which the Department described as "Controversial Elements" was

"(e) The security of commercially confidential information."

This is clearly an important matter. Although, once established, a product may be protected by patent, information might have to be passed under these proposals before the patent application has gone through. We know from experience that there are some not too far away from these islands who are quite likely to steal information and use it. A product and enormously expensive research by British firms could be seriously undermined.

In the later memorandum, dated 8 May, we are simply told:

"We are satisfied with the progess of discussions in Brussels so far on all the features listed in" the previous memorandum. That seems a rather vague reference to this all-important matter of the security of commercially confidential information. I wonder whether, in winding up or later, my hon. Friend will assure me and the industry that the matter has been covered fully and that his officials are satisfied that the earlier reservations have been met.

Mr. Whitney: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate.

This has been a short but interesting and informative debate. I assure the House that any suggestion that British standards will be limited or degraded by these measures is unjustified. Our standards will unquestionably remain as high as they are at present. The arrangements for determining responsibility for how drugs may be marketed will also remain in force. Whatever arrangements might be proposed to remove remaining barriers to trade between member states by 1992, we shall insist on retaining the right to deal with medicine in a way which suits United Kingdom conditions if we consider such action to be necessary.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Could I have my hon. Friend's assurance that there is nothing in the directive——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. the hon. Gentleman has just walked into the Chamber. He has not heard anything of the Minister's speech or that of any other hon. Member. I hope that he is not trying to reopen matters that he could well have understood if he had been here at the beginning of the debate.

Mr. Whitney: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If my hon. Friend has any misgivings, no doubt we can exchange correspondence on the matter.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) asked about testing procedures in other countries and whether they are as high as in Britain. The UK licensing authority will continue to have the benefit of the expert independent committee, the Committee on Safety of Medicines, which will continue to examine critically all the scientific evidence to satisfy itself about the safety, quality and efficacy of products for which licences have been applied for.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) asked about commercial secrecy in consequence of applying the obligatory consultation procedure, in addition to the usual protection offered by the requirement imposed on the participants in relevant Community committees. There is also the additional protection that is offered in the fourth directive, with which I dealt in my opening speech, of the 10-year indirect protection for the original licence holder of scientific data needed to support an application. This would prevent someone who obtained confidential information about a product from using it to obtain marketing authorisation for a copy product.

We also had our own worries in the context of confidentiality about the reference to the use of "ad hoc groups of experts or highly qualified outside consultants."

However, when we explored this matter in discussions we found that it was a semantic difficulty and that what the Commission had in mind was no different from the existing CPMP and CVMP arrangements. Confidentiality continues to be of great importance, and I assure my hon. Friend that we shall watch the matter with extreme care.

Concern was expressed by the hon. Member for Wrexham about the Government's right to revoke licences. It would be unacceptable if the effect of any of these proposals were to delay the removal of what might be a public health hazard—for example, a medicine that was shown to have unacceptable side effects. The revised text that is now before us makes provision for emergency action, when necessary, without prior consultation. We are now fully satisfied with the arrangements.

I have covered most of the main points. In particular, I hope that I have covered the points raised in the, as always, impressive contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). If I have not covered all her points, I shall seek to do so in correspondence.

The hon. Member for Wrexham quite properly ended his remarks by asking whether these measures will increase public confidence and encourage research and development and whether they will make a beneficial contribution to reducing the use of animals in testing and promoting greater interchange in the pharmaceutical industry within the European Community. I give the House an unqualified assurance on all those points.

These are sensible measures. They will help in the creation of a common market within the European Community, at the same time maintaining standards in the crucial areas of pharmaceutical and veterinary products. Therefore, I commend the documents to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9630/84 and 5752/86, proposals for draft Directives and a Recommendation, and Amendments to the proposals, on the marketing and testing of medicinal products, and of the supplementary explanatory memorandum from the Department of Health and Social Security dated 8th May 1986; endorses the aim of strengthening biotechnology in respect of medicinal products within the Community; and welcomes continued progress towards removing the remaining barriers to trade between member States, whilst fully protecting public health.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 19th June, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business), if proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr. Secretary King relating to the draft Northern Ireland Assembly (Dissolution) Order 1986 and the draft Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order 1986 have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Eight o'clock put forthwith the Questions thereon. [Mr. Neubert.]

"The Observer"

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. [Mr. Neubert.]

11.17 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this evening the subject of the appointment and role of the independent directors of The Observer newspaper.

On 9 July 1981, my right hon. Friend the Lord Privy Seal, who was then Secretary of State for Trade, gave his consent under section 58 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 to the transfer of The Observer newspaper from the Atlantic Richfield Company to George Outram and Co. Ltd., a subsidiary of Lonrho plc. He had received an application for his consent on 27 March 1981 and, as required by section 59 of the Act, he had referred the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for investigation and report. By a majority of seven to one the Commission decided to recommend that Lonrho be permitted to acquire The Observer, subject to certain conditions. The dissenting member, Dr. R. L. Marshall, concluded that:

"In particular the crucial relationship between editor and chief officer is too close, subtle and continuous to be subject to control by third parties, or amenable to effective mediation by them in circumstances where the trust and mutual forbearance on which their relationship is ultimately based has broken down under the strain of a legitimate clash of interest. Accordingly I do not believe that the proposed safeguards would be effective."

I believe that Dr. Marshall was right and that the safeguards have been ineffective. The safeguards were that five independent directors should be appointed to the board of The Observer and that the articles of association of The Observer should be altered in certain respects.

Among others, there were to be requirements that the editor of The Observer should retain control over all content of the newspaper and over any political comment published in it, and should not be subject to any restraint or inhibition in expressing opinion or in reporting news that might directly or indirectly conflict with the opinion or interest of any of the newspapers proprietors of The Observer. Any dispute concerning these or certain other matters between the editor of The Observer, the directors of The Observer Ltd. or the directors of its holding company was to be referred to the independent directors, and their decision was to be final and binding.

I believe that subsequent events have shown these conditions to be inadequate in two respects. First, while they envisaged a situation in which the editor might be restrained from reporting news which conflicted with the proprietor's commercial interest, they did not envisage a situation in which the editor might be encouraged to report news which furthered the proprietor's commercial interest. Secondly, the independent directors were given a positive role only in the event of a dispute between the editor and the directors. But if the editor and the directors, or a director, were acting in collusion, no positive role was specifically given to the directors.

It appears that the independent directors have, in effect, regarded these conditions as the terms of reference of their appointment and have chosen to interpret them narrowly. It is true that they meet together regularly as a group. It is true also that they meet the editor and the staff regularly independently of the other directors. I believe, however, that they go along to hear what the editor and the staff have to say rather than to raise issues with them. I suspect that this is because they see their role as one of protecting the editor and his staff from the proprietor. They feel constrained by their terms of reference and are inclined to overlook the fact that they also have all the responsibilities of any company director. If they were to interpret their role in a less restrictive fashion, they would perhaps see that it is not their job to protect the editor regardless of his quality, and that it is their job to take a more active interest in the editorial policy of the paper and in the commercial aspects of the business. They should be as aware as any other director of their ultimate responsibility to the shareholders of Lonrho and wary of the possibility that the proprietor might be more interested in using The Observer to further his particular interests than in making a commercial success of it.

I have two examples to support my case. The first occurred in April 1984 when, following a visit to Zimbabwe, the editor wrote a story about Zimbabwe security force atrocities in Matabeleland. The chief executive of Lonrho, Mr. Tiny Rowland, subsequently wrote the Prime Minister of Zimbabwe, Mr. Robert Mugabe, a letter of apology. He said that his editor had been discourteous, disingenuous and wrong. His story was not substantiated and not based upon any research.

As there was a clear dispute between the editor and at least one director, the independent directors were able to intervene. They concluded that Mr. Rowland's criticisms constituted an inhibition, if not a restraint, on the editor's freedom and improper proprietorial interference in the accurate presentation of news and free expression of opinion. Mr. Rowland's response to this was to reduce the fees of the independent directors from £4,000 to £1,000. He described them as "troglodytes" and said that they had served no useful purpose.

The second example is current and concerns the House of Fraser plc. I think that it is well known that for many years Lonrho had hoped to acquire this company. In November 1984, Mr. Rowland agreed to sell Lonrho's 29·9 per cent. shareholding in the company to Al Fayed Investment and Trust (UK) Ltd., a company owned by the Fayed brothers. This enabled them, in March 1985, to launch a successful bid for the company.

Since then, The Observer has run a succession of stories to the effect that the Sultan of Brunei financed the Fraser purchase. The most recent appeared on 18 May. It claimed that powerful new evidence had emerged that Mark Thatcher visited Brunei with Mohammed Fayed at a crucial time in the Harrods takeover battle. It said that The Observer was in possession of a certificate signed by the former permanent secretary in the Ministry of Home Affairs in Brunei confirming the visit.

The story alleged that the two men flew in Fayed's private jet on 24 October 1984 and left two days later. It said that that was just a week before the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report into Lonrho's bid to buy the House of Fraser was delayed for three months. According to the story, the Egyptian Fayed brothers used that time to acquire the group with the help of the sultan's millions. The story was written by a staff reporter.

In relation to a previous story in January, also written by a staff reporter, the UK Press Gazette commented that it had been written or "pulled together" by the editor himself. It said:

"Why him? Because it came to the paper through the proprietor, 'Tiny' Rowland, a fierce business rival of Fayed's."

The story on 18 May made a number of other claims. I believe it to be largely a fabrication. I believe the certificate to be a forgery. I have seen a statement signed by the permanent secretary in the Ministry of Home Affairs on 2 June in which he declares that the certificate is an outrageous forgery and that "it is an absolute lie to suggest that I am the author of that document."

Can it be just a coincidence that it is The Observer, owned by Lonrho, which has been running this series of stories and that other newspapers have hardly touched it? Perhaps it is. Writing in The Sunday Times of 11 August last year, Ivan Fallon reported that most Fleet Street newspapers, including The Sunday Times, had investigated the allegations without finding any link between the vast wealth of the sultan and the Harrods takeover. The Mail on Sunday of the same date went further and claimed that a letter purporting to be from the sultan to Mohammed Al Fayed and on which a story in The Observer of 28 July had been based was a forgery. I am convinced that it is not a coincidence that The Observer has been running such stories. I am satisfied that they are largely untrue.

The matters were inquired into by the Director General of Fair Trading last year. Mr. Rowland claimed that he had evidence to support those assertions, but, in response to a request from the Director General, he declined to make it available. Nevertheless, the Director General inquired into the assertions. He was given information which satisfied him that none of the assertions was well-founded.

I am sorry that, in those circumstances, the directors of The Observer are either unable or unwilling to prevent Mr. Rowland from pursuing his personal vendetta against the Fayed brothers. It seems to me that, in circumstances in which such claims are made, the independent directors of The Observer in particular ought to be able to intervene. They feel unable to do so, however, on the ground that there is no dispute between the proprietor and the editor. On a strict interpretation of their terms of reference, they may well be right. That is why I believe those terms of reference to be defective.

In a recent article in the Spectator, Paul Johnson drew attention to the fact that The Observer is also subject to censorship by the unions. He reported that the print unions had recently told the editor that he must not print a review in the paper's literary section by Bernard Levin. Levin has a freelance contract with the The Times and writes passionately in support of individual freedom and democracy in the unions.

The editor decided not to publish the Levin review. Readers of The Observer were given no indication that they were buying a union-censored newspaper. Mr. Johnson argued that the danger in such cases is not only that a weak editor submits to blackmail—in this case he had been given an ultimatum "Put in Levin and you will not have a paper"—but that he almost unconsciously begins to do what he thinks the bully boys want him to do, without their even having to ask.

An even more serious danger for The Observer, Mr. Johnson continued, was that its proprietor, seeing the way things were going, would take advantage of editorial weakness. He said that a man such as Rowland does not mind the unions getting their way on the bits of the paper which concern them, so long as he too gets his way on the bits of the paper which concern him. But between the pair of them, there is not much left of the newspaper's old independent voice. Perhaps it would be fairer to readers to print under the newspaper's masthead the slogan "Owned by Lonrho and censored by the unions".

Union censorship should, of course, be the concern of all the directors, but perhaps here, too, the independent directors feel unable to intervene because there is no dispute between the proprietors and the editor. My conclusion is that they should approach their task in a more positive and less circumspect manner. However, if they genuinely feel constrained by their terms of reference, those terms should be extended so that it becomes clear beyond doubt that, in the context of The Observer, it is their responsibility to defend and uphold the freedom of the press.

I put it to my hon. Friend the Minister that these matters should now be examined as part of the Government's review of competition policy. Sections 57 to 62 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 deal with newspaper merger references. Consideration might be given to the possibility of allowing the Secretary of State to impose conditions going beyond those recommended by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. More importantly, consideration should be given to the kind of conditions attaching to a consent to the transfer of a newspaper that would prove effective in practice. Mr. Rowland has made a laughing stock of the existing policy, and the review of competition policy is therefore most timely.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) for drawing attention to this topic. I shall begin by explaining the role and responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in this matter, which is very limited. I shall then go on to refer briefly to some of the specific criticisms that my hon. Friend has raised.

My right hon. Friend has a role in the transfer of ownership of newspapers because of his responsibilities under the Fair Trading Act 1973. This legislation contains special provisions relating to newspaper mergers. These differ from those applying to the generality of mergers. These provisions spring from the 1962 report of the Royal Commission on the press. This concluded that action should be taken to regulate the increasing concentration of newspaper ownership, which could threaten the freedom and variety of expression of opinion, and which might, in extreme circumstances, threaten the unbiased presentation of news.

The Act provides that the transfer of a newspaper to someone who already owns newspapers requires the Secretary of State's consent. Consent is required if the combined paid-for circulation of those papers is 500,000 or more, or if the transfer increases the combined paid-for circulation above 500,000. A transfer without the Secretary of State's consent when consent is required is void and unlawful. It is also a criminal offence.

Except in closely defined circumstances, my right hon. Friend must refer any application for consent for a transfer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for investigation and report. In making its investigation and report, the commission considers whether the transfer would be expected to operate against the public interest, taking into account all matters which appear in the circumstances to be relevant and, in particular, the need for accurate presentation of news and free expression of opinion.

In considering whether to give his consent, the Secretary of State must have regard to the report of the commission, but he is not bound to follow it. He may give unconditional consent to the transfer, or he may impose conditions.

I turn now to the application of these arrangements to the case of The Observer. In 1981, The Observer was owned by the Atlantic Richfield Company. Lonhro plc applied to my right hon. Friend's predecessor for consent to the proposed transfer of The Observer to its wholly owned subsidiary, George Outram and Co. Ltd. That subsidiary already owned newspapers – the Glasgow Herald and the Glasgow Evening Times. Another Lonhro subsidiary, Scottish and Universal Newspapers Ltd. was then publishing 23 local weekly and bi-weekly newspapers in Scotland.

None of the closely defined exceptions permitting the Secretary of State's consent without a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission applied in this case. These exceptions have to do with the economic viability of newspapers as going concerns and urgency. The matter was referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for investigation. The commission's report, published in June 1981, concluded that, if the transfer were made subject to conditions described in the report, it might be expected not to operate against the public interest. The commission recommended that consent to the proposed transfer should not be given unless those conditions, designed to safeguard editorial independence, were attached to it.

The commission's role in newspaper mergers is purely advisory. As I have said, it is for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to give, or to withhold, consent to a transfer and to impose whatever conditions he — and I stress he — thinks fit. In the case of The Observer he accepted in principle the commission's recommendations. But he thought it right, before he finalised his conditions, to give interested parties an opportunity to comment. He was particularly concerned that the conditions which were to be imposed should be no more than the minimum necessary to safeguard editorial independence, and to permit the running of The Observer with the smallest degree of interference from outside authorities.

In the event, the conditions that my right hon. Friend's predecessor decided to impose following these consultations with interested parties differ from those suggested by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The purpose of the conditions actually imposed was to secure the independent position of the editor in determining the content of the newspaper. This was achieved by requiring amendments to the articles of association of Observer Ltd., the company which is the direct owner of the newspaper. The articles were further required to provide that the editor should not be subject to restraint in expressing opinion or reporting news that might conflict with the opinion or interest of the proprietor. His control over the journalistic staff of the newspaper would be set out. The articles would, in addition, provide for five independent directors, who would have the special responsibility for resolving any disputes on matters of editorial independence between the editor and the directors of Observer Ltd. or its parent companies, including Lonrho. The consent of the majority of these directors would also be required for the appointment or dismissal of the editor and of any of the independent directors themselves.

Other conditions ensured that these arrangements should continue if The Observer were to be transferred within the Lonrho group as the result of a company reorganisation, and provided for consultation with the board of Observer Ltd., if Lonrho proposed to dispose of The Observer outside the group at a future date. These articles of association may not be altered in any way affecting the requirements as to editorial independence without the consent of the Secretary of State.

As I have said, the object of these conditions was to ensure that the editorial independence of a newspaper—an important and distinguished national newspaper—such as The Observer, was safeguarded against any danger of undue influence from its proprietor. The conditions were also intended—and I make no bones about this—to ensure that the policing of this editorial independence was removed from the political arena. This was clear from the statement made in the House on 9 July 1981 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire North, (Mr. Biffen), now the Leader of the House. I think that it would be quite wrong—and I have little doubt that this would be widely supported on both sides of the House—that Ministers should interfere in day-to-day matters affecting the editorial policy of great national newspapers. I have little doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield, as well as hon. Members on both sides of the House would be the first to complain if Ministers started interfering in these matters. If Ministers started interfering they would no doubt do so in the name of editorial freedom. But there is a narrow line between that and ensuring or preventing the publication of views or facts of which they approve or disapprove.

Against that background, the role of my right hon. Friend, as I said earlier, is limited. He has a role to play if the conditions to the consent are broken—but only if they are broken. The conditions, as I have said, required the articles of association to be altered in certain ways. The articles were amended in those ways. I am aware of no evidence which suggests that the articles had been further amended without my right hon. Friend's consent in circumstances when such consent was required. Nor have I any evidence that The Observer has been transferred to another member of the Lonrho group without my right hon. Friend's consent.

It is only these matters which amount to a breach of the consent. Within the framework created by the amended articles of association, the operation of the arrangements directed at editorial independence is a matter for the independent directors, and not one for my right hon. Friend. It is up to the independent directors to agree to any dismissal or appointment of an editor. Any dispute between the editor and the proprietor is to be referred to them. The way in which they discharge these responsibilities is a matter for them and not for my right hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield has described a series of stories in The Observer about Lonrho's attempted takeover of the House of Fraser and the eventual takeover of that company by the Al Fayed brothers. He has described the accounts given in that newspaper about the alleged role in those matters of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, members of her family, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and others. I need say only that my right hon. Friends have made it clear that the allegations in The Observer that they behaved improperly are unfounded. Others who are mentioned in these stories may wish to take legal advice about the remedies open to them in the courts. That is a matter for them and not for me.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield has suggested that the appearance of these stories in The Observer means that the editor has taken instructions from the proprietor on editorial matters. He suggests that this shows that the arrangements for editorial independence established by the consent given in 1981 are inadequate. He says that the independent directors can intervene only when a matter is referred to them; and that they cannot volunteer their good offices. He says that this is a weakness. He says that the proprietor is letting the paper lose money; and that the independent directors should play a more active role in the development of the paper's commercial policy.

These are all matters for the independent directors, not for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. In order for an editorial dispute to be referred to the independent directors, there has to be a dispute: and either the editor or the proprietor must acknowledge the existence of such a dispute and refer it. If one or other of them does not do so—and I say if, because I do not know whether in any particular set of circumstances one or the other has not acknowledged the existence of a dispute—that is his decision and not mine. Any set of arrangements of this kind will depend for its effectiveness on the readiness of the individuals governed by it to make use of it. There is nothing that I or my right hon. Friend can or should do to oblige them to make use of it, if and I repeat if, they choose not to do so.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no power to change these arrangements. His consent was applied for under the Fair Trading Act five years ago and was duly given. The matter has been dealt with and was discussed in the House at the time. My right hon. Friend has no powers to reopen the matter or to refer it at this stage to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The transfer has taken place. The conditions are being complied with. I have no evidence that they have been broken.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield expresses the hope that in a future case of this kind, tougher arrangements will be made to ensure editorial independence. I do not accept that the existing arrangements are inadequate. He will understand that I will not be tempted into committing my right hon. Friend's attitude on a future occasion.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Pattie: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why will not the Minister answer questions on this matter?

Mr. Pattie: I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield that in any future case where editorial independence is a vital element in our decision, we will ensure that appropriate arrangements are made to balance that consideration against the need for the newspaper concerned to flourish profitably.

11.42 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I rise only briefly to intervene, although there are five minutes left in which to debate this issue.

I condemn the action of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) in raising this debate. The only reason for it is that an attempt is being made by Conservative Back Benchers and Government Ministers to silence The Observer over the whole question of the takeover of Harrods by the Al Fayed brothers.

During the past four months, The Observer has repeatedly levelled accusations, yet none of them has been answered. Letters have been sent to the Prime Minister by The Observer and also by Mr. Rowland. Despite what the Minister said, there have also been repeated references in other organs of the press. The Prime Minister has refused to answer. The Order Paper is effectively blocked. Questions are being asked about the role of Sir Gordon Borrie, the Director General of Fair Trading, as to why he was willing to give permission for the takeover. He was in a crucial position, because he read the submission by Kleinwort Benson.

Much controversy surrounds the nature of the statements that the company has made on the matter. The House tonight is seeing a disgraceful attempt to shackle The Observer in a legitimate campaign that it is carrying out. If The Observer is wrong, Ministers should answer the questions. If there is a full and complete statement from the Dispatch Box by the Government on all the circumstances surrounding the takeover of Harrods, the whole matter can be brought to an end. But until that statement is made, The Observer will legitimately raise questions of public concern and hon. Members are entitled to persist in asking questions orally on the Floor of the House because the Order Paper is effectively blocked on this important matter.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes to Twelve o'clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS

COUNTY OF SOUTH GLAMORGAN (TAFF CROSSING) BILL

Ordered,

That the Committee on the County of South Glamorgan (Taff Crossing) Bill have leave to visit and inspect the site of the proposed works, provided that no evidence shall be taken in the course of such visit and that any party who has made an Appearance before the Committee be permitted to attend by his Counsel, Agent or other representative. — [The Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Small Firms

1. Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about his Department's latest plans for reducing the burdens on small firms.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): My Department's plans, together with those of other Departments, for reducing burdens on both small and large firms are outlined in the recently published White Paper "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers". I have to date received no representations arising from the White Paper.

Mr. Bright: Is my hon. Friend happy that there is adequate liaison between his and other Departments of State, in particular the Department of Employment, which inherited the small firms unit? Is there still the will and momentum to rid small businesses in particular of petty burdens, which is probably the most significant factor nowadays deterring people from going into business?

Mr. Morrison: I can assure my hon. Friend that there certainly is the will and commitment to continue with a deregulation policy. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and I were, as my hon. Friend will appreciate, originally in the Department of Employment, so on that level there is good liaison. In addition, three Cabinet Ministers—my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Secretary of State for Employment and my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General — are involved in the deregulation process.

Mr. MacKenzie: Is the Minister aware that one of the biggest problems faced by small firms in Britain is that of cash flow? It would be of great practical assistance to them if he could lift the four-month moratorium on the payment of regional development grants and other forms of financial assistance to small firms.

Mr. Morrison: I hear what the right hon. Gentleman says about the moratorium, but he will appreciate that the regional development grant scheme is demand led. However, I shall look at the point that he has made.

Mr. John Browne: Does my hon. Friend accept that the greatest disincentive to the creation of small businesses, as shown in recent studies, is not a lack of capital, or indeed a lack of markets, but the administrative burdens placed on smaller businesses? Does he further accept that the Government have done a great deal in that respect already, but much still needs to be done? Will he look earnestly at and accept the recommendations of the Conservative Back-Bench small business committee?

Mr. Morrison: I agree that administrative burdens are one of the disincentives to setting up new businesses, but the other significant point is the attitude towards small businesses. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has changed that attitude and there is definitely a feeling that small businesses should be encouraged and persuaded to set up and to prevail and prosper. I hope that it goes without saying that we listen carefully to any proposals put by my hon. Friend and his colleagues on the small business committee.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Minister aware that the new Data Protection Act 1984 has placed considerable burdens on small firms, especially those seeking to use the new technologies to make themselves more efficient? Has his Department made any recommendations to the Home Office on how those burdens might be reduced or simplified in favour of small firms?

Mr. Morrison: I am aware of the concern that the hon. Gentleman has raised, but, as he will appreciate, we must conform with what our European colleagues have agreed. However, the matter is kept under review.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: As my hon. Friend will not reach Question 26 on the Order Paper this afternoon on precisely this subject, may I ask him whether he plans to make any changes in the accountancy rules for small businesses?

Mr. Morrison: My hon. Friend is a pessimist in these matters. I hope we can progress speedily and that we shall reach Question 26. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has direct responsibility for these matters and I expect that he will make an announcement in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Eastham: When, in due course, the Minister considers these matters, will he also consider the matter of selective assistance in cases where grants are not mandatory? Some firms fill in forms for civil servants, wait about six or seven months and then find that they do not qualify for grants. Is it not about time that we did something about this?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman raises a perfectly fair point. He probably realises, just as the House realises, that a review of regional grants and regional selective assistance is currently taking place. We are certainly looking at the precise point that he has mentioned. By and large, I receive many more plaudits than criticisms. Of course, there may be the odd reason for criticism. As I say, we receive mainly plaudits because the officials in my Department and in the regional offices are generally speaking, considered by all and sundry who apply for grants to be efficient and helpful in the processing of the necessary forms.

Mr. Thurnham: May I ask question No. 24? I hope that we shall reach question No. 24. May I ask my hon. Friend to have a word with his right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General about the provisions of the Latent Damages Bill which require firms to keep records for 15 years? Does my hon. Friend not agree that that is an excessive period for small engineering and other firms?

Mr. Morrison: I am hopeful that we shall reach question No. 24. My hon. Friend asked about the Latent Damages Bill. I do not pretend to be expert on that, but of course I shall raise the matter with my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, and no doubt he and my hon. Friend could discuss the matter further.

Mr. John Smith: In expressing our understanding of the very sad reason why the Secretary of State is not able to be with us today, may I ask the hon. Gentleman to express to the Secretary of State and his family our very deep sympathy and condolences?

Mr. Morrison: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he said, and I shall certainly pass on his message.

Postal Services

2. Mr. Peter Brunivels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to end the Post Office's monopoly for the handling and delivering of mail.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): No, Sir, but I remind my hon. Friend that there is already free competition for the collection and delivery of all mail, except inland letters charged at less than £1.

Mr. Bruinvels: Although the Post Office has become more efficient and more profitable, surely my hon. Friend will accept that its suggestion to increase the postage rates by another penny when it cannot deliver more than 87·6 per cent. of post the next day is not exactly good news? Should not alternative services be offered? Is that not what the Conservative Government believe in?

Mr. Pattie: The first point I make to my hon. Friend is that the chairman of the Post Office has given preliminary notice to the chairman of the Post Office Users' National Council that he is considering a rise of 1p for first and second-class mail. It is worth reminding the House that after inflation is taken into account, the first-class tariff is now about 13 per cent. lower than it was in 1981 and the second-class tariff is 26 per cent. lower. When one sets that against the quite considerable efficiency that the Post Office achieves, it shows that the Post Office does not have a bad record.

Mr. Key: My constituents reckon that the service is between 13 and 26 per cent. worse than it was some years ago. Although the expensive advertising campaign of the Post Office seeks to persuade us that inter-city postal services are very good, postal services in rural areas such as south Wiltshire have declined considerably. That is just not good enough.

Mr. Pattie: Although I sympathise with my hon. Friend's point, I have to say that everybody tends to be aware of postal letters or packets that do not arrive and to take completely for granted the letters that do arrive and which form the vast proportion of the mail. I am sure that the chairman of the Post Office will avidly read this exchange in Hansard and will note my hon. Friend's remarks.

Computer Research

3. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the new round of funding for computer research, ESPRIT II, proposed at the recent European Economic Community in Luxembourg.

Mr. Pattie: We have not yet received formal and detailed proposals for ESPRIT II, but we have made clear, in the Research Council, our strong support for programmes like ESPRIT which promote the competitiveness of European industry.

Mr. Wainwright: How do the Government propose to recover the ground on computer research and development which has already been lost to Japan and the United States? They will be unable to do so as long as they continue to spread thinly the relatively modest resources that they have put aside covering projects such as EUREKA, RACE, Alvey I and possibly Alvey II as well as ESPRIT. Would it not be much better to concentrate on the one scheme that is Communitywide and that would put the resources of Italy, Benelux, Spain, Denmark, and so on behind us?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman's question indicates, dare I say, a lack of depth on this matter. Those projects are not alternatives. There is no point in suggesting that we should concentrate entirely on a European programme if we do not at the same time maintain a reasonable national capability to complement that European activity.

Mr. Dalyell: I agree that there should be some depth in these matters, ! ut have the Government reached any judgment about the effect on the ESPRIT programme of British and European participation in the strategic defence initiative programme?

Mr. Pattie: The short answer is no. The time scales involved are rather different. Participation in SDI envisages participation in various technology programmes which look at much longer-term requirements than the ESPRIT II or even ESPRIT I programme would involve.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Will the Minister confirm that he is resisting Treasury pressure to treat every departmental contribution to European programmes as alternative funding that therefore involves a cut in national funds? The hon. Gentleman says that we must have a reasonable level of nationally-funded operations, but does he realise that unless we have very full funding for our national programmes we shall not be able to participate effectively in the European programmes? Will he therefore give an assurance that our contribution to Europe will not be made at the expense of United Kingdom programmes, and at the expense, in particular, of Alvey II?

Mr. Pattie: I am happy to confirm that. As I said in response to the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), we are not talking about alternative or substitutional activities. It is important to put that on the record.

Ferguson Ailsa

4. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he is now considering for the Troon yard of Ferguson Ailsa.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We have accepted British Shipbuilders' decision that the operations at the Troon yard of Ferguson Ailsa should cease once the present order book is complete. I understand that British Shipbuilders is now seeking potential buyers.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Minister aware that when the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), the Secretary of State for Defence, recently visited the Ailsa yard at Troon he made two specific promises: that the Government would examine what orders, and particularly Ministry of Defence orders, might be brought forward; and that the Government would consider the report of the consultants Planning Industrial and Economic Development Advisers and the possibilities in it for the Troon yard? Will the Minister confirm that the right hon. Member for Ayr was speaking on behalf of the Government when he made those two pledges? When will we have a report on the result of those two promises? How will discussions now be undertaken with British Shipbuilders to ensure that it is aware of the implications of the right hon. Gentleman's promises?

Mr. Morrison: As the hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in this matter, he will appreciate that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence always speaks on behalf of the Government. The hon. Gentleman will also be aware that the remarks that I and my right hon. Friend made during the debate on shipbuilding were concurrent.

Mr. Lambie: Despite the Minister's original answer and British Shipbuilders' decision to close the Troon yard, if Ferguson Ailsa wins another order will the Minister lean heavily on British Shipbuilders to ensure that the order is built at the Troon yard so that both yards can be kept open?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman has attended our shipbuilding debates and he will appreciate that such decisions are for British Shipbuilders to make. It is for it to decide in which yards to place orders. However, I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Sayeed: Though the difficulties of Troon are similar to those of other yards that are owned by British Shipbuilders, there being twice as many modern ships as there are cargoes to fill them, is there not a case for ensuring that ships and cargo rates are not dumped on the market by countries outside the EEC which are subsidising their shipbuilding and freight rates to such a great degree that British Shipbuilders and British shipping companies cannot compete?

Mr. Morrison: The simple answer to my hon. Friend is yes. That is precisely what we are discussing at the Council of Ministers for a successor to the fifth directive.

Westland Helicopters

6. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what meetings his predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) had with officials on the morning of 24 January in relation to the Westlands affair; what was the purpose of the meetings; and what conclusions were reached as to the action his predecessor should take.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) held several meetings on the morning of 24 January. Some of these related to Westland, and some were attended by officials. His meetings on Westland were held to inform himself of latest developments.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it conceivable that civil servants of the quality and integrity of Sir Brian Hayes would have advised the then Secretary of State to remain in office if they had thought that the full story had been one of deception by their Secretary of State of their Prime Minister and of themselves for over a fortnight? Is it not clear from Linklater and Leigh in "Not with Honour" and from other information that the strands of the spider's web led to No. 10 Downing street? Is not the lawyer's letter the real reason why the House did not have Friday 6 June?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman will know that all questions relating to advice offered by an official to a Minister are confidential. Any matters that he cares to deduce from the book that he has mentioned or any other work is entirely a matter for him.

Mr. John Smith: Is the Minister aware that in the book to which my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) referred, while it is said that civil servants counselled the former Secretary of State, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), to stay, the politicians present, who presumably included the Minister, gave contrary advice? Was that contrary advice — namely, that the former Secretary of State should resign — coloured by their knowledge of the machinations which had gone on both in the Department of Trade and Industry and at Downing street over the discreditable Westland affair?

Mr. Pattie: As it happens, I was chairing a seminar in the lower parts of the Department at that time. Therefore, I am unable to speculate on any of the reasons that any of my colleagues might have had for the statements that they made.

Export Statistics

7. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the combined total value of United Kingdom exports for 1985 to China, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Pakistan, Romania, Saudi Arabia and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): United Kingdom exports to these countries amounted to £2·7 billion in 1985.

Mr. Chapman: As these countries are just some of those which on any criteria cannot be called free and democratic, will my hon. Friend confirm that Britain does much trading with undemocratic countries and countries with oppressive regimes? In considering the morality of trading with South Africa, should not the Government in all consistency examine their trading policies with at least some other evil and undemocratic countries?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend raises an interesting point. Censorship, judicial execution—in many places in public —and imprisonment without trial are all characteristics of the countries that he mentions and a number that he does not. Were these elements to be a bar to normal trading relations, our trade would be even more circumscribed than it looks like being at the present, but such judgments are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Madden: Has the Minister any information that the Government of Saudi Arabia are seeking to restrict travel by British citizens to Saudi Arabia to two airlines, British Caledonian and Saudia?

Mr. Clark: I have no such information, but I suggest that the hon. Gentleman addresses his queston to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport on the next appropriate occasion.

Mr. Alexander: Did my hon. Friend see the reported comment this week by Mr. Jing Shupeng of the China International Trust and Investment Corporation Ltd. that British businesses were losing out because they were too expensive? Does that not underline the Government's concern that our businesses have far too heavy overheads and are still not really competitive in world markets?

Mr. Clark: There are a number of things that can contribute to a non-competitive cost in a business tender. Certainly Her Majesty's Government are doing their best to compensate for that by the soft loan facility which offers finance to projects in China at an extremely high level of subsidy.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Minister aware that British high-tech trade to the Eastern bloc countries since the late 1970s has halved to £40 million and, at the same time, the United States high-tech trade to Eastern bloc countries has increased eight times since 1981, to $2 billion and is forecast to double again next year? When will the Government stand up to attempts by the United States to control British high-tech trade by using United States law in Britain, since it is now clearly being used to advantage the United States and disadvantage the United Kingdom high-tech industry?

Mr. Clark: There is a great deal in what the hon. Gentleman says and I regret this state of affairs very deeply. Her Majesty's Government are always ready to protect those firms which wish to resist——

Mr. Ashdown: Wet.

Mr. Clark: It is not that. I cannot put it in any stronger language. Her Majesty's Government are always ready to resist claims of extra-territoriality on the part of the United States, but in each case it has to be left to the commercial judgment of the firm concerned. If it is the firm's judgment that by so doing its status in relation to its primary supplier will be altered and damage its commercial prospects, who are we to override that?

Mr. Thurnham: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is best for individual traders to decide with whom they would like to trade rather than for Governments to attempt to impose sanctions?

Mr. Clark: Indeed, I welcome that. If traders make that choice and ask for our protection they will have it.

Oil Prices (Economic Effects)

8. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his most recent assessment of the impact of lower oil prices on the manufacturing and exporting base of the United Kingdom economy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Lower oil prices will benefit United Kingdom manufacturing and non-oil exports. They will provide the non-oil sector with a great opportunity to build on the substantial gains of the past five years and to expand output further.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Minister for that reply. However, does he agree that his Department must remain concerned about the effect that that will have specifically on the oil sector and the oil-related sector? Will he give his Department's view of the fact that the Chancellor based his entire Budget strategy on an average oil price levelling out this year at about $15 a barrel, but that the Scottish Development Agency has carried out a computer projection which has shown that if even that price is attained and persists it will lead to a 40 per cent. cut in spending by oil companies, with all the attendant catastrophic effects which that will have on the Scottish economy? What action does he propose to take?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman asked a direct question as to whether I still agree with the analysis in the Chancellor's Budget statement in terms of manufacturing output being at around a 3 per cent. increase this year. The answer is yes. I would expect the two to match each other. Therefore, I think that the Scottish economy can gain. The hon. Gentleman makes the point. For the oil sector there will be a compensation the other way round.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Does my hon. Friend agree that the competitive advantage of lower fuel oil costs will quickly be squandered if pay claims in manufacturing industry continue to be settled at levels above the rate of inflation?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend. Ultimately, the increase in better productivity—and to be fair we have had much better productivity during the past five years—is the key to an expanding manufacturing sector and the ability to gain or regain markets.

Mr. Williams: Does the Minister agree that it will be tragic for this country if, when the long-awaited upturn in world trade at last takes place as a result of the collapse in oil prices, we see yet another aspect of the Government's wanton destruction of manufacturing industry in their complete failure to invest oil revenue, so that we lack the breadth of industrial base to take advantage of the upturn? Do the Government not feel at all guilty over the fact that in the event of an upturn we shall be mere spectators and the new wealth and the new jobs will go to our competitors?

Mr. Morrison: The right hon. Gentleman is being his usual pessimistic self. He will recall that a Select Committee report in another place predicted gloom and doom in the event of a substantial drop in the price of oil, but no one could have anticipated that that drop would take place in such a short period. Nevertheless, the outlook for the manufacturing sector remains extremely good.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that our main competitors will also benefit from lower costs so it will not be so easy for us? Heavy engineering uses a great deal of energy. Will he impress on the Secretary of State for Energy that it is crucial that energy costs to industry in this country should fall by at least as much as for our competitors in other countries?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend that we live in an international market-place so we must ensure that our productivity gains are as good as, if not better than, those of our international competitors. I also agree that the cost of energy, especially for heavy users, is a key element in that productivity.

Mr. Wilson: Given the previous concentration of the oil industry in Scotland, is it not simplistic for the Minister to assume that any of the benefits of lower oil prices will extend to the Scottish economy in view of the spending cuts that have taken place? Will he consult the Scottish Development Agency for an assessment, and if it is shown that Scotland will suffer particularly adversely as a result of the fall in oil prices will the Government restore the cuts in regional aid that they made two years ago?

Mr. Morrison: I assure the hon. Gentleman that, with my responsibilities for regional policy, I keep closely alongside the Scottish Development Agency. He should be aware that at present the agency is looked upon eagerly and with some envy for its great success and ability to attract new industries to Scotland, and I congratulate it on that.

Unfair Trade Unit

9. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about his Department's new unfair trade unit.

17. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to take steps to improve the way in which complaints by British firms about unfair trading practices by foreign competitors within and without the European Community are dealt with by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 May I announced the formation of the unfair trade unit to co-ordinate work on complaints about all forms of unfair practices in international trade. I intend the new unit to enable the Department to respond more quickly to such complaints. The establishment of the unit does not represent any change in policy away from open international trade and towards protectionism.

Mr. Sumberg: While I welcome my hon. Friend's reply and the establishment of the new unit, which I believe will have a useful part to play, may I ask whether he is aware that many business men, and especially those in the paper industry in my constituency, feel that they are suffering as a result of unfair foreign trade practices but are not sure how to tackle the problem and to whom they should go for advice? What support can my hon. Friend offer business men in general and the paper industry in particular?

Mr. Clark: That is precisely the kind of instance for which the new unit has been set up. Unfair trading can arise from a number of sources—as a result of dumping, for which there are recognised procedures, as a result of subsidies, agency arrangemens in restraint, counterfeiting, and so on. If my hon. Friend's constituent will write to the Department the matter will be referred to the unit and he will receive immediate advice on appropriate steps to try to obtain redress.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my hon. Friend aware that many British firms are mystified as to what to do about unfair competition from abroad? Even Government Departments seem to be unaware of the facilities that can be offered by the unfair trade unit and its predecessor. They are not co-ordinated in Brussels, so often the reaction there to a complaint is indifferent and off-putting. Will my hon. Friend assure us that this unit will adopt a public identity that will counteract the previous tendencies of other Government Departments, and will he ensure that it gets all the resources that it needs?

Mr. Clark: Certainly that is my intention. I am grateful to all my hon. Friends for allowing me to publicise this in the Chamber. The anti-dumping unit was concerned only with the narrower question of dumping. The unfair trade unit has been expanded and is intended precisely to embrace all the different aspects of unfair trade that in many cases baffle business men. As my hon. Friend has said, they do not know how to start correcting them. I hope that all my hon. Friends and all Opposition Members will take note of the existence of the new unit and will encourage their constituents to refer cases to me so that I may pass them on to the unit for immediate investigation.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that one of the unfair trade practices that baffles the public is that which allows mountains of food and lakes of drink to accumulate when people are starving? Will this unit deal with that source of unfairness, or turn a blind eye to it?

Mr. Clark: The unit is concerned with imports.

Mr. Spencer: Is my hon. Friend aware of the reprehensible practice of some foreign companies of cross-subsidisation between subsidiaries to conceal the true cost of their products? A textile manufacturing firm in my constituency called Bentley Engineering has been hit particularly by this reprehensible practice.

Mr. Janner: It is in my constituency.

Mr. Spencer: Can my hon. Friend assure us that such activity will be within the purview of the unit?

Mr. Clark: Certainly it will be considered. Such activity is difficult to trace, for obvious reasons, but I should not want a case not to be referred to the unit simply because it seemed to be too difficult or elusive. I should be glad if my hon. and learned Friend would write to me about that.

Mr. Wainwright: Does the Minister agree that in order to extend the freedom of international trade it is essential to have strong defences against economic warfare conducted against us by contries where export trading is in the hands of the state? If so, can he reassure the House that his welcome unfair trade unit will not be handicapped and shackled by crude numerical reductions in the manpower of the Civil Service?

Mr. Clark: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall do my best to ensure that that does not happen. I do not see any sign of it.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my hon. Friend agree that for six years we have been promised that the country that indulges in more unfair trade practices than any other country on the face of the earth, Japan, would be dealt with? Does this mean that at long last those promises will become fact and that the Japanese will have to compete fairly rather than being allowed to destroy one high-tech industry after another when it does not suit them to have competition? Will they keep their word at long last?

Mr. Clark: Whether they keep their word is a matter for them. Certainly those who have doubts that they may should be fortified by the promulgation of the unit. Indeed, I expect that imports from Japan are likely to be among the first to feature in the programme. The two successful anti-dumping cases in the last year both related to Japanese products.

Japan

11. Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken to follow up the initiative of the Prime Minister at the Tokyo summit when she pressed the Japanese Prime Minister to remove the tax-duty discrimination faced by Scotch whisky bottled in Scotland.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are continuing to press strongly for the removal of Japanese discrimination in the tax and duty facing Scotch whisky and other imported alcoholic drinks. The European Community is to have further talks with the Japanese shortly, and we continue to take every opportunity to press the case bilaterally.

Mr. Pollock: Although I am encouraged by that reply, may I ask whether the Government made it clear to the Japanese authorities that their grading of liquor taxes represents a tax on quality, and therefore discriminates strongly and unfairly against this unique quality product from Scotland? Has it been pointed out to the Japanese that if we were to indulge in similar fiscal tactics against Japanese products, which are equally strong in their market sector, that might be a lesson which they would begin to understand?

Mr. Clark: I agree with my hon. Friend about the quality of Scotch whisky. The Japanese practice of grading alcoholic drinks is practically impossible to define in any sense which makes it possible to contest it. For example, Bourbon whisky is rated lower in duty terms than Scotch whisky, although the price is the same. My suspicion is that this relates more to political relations between Japan and the United States than to some abstruse factor in the grading.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the Minister give more information about the state of the welcome bilateral pressure to which he referred? Which of our European allies are being more helpful to the United Kingdom and the constituency needs of the hon. Member for Moray (Mr. Pollock), myself and others north of the border, and which are being less helpful in regard to this disgraceful exhibition of protectionism and disincentive against a United Kingdom export to Japan?

Mr. Clark: While the Community is putting together a case to take to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, it would be invidious of me to differentiate between those which are in favour and those which have reservations. The House knows that, regrettably, we are to some extent circumscribed in the multilateral trading system by being a signatory of the treaty of Rome and by the GATT. In the last resort, when those inhibitions continue to restrict action and abuse continues without adequate control or compensation, and if we cannot get the support of our Community partners in a European initiative, we would certainly have to consider unilateral action.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend will be aware that there are many products that can be described as quality products and that they can be manufactured anywhere, but that Scotch whisky is unique and can be manufactured only in Scotland. It is the product of Scotland and is regarded by the Scots as their flag bearer, as 90 per cent. of the product is exported. If the Japanese are allowed to get away with the practices in which they have indulged recently, others might decide to follow, and that could be very damaging for the Scottish industry.

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is right. Discrimination also exists in Korea and we are doing our best to correct that. When, two weeks ago, I was in Korea, I had talks on this subject. My hon. Friend will be glad to hear that I found the Koreans more receptive to our view than the Japanese have so far managed to be.

Mr. John Smith: The Minister told us a little while ago that his judgment is that the Japanese are exercising political discrimination in favour of the United States in respect of Bourbon whisky and, presumably, political discrimination against the United Kingdom in respect of Scotch whisky. Will he tell us what political action the Government intend to take?

Mr. Clark: I should have thought that there was very little that we could do, short of increasing our gross national product to approximately the same level as that of the United States. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows perfectly well that there is a special relationship, if one can use that phrase without being discourteous, between Japan and the United States, and I believe that the arrangement is in recognition of that. If we had the clout, I do not doubt that the Japanese would accede immediately. The fact is, however, that there is no comparison between the leverage which the United States can exert on Japan and that which we can exert.

Manufacturing Industry

12. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the most recent figure for output in manufacting industry; and how this compares with the figure for the same month six years ago.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Manufacturing output in April 1986 is estimated at 104·4 based on the 1980 average of 100. This is 1 per cent. higher than in April 1980.

Mr. Knox: Is my hon. Friend not concerned that manufacturing output has not only fallen over the last six years but that it is substantially lower than it was in 1973? Is he aware that 1973 was 13 years ago, and can he think of any comparable period since the industrial revolution when manufacturing output in this country fell?

Mr. Morrison: I am aware that manufacturing output fell between 1973 and 1979 by 4 per cent. — the five years of the last Labour Administration. However, in the last five years, output has increased by 11 per cent.

Mr. James Hamilton: Contrary to what the Minister has said, according to the CBI there has been a dramatic fall in manufacturing output, and without a booming manufacturing industry other jobs fall by the wayside. Will the Minister re-phrase his answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) and give the exact figure?

Mr. Morrison: I am quite happy to give the exact figure. Manufacturing output continued to fall from 1979 to 1981, which means that the current level is below the 1979 level. I am concerned. However, during the last five years, output has increased by 11 per cent.

Mr. Grylls: Does my hon. Friend agree that the problems of manufacturing industry in the late 1970s and early 1980s were almost directly the result of the hyper-inflation from which this country was suffering? Surely the best help for manufacturing is to get ourselves competitive and to keep inflation down to the level that this Government have achieved.

Mr. Morrison: I certainly agree with what my hon. Friend has said, but one could add several other elements. Perhaps it had something to do with very low productivity and the fact that strikes were very much to the fore during that period. That has a lot to do with output going down. Equally, now that the strike record is a lot better, it has a lot to do with output going up in a very satisfactory way.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister not agree that the position in the last seven years has been the worst in British history since records began? Does his concern take him so far as to analyse the position in competing countries? If so, does he not accept that Britain's record is far worse than that of our competitors and that the competitors who have fared very well indeed have been those whose Governments have taken an entirely different approach from that adopted by the present United Kingdom Administration? Does he not think that there are lessons to learn from our competitors?

Mr. Morrison: As the hon. Gentleman will have heard in an answer to a previous question, I am always concerned about our relative position in the international market place. I agree that we must look very carefully indeed at our Japanese, German and United States competitors and, where we can, learn lessons. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will also note that since 1980 we have had a 30 per cent. increase in output per head. That is a very satisfactory base on which to build.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that the figures he has just quoted might be even better if there were a little more sympathy and compatibility between VAT deadlines and actual trade credit? Will he have a word with industry and his right hon. and hon. Friends at the Treasury to see whether they can improve cash flow in business?

Mr. Morrison: As my hon. Friend would expect, I am always concerned to convey to my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Treasury particular aspects that bear directly on how they are able to operate in industry, and I shall certainly take his comments on board.

Mr. Williams: Does the Minister recollect that world trade in manufactures has increased by more than 17 per cent. since this Gove nment came to office? Will he now give us the figure which until now he has so coyly avoided? How much lower is manufacturing output today than it was in 1979?

Mr. Morrison: I am not avooiding it. In fact, I had not been asked that question until the right hon. Gentleman put it to me. There has been a fall of 6 per cent. since 1979. I know that the right hon. Gentleman does not like the good news, but he will appreciate that the major fall happened in the first two years, and since then there has been a very significant increase over the following five years.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Does my hon. Friend agree that output in manufacturing industry would be much higher if British manufacturing industry were even more competitive than it is now? One factor in that is the unrealistic increase in wages that has taken place in recent years. Does my hon. Friend agree that if the representatives of manufacturing industry spent less time wailing about factors beyond their control, such as interest rates and exchange rates, and more time considering matters within their control, such as wage rates, the state of British manufacturing industry would be much better?

Mr. Morrison: I agree in part with my hon. Friend, but I do not think that the picture is as black as he likes to paint it. Obviously I agree with his main premise that the better the productivity, the greater the output. From my visits to every part of the country I know that productivity gains in many companies, both old and new, are significant. In those companies employment is now secure, whereas it was not secure seven years ago.

Foreign Goods (Dumping)

13. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his Department is doing about the dumping of foreign goods in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: Anti-dumping action is the responsibility of the European Commission. My Department works closely with United Kingdom industry on the preparation of complaints in order to ensure that appropriate protection is given against unfair competition.

Mr. Hayes: This is all very well and interesting, but is my hon. Friend truly satisfied that the anti-dumping process is sufficiently rapid and effective? If he is not, what will he do about it? Many of my constituents are sick to death of trying to trade with one arm tied behind their backs.

Mr. Clark: I would like it if my hon. Friend could give me specific instances rather than say that a number of his constituents are trading with one arm tied behind their backs. I am keen to help them. It is my principal purpose in this position to assist firms that have suffered from handicaps of this type. If he cares to give me the details, I will see what can be done. I agree that at present the procedures are rather cumbersome and long drawn-out, and that in many cases the onus of proof is higher than one would like, especially in regard to proving injury, but to some extent we are the captive of Community and GATT rules. To say that nothing is being done is unfair. At present we are involved in 14 cases and further cases are under review. If my hon. Friend passes his constituents' cases on to me, I do not doubt that we shall have some more.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Minister aware that I am aware that the Government are not doing very well on this problem? I realise that the Minister is trying his best to renegotiate the multi-fibre arrangement, but with the Government's attitude it appears that anybody can come from anywhere in the world and dump what they like on these shores. It is about time the Treasury Bench applied for the Chiltern Hundreds.

Mr. Clark: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman, as I am to all hon. Members who express their indignation at what is going on in the so-called international free trading arena. I accept much of the argument that they put to me. Will they give me the benefit of the doubt in the sense that the unfair trade unit itself has been in existence for less than a month and I am doing my best to correct these cases? However, I depend on hon. Members for reference of individual cases. The unit is set up, the personnel are there and we are ready to examine in detail every case that is referred to us.

Sir Anthony Grant: If my hon. Friend wants a specific incident, is he aware that at present in docklands there is a large silo of cement which the Greeks are seeking to dump on the British market? Is he aware that that would cause great harm to British makers of cement, such as Rugby Portland Cement in my constituency? Will he look into the matter and do his best to ensure that an anti-dumping application is pursued with all due vigour in Brussels?

Mr. Clark: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The House must forgive me if I read. It is the first time this afternoon. Both my Department and the Department of the Environment have maintained close contact with the cement industry and are fully aware of the concern expressed at the threat from an increased level of low price imports. The European Commission has completed the necessary investigation and a formal announcement of its findings is expected shortly.

Manufactured Goods

14. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the most up-to-date state of the United Kingdom balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Pattie: In the three months ended April there was a deficit of £1·1 billion.

Mr. Canavan: Does the Minister not have an iota of shame in him when he stands at the Dispatch Box month after month giving an appalling account of his stewardship? Does the Minister realise that if he were in charge of an industrial manufacturing company he would be sacked for gross incompetence and dereliction of duty?

Mr. Pattie: I offer the hon. Gentleman and the House some figures which I think will assist the hon. Gentleman in taking a sensible view of the matter. In 1970 the value of exports of manufactures was 50 per cent. higher than imports. In 1985 the value of exports of manufactures was 10 per cent. lower than imports. Over that 15-year period there had been a decline. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that British consumers had formed the view that British-produced goods were not well enough produced, well enough designed, properly priced or adequately supported by after-sales service. They had voted with their cheque books and bank accounts to buy imported goods. That is the criticism of the manufacturing industry.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Is my hon. Friend appreciative of the detrimental effects on the balance of trade if British Airways buys American engines rather than Rolls-Royce engines? In the circumstances, will he convey to the chairman of British Airways that hon. Members feel strongly that Rolls-Royce should get the order, in the interests of the British aerospace and aero-engine industry?

Mr. Pattie: I am sure that the chairman of British Airways reads the Official Report with the same attention as the chairman of the Post Office, to whom I referred earlier. I hope that he will read the opinion by my hon. Friend. We are in close touch with the Department of Transport on the matter and we hope for a satisfactory outcome.

Mr. John Smith: I thought that I heard the Minister say in an earlier answer that the deficit in the first quarter of 1986 was £1·1 billion. If that is correct, is it a revision of the figure of £1·4 billion, which is in the latest statistics issued by his Department? In addition, will the Minister tell us why he thinks it is adequate to blame British industry for the deficit in our trade and to accept no responsibility whatsoever for the policies of the Government, which have been deeply inimical to the success of British manufacturing industry?

Mr. Pattie: Yes, I will. I attempted to give a 15-year view of the fact that the manufacturing capability of this country appears, over that period — under successive Governments — to have been unable to meet the requirements of a variety of different markets both abroad and in this country. Therefore, companies find that their prospects and sales diminish and some go out of business. Then we have complaints from the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan). The answer is to follow policies, which the Government are doing, which improve the competitiveness of companies in this country so that their products and services will be more attractive.

Information Technology

15. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the present level of encouragement given by the information technology and electronics based industries to information technology training and skill development in education.

Mr. Pattie: I welcome the steps taken by some leading firms to promote the provision of relevant education and training. But, as my hon. Friend pointed out in his recent study, there is room for industry to collaborate much more with the education system at all levels to meet skill requirements.

Mr. Oppenheim: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Is it true that the plethora of Government schemes, some of them run by the Department of Employment and some by his own Department, and the plethora of training schemes run by private industry are, in many ways, confusing? Is it not time that the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of Employment, and industry tried to get together to work out some national system of training on the German model?

Mr. Pattie: I do not know whether the German model is necessarily the best one to follow. There is a great deal of activity at present. Industry has set up the information technology skills agency and yesterday the ACARD report on the future of the software industry in the United Kingdom was issued. One of the report's main recommendations was that British industry should place major emphasis on training, which is very much to be welcomed.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Is the Minister aware that the ACARD report, which no doubt he has read——

Mr. Pattie indicated assent.

Mr. Robinson: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has read it. Is he aware that, reading between the lines, the report amounts to a terrible indictment of the Government because of their neglect to provide real support measures for the software industry? That sector is growing even more rapidly than the information technology industry as a whole. For example, in 10 years' time, 40 per cent. of IBM's total revenue will come from software sales. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that urgent action needs to be taken by the Government? We want not words from him but action by his Department.

Mr. Pattie: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has been reading the same report. The report's analysis is substantially in line with the measures that we are already taking. The report contains interesting ideas. In line with our response to all ACARD reports, we shall consider this one carefully and, no doubt, report in the autumn.

Exports (Departmental Assistance)

16. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps his Department is taking to assist British industry to secure major export contracting and other orders.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My Department provides a wide range of services for all exporters through the BOTB and ECGD. For the larger orders these can include assistance towards the cost of bidding as well as support with financial packages.

Mr. Hirst: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware that British Shipbuilders is pursuing a large order from China which, if won, would result in vessels being built at Govan Shipbuilders, a successful yard on the Clyde where a number of my constituents work? Will my hon. Friend assure me that his Department will spare no efforts in enabling British Shipbuilders, and ultimately Govan Shipbuilders, to be successful in winning this important order?

Mr. Morrison: I assure my hon. Friend that I am aware of what British Shipbuilders is doing in trying to get that order from China. I can give him the assurance also that the Department is doing everything possible to help British Shipbuilders to secure that order. I shall personally keep closely in touch on this matter.

Ministerial Statements

Mr. Speaker: Private notice question. Mr. Denzil Davies.

3.31 pm

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it directly connected with questions?

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It is directly connected with this whole matter, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Which whole matter? We have not considered it yet.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we shall have four items, either private notice questions or ministerial statements. On average, they will take half an hour each, which means that the main debate, for which the House has prepared itself, is not likely to start until 5.30 pm. Bearing in mind that at least three of these items are not of such monumental importance that they could not be dealt with on another day, why is it that on some days we have no statements, although the House must know that such issues will be brought up, yet today we are to have four statements, which means that an important debate cannot start until at least 5.30 pm? Who makes up his mind about this nonsense?

Mr. Speaker: It is not my decision. It is a matter for the Leader of the House.

Royal Ordnance Factories

3.32 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his decision to halt the sale of the ROFs.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): The House was informed last October that, subject to the normal caveats of trading performance and stock market conditions, we hoped that Royal Ordnance plc would move to the private sector in mid-1986. Since then, planning has been in train for a stock market flotation this summer. As I announced to the House in a written answer yesterday, however, although substantial progress has been made in the process of transforming Royal Ordnance into a fully fledged commercial entity, it has not been possible to take this far enough and to have in place all the features necessary to provide the basis for a successful flotation this summer. It remains my intention to privatise Royal Ordnance, and I am giving further consideration to the means of achieving this.

Mr. Davies: To the right hon. Gentleman's discredit, and he knows it, he has had to be dragged to the Dispatch Box to give his answer on the Royal Ordnance factories. He had hoped that yesterday at 3.14 pm, during Defence Questions, he could slip the announcement through, but the plan failed. The right hon. Gentleman did not even have the guts to come to the Dispatch Box to make a proper statement about it.

For the three years before the right hon. Gentleman became Secretary of State we argued, both in the Chamber and outside the House, that the Government's plan to sell off the ordnance factories was not only nonsense but extremely damaging to the factories, to the employees and to the national defence interest. The Government did not listen. Inurned in their ideological tomb, they had no time for rational thought or reasoned argument.

While all that was going on and all the money was being spent, the ordnance factories were getting thinner. When the Government started this process the factories were valued at about £400 million, but that figure was rapidly reduced, until a few months ago an optimistic view in the City would have set their value at £150 million. That was one measure, although not the only one, of the damage that the Government have inflicted on the Royal Ordnance factories.

What is to happen? Will the Secretary of State give an undertaking that before the next general election he will not further dismember the ordnance factories but will return them to the status of a trading fund, in which the Government found them? Secondly, what will happen to those employees who lost their jobs as part of what was euphemistically described as preparation for privatisation? Ministers can walk away, as two did during the Committee stage. Merchant bankers, stockbrokers and management consultants can walk to the banks with fat fees paid by the taxpayers, but those who worked in the factories can walk nowhere except to the employment exchange.

Thirdly, how much has the operation cost the taxpayer over the past three years both in fees to private consultants and in time and man hours used in the Civil Service? Finally, will the Government learn from this lesson, drop the damaging plans to privatise the royal dockyards and stop that privatisation before more damage is done?

Mr. Younger: I have not heard such a good example of making bricks without straw for a long time. I do not intend to join the right hon. Gentleman in his ideological tomb. It remains the Government's belief that it would be better for the Royal Ordnance factories to be privatised——

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Why?

Mr. Younger: —for the many reasons on which our original plan to do so was based, which are that, to have a successful future——[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) might find it more helpful to hear what I have to say, even if he disagrees with it.

If the industry is to have a more successful future, it must rely for its future not only on home but on export orders. It has a much better chance of getting better export markets if it is in the private sector and fully competitive. For that reason, privatisation must still be the objective.

On the right hon. Gentleman's other questions, I cannot give him an undertaking that before the next general election the ordnance factories will be restored to the status of a trading fund, because the Government have no intention of going back to that solution. The position of the employees who lost their jobs earlier on, has nothing to do with the present postponment of privatisation, which is all that I have announced today. As to cost, it is too early to say what the cost of advice, and so on, would have been at this stage, but if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to know and tables a question I shall be happy to find that information for him. As to the dockyards, this is a wholly different situation, with a wholly different solution, and my announcement makes no difference to the intentions for them.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many, if not all, Conservative Members thinks that it is right to pursue a policy of privatisation, as we won the general election on it? When will the revised timetable go ahead? Will he pay tribute to Mr. Bryan Basset for all that he has done in the early work to try to effect that which we hope will come to fruition before long?

Mr. Younger: I thank my hon. and learned Friend and echo his view that we are greatly indebted to Mr. Basset and the management of Royal Ordnance for the tremendous efforts that they have been making over recent weeks. As to the principle, the House will understand that when the decision is taken to go for a flotation on the market, it is essential that that should be done only when the company is clearly in the right state to make that floration successful. In our judgment, the company is not at present in such a state as to make certain a really successful flotation. Again I hope and think that the House and my hon. and learned Friend will agree that if that is the case, it is very much wiser not to go ahead until it is in a proper state for a successful flotation.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Is the Secretary of State in a position to confirm to the House that one of the most important factors in this decision was the protest from Vickers about the placing of orders for Challenger tanks with Royal Ordnance and that the Government did not allow any competition for that order? If that is true, does it not blow a great hole in the Government's much vaunted competition policy?

Mr. Younger: No decision has yet been taken about the order to which the hon. Gentleman referred. As I have said, the criterion for this decision was whether the company was really ready for a successful flotation. Our judgment is that it is not yet ready and that we must wait until it is.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend not aware that, apart from the problems of the Challenger order, the judgment of the management of the Royal Ordnance factories was that they were ready? Will he say something about the central issue, which is not whether or not the Royal Ordnance factories should be privatised, but in what way, because it is being reported that the Department of Trade and Industry now wants to sell off piecemeal, in a privatised form, the whole operation. This is very important, because it will lower competition and result in the loss of many jobs in a city like Leeds.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is quite right to focus on those two points. As to the judgment whether this was the right moment to float the company, I do not say, and I have not said, that it would have been impossible, but I think my hon. Friend will agree that, with all sorts of obligations to the House and everywhere else, it would be right to be able to justify this as being the best moment to go for flotation, and we consider that that is not so. As for other options, I said in my answer that we shall now consider a broad range of other options for privatisation, but of course it is too early to say which will prove to be the right one.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Does not this sorry tale prove that the Public Accounts Committee was right to say that privatisation should not go ahead until the opening balance sheet assessment had been made? Unless we know the economic value of the company, how can we try to sell it? How can we convince the taxpayer that he is getting the proper price for the assets that we are selling? A number of assets have been sold below cost, and it is to the shame of this Government that they are not making sure that this does not happen again.

Mr. Younger: I think that the right hon. Gentleman may be missing the point slightly. Of course he is right, and the Public Accounts Committee under his leadership is also right, to say that we cannot impose a flotation without having all the facts. We should have had all those facts if flotation had gone ahead, but the right hon. Gentleman, of all people, will surely agree, with his responsibilities to the Public Accounts Committee and otherwise, that to justify a flotation it is necessary to demonstrate that a proper price is being obtained and that an effective flotation is being carried through. As our judgment was that that could not be done at present, I hope he will feel that we were right not to proceed.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): It took some time for the work force to appreciate and reconcile itself to the principle and effect of privatisation. This was achieved by reason of the fact that it was to be the Royal Ordnance plc, an integrated whole. Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that when the time comes for privatisation this will still be the case and that the Royal Ordnance factories will not be sold off piecemeal?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point about the acclimatisation of the Royal Ordnance employees to privatisation, and I reaffirm that it remains our objective to achieve the privatisation of Royal Ordnance. I cannot give the undertaking that my hon. Friend requests about the way in which it will be done, because, as I have already said, we are still reviewing all the possible options for privatisation from now on.

Mr. Straw: Does the Secretary of State not understand that when he refers to a successful future for the Royal Ordnance factories, thousands of ROF employees, including hundreds in my constituency, have paid for the privatisation policy of this Government with their jobs? —[HON. MEMBERS: "That is not true."] Yes, it is true, and Conservative Members know it, and the country knows it. Will the Secretary of State now come clean and have the guts to admit at the Dispatch Box that one of the policies that he is now looking at is selling off the different bits of Royal Ordnance plc piecemeal?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman does not usually talk rubbish, but it is absolute rubbish to say that any member of the staff of Royal Ordnance has paid for any part of this with his job. The number of jobs in Royal Ordnance is determined by the amount of work that the factories have and whether they are competitive enough to obtain orders, wherever they are. As I have said, we are considering what is the best option for the future.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that since it became a plc the Nottingham factory has an expanded order book and an increased work force. Regrettable as the delay is, will my right hon. Friend assure me that if there is to be a reconsideration of the method of selling the ordnance factories, the unprofitable Leeds group, which is grouped with the Nottingham factory, will not hamper full independence for the Nottingham factory?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's latter point. Such considerations will have to be looked into when we consider all the options for the future. My hon. Friend said that the Nottingham factory's work force has expanded since privatisation, and I am not sure where that leaves the hon. Member for Blackburn, in view of his extraordinary remarks earlier.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Does the Secretary of State recognise that his comments this afternoon will add greatly to the fears that already exist among the labour force in Leeds? The workers have already sacrificed their jobs for privatisation, and they now run the risk of losing more because of the lack of Challenger tank orders and the fact that the Minister seems to prefer to break up the Royal Ordnance factories and sell them in parts? When will the Government look after those workers who have given so much for Britain on so many occasions? Do the Minister and the Government not have some moral responsibility towards them?

Mr. Younger: There seems to be a change of tack among Opposition Members who have for some time been at pains to say—incorrectly—that the work force was not in favour of privatisation. If the hon. Gentleman is changing his tack now, he should say so. I have made no decision to break up the Royal Ordnance factories, and I thought that I had made that clear.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Is my right hon. Friend aware that during the period or preparation for privatisation the Royal Ordnance factories have been negotiating the sale or long lease of some plants, including one in my constituency? Can he assure me that the postponement in no way prejudices the present negotiations, because the work force and myself want an assured future for those at the Powfoot plant?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I can give him that assurance. The postponement makes no material difference to that situation, about which I know he is extremely concerned.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Will the Secretary of State recall a matter that was raised a moment ago? A number of us are interested in Barnbow in Leeds. The matter of Nottingham and the plant there being profitable was mentioned. The work force at Barnbow was told that it would be better off after privatisation, but it is now not to be privatised. Did I get an inkling that because Nottingham is profitable and has been given orders there will be even more redundancies in Leeds as a result?

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman would be wrong to draw any such conclusion, nor have we decided that privatisation is not to go ahead. I have said only that the flotation cannot go ahead in July as planned. The future of any form of organisation will depend on the amount of orders that all the Royal Ordnance factories get and I hope that they will obtain as many orders as they can.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Is my right hon. Friend aware that those who have consistently been in favour of privatisation will not necessarily be displeased at the delay in the flotation of the company on the market, as this will give more time to examine all the issues involved and to get them right when it happens? Would he care to say a word about the problems of Royal Ordnance with the competitive tendering policy of his Department, particularly in relation to foreign companies? Finally, is he aware that we do not take kindly to Opposition Members launching an attack on the Government about redundancies in Royal Ordnance factories, when, under their control, as many jobs, if not more, were lost through redundancies?

Mr. Straw: That is not true.

Mr. Atkins: If the facts are checked, Labour Members will be able to confirm that that is true.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is correct to say that there were a large number of redundancies indeed when the Labour party had responsibility for the factories.

My hon. Friend has put his finger on an important point—the weight to be placed on the Opposition's alleged indignation about the matter. If I had announced today that we were going ahead with flotation on a basis that was not altogether clearly advantageous, we can imagine what the Opposition would have said. They would rightly have severely criticised us, and for that reason we can place little credence in their synthetic indignation.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Does the Secretary of State accept that the Government's anxiety to sell off the Royal Ordnance factories should not be allowed in any way to hamper the supply of much needed equipment for the armed forces? Can he assure the House that the Government's efforts to get out of the mess that they are in will in no way delay the placing of much needed orders for the Challenger tank?

Mr. Younger: The decision on the Challenger tank will be taken on the basis of the best possible value and delivery and on other such factors. I can assure the hon. Gentleman on that point. He asked about the supply of equipment to the armed forces. There is no reason why the change should make any difference to that, and I agree with him that it is a mater of great importance.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) spoke about the Nottingham Royal Ordnance factory and the stability of the work force. Is my right hon. Friend aware that at one time the work force at Nottingham declined from about 2,000 to just over 1,000? That happened under the old trading status, and the growth in the labour force at Nottingham has occurred solely during its current plc status.

Can my right hon. Friend say something about the difference between the management structure of the old system and the management structure of the new system? Can he tell us what benefits that gives the present plc management, whether or not the company is privatised, in going out and getting business that was denied to the company under the old system? Will he give some assurances to my work force in Nottingham?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the point made by my hon. Friend. It seems that recent efforts by the Nottingham factory management have been fruitful and productive, and my hon. Friend is quite right to draw attention to that.

In terms of the future of the various Royal Ordnance factories and the jobs in them, I have to tell the House that it is the gaining of orders, especially export orders, that will make the difference to all these factories. I hope that management will go ahead and make the factories as competitive as possible, in order to obtain the best possible level of orders.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I agree with the Minister that it is the state of the order book that determines the date of sale if privatisation is intended. Will the Minister confirm that it was his intention last week to announce that the Challenger tank order would be given to the Leeds factory? The placing of that order is at his disposal. On Saturday he was dissuaded from taking that decision by the intervention of a private firm which is a well-known supporter of the Conservative party. All his plans are now falling to pieces because he is not now able to give the Challenger order to Leeds. The Leeds factory has a long history, going back to the beginning of the last war, of being the best provider of main battle tanks to Britain. Many people believe that it makes the best main battle tanks in the world.

Mr. Younger: I share the views of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) about the excellent work carried out at the Leeds factory. He is right to draw attention to that. I am glad of his confirmation of something that has not been agreed by many of his colleagues, namely, that it is the state of the order book that will determine the future of the factories, wherever they are. There was never any intention to announce any Challenger order next Saturday. As I have said, the decision on that order will be taken on the basis of the best price and the best factory.

Social Security Benefits (Students)

3.54 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): With permission, I should like to make a statement about social security benefits and students.

In January the Government published proposals which were a first step to channelling support for students more through the educational maintenance system than the social security system. I referred these proposals to the Social Security Advisory Committee and I am today publishing the committee's report together with the Government's response to it. I am also laying before the House amended regulations which take account of its views and those of the local authority associations and others expressed during the consultation period.

It remains the Government's view that in the long term it cannot be sensible that students should be subject to two separate but intertwined systems of support. It cannot be satisfactory to have students permanently dependent upon a system which is primarily designed for those who, for various reasons, cannot work rather than for those who have withdrawn voluntarily from the labour market to study. The vast majority of comments to the Social Security Advisory Committee supported the principle of rationalising student support. But at the same time three main concerns were expressed.

First, there was concern that the major change proposed to housing benefit, whereby the accommodation element in the grant would be taken fully into account when assessing housing benefit entitlement, would cause a wide range of losses. The Social Security Advisory Committee shared that concern while at the same time recognising the case in principle for the change. Although there is no doubt that the present rules treat students more favourably than other claimants, the Government are prepared to withdraw that proposal.

Second, there was concern that in relation to the withdrawal of housing benefit for accommodation left unoccupied in the summer vacation some students would not have time to change existing plans and commitments. We recognise their concern and, therefore, this measure will not take effect until the summer of 1987, as we accept that students who have already entered into rent commitments for this summer could face difficulties.

Third, there was concern about the position of students without an award who have begun their studies on the assumption that they would continue to draw benefit at the current level. We accept that we should protect the most vulnerable of these—existing students living away from their parents' homes. Those students will be treated as now for housing benefit—in respect of private rented accommodation in term time and the short vacations—up to 1 April 1988, or when their present course ends.

The remainder of the Government's proposals are largely unchanged. We shall remove entitlement to unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit in the short vacations when students are already provided for through the grant. We shall simplify housing benefit administration by averaging grant income for the whole of the grant-assisted period. Students in halls of residence will in future be able to claim housing benefit only during the long vacation, for which there is no provision in the grant.

Our proposal to make a £36 additional increase in the grant still stands and is an important step to the long-term aim of shifting student support away from the social security system. Nevertheless, the Government recognise that there are important issues to be discussed before making further progress towards that aim. This raises a question of a wider review of student support and that will be dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science in his statement shortly.

Our other proposals have been widely welcomed and will go forward. We shall extend help under the students' dependants' hardship scheme to cover the full year for two-parent families, as well as single parents. We shall disregard for housing benefit those parts of the grant which cover books and travelling expenses. That change will now take effect for the academic year 1987-88. We shall provide a firm legal basis for treating students' income from parental covenants so that it does not affect their claims to benefit during the summer vacation.

The Government's long-term aim of removing students from the benefit system has been widely welcomed and accepted in principle. It cannot be right that generations of students should be encouraged to depend on social security. We set out our proposals five months ago and we have responded carefully to the comments made upon them. I believe that the proposals I have described today represent sensible steps towards rationalising provision for students, and reducing their dependence on benefits.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Is the Secretary of State aware that, although we welcome the fact that students will at least now not be made homeless by housing benefit cuts this summer vacation, he is still proceeding with substantial benefit cuts for students which will not be adequately compensated for by the grant system? Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that his proposals will cause severe losses to up to 250,000 students who are caught in the crossfire between the DHSS and the Department of Education and Science?

Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that the two-month delay in making this statement, since he had the damning SSAC report at the end of March, has accentuated the difficulties particularly for mature students and for those from poor backgrounds, because several housing benefit offices, such as those at Reading, Aberdeen and Dundee, have already been refusing to allow students to sign on? Will he therefore issue immediate instructions to all DHSS offices to meet students entitlements in full this summer?

Is the Secretary of State aware that, while the Opposition understand the principle that students should be supported by grants and not by means of the social security budget, we do not accept that benefits should be cut sharply before an adequate alternative grant system is formulated and implemented? The mere promise of a review of grant in the light of the aborting of the previous one is a wholly insufficient substitute.

Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that student entitlement to social security benefit has been growing solely because of the diminishing value of the grant, which has fallen by 20 per cent. in real terms since 1979? Is he aware that what is proposed today is scarcely a genuine review when students are being squeezed by the DHSS while proper compensation from the DES slips further into the future?

How does the Secretary of State justify failing to improve on the original and miserly £36 compensation a year for loss of housing benefit during the short vacations? Why does he not admit that he is looking to parents to met at least one third of the losses?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his continued insistence on removing entitlement to unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit at Christmas and Easter is tantamount to saying that students should not be available to work in the short vacations? The falling real value of the student grant means that they need to find work or to claim benefit to get by.

This statement means that, contrary to the clear prescription of their own advisers and contrary to natural justice, the Government still intend to take money away from students on the basis of a vague promise of some future IOU. That is wrong-headed and unjust. The Secretary of State should withdraw all these benefit cuts until the grant review is completed.

Mr. Fowler: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman has just said. He says that he understands the principle of seeking to reduce students' reliance upon the social security system. I hope that he supports that principle because that was the position of the majority who gave evidence to the Advisory Committee. There will be an opportunity to debate the regulations when they come forward.

The hon. Gentleman is not right in his generalisation about losses. Indeed, 140,000 students will gain from our proposals. As a result of our concessions, many fewer housing benefit losses will take place. Students are not normally affected by losses from more than one source.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): How many losses?

Mr. Fowler: As losses are not cumulative, it is not possible to provide that information.

Mr. Skinner: How many?

Mr. Fowler: If the hon. Gentleman understood the means whereby — [Interruption.] It is not possible to work out exactly what the losses are and the number of students who will be losing because the losses are not cumulative.

We are seeking to return to a position where help for students is channelled through the educational maintenance system. That must be right. Only a few years ago no students claimed from the social security system and now most do, at an annual cost approaching £120 million. Claims by students for housing benefit have come literally only in the past three or four years. It has not been the housing benefit system that has created that demand.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has failed to understand the significant concessions that we are making. For example, there is the concession of deferring the removal of housing benefit for unoccupied accommodation in the long vacation. Another concession is the decision not to proceed with the new method of calculating housing benefit. These are substantial concessions that have been made in the light of the evidence that has been given to us. We stand by the principle that it cannot be right to have two systems running side by side. It must be right to have more help for students channelled through the educational maintenance system.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House will have heard the Secretary of State say that there will be a debate on this matter. As there are two more statements to follow on broadly the same issue, I shall limit questions on this statement until 4.15 pm, and then we must move on.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Having asked my right hon. Friend to slow down the transfer from reliance on housing benefit, may I congratulate him on making this statement to the House? Will he confirm that the principle of providing support for students, principally through the student grant system, is still very much an aim of the Government? Will he confirm also, sitting as he is next to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, that as we move forward there will be meaningful discussions between the two of them so that a better timetable for achieving our objective can emerge?

Mr. Fowler: I confirm what my hon. Friend says. There will be discussions between my right hon. Friend and I. I think that it is right to have the longer review of the overall position which bodies such as the Advisory Committee want. My hon. Friend is right to suggest that there are three significant concessions in the statement, which will appear in the regulations that will be placed before the House, which I believe will be widely welcomed by the student population and the Advisory Committee. At the same time, we have adhered to the principle of seeking to have more help coming through the educational maintenance system than through benefit, which I believe is in the public interest as well.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Why has it taken so long for the Secretary of State to make this statement? Is he aware that university vacations at St. Andrew's, Cambridge and Bangor have already started? What does he say about the Advisory Committee's comment that he has switched some of the specifically targeted benefit savings to indiscriminate flat rate subsidies? That seems to move against all the principles that he has adopted in his other social security reviews. Is he not putting the cart before the horse by pre-empting the review that the Secretary of State for Education and Science will be announcing later?

Mr. Fowler: I do not think that that is fair. We said in the Green Paper on social security last year, and in the White Paper, that it was our intention to move in the direction that I have outlined. That has been supported. We are taking only a first step, however. We have made significant concessions and the overall savings position has been very much affected by that. We have sought in the concessions that we are making to guard against students being affected in a sudden way. Students will enjoy a significant concession during the coming summer vacation.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement should be welcomed widely in the House and outside? Does he agree with me that it should be viewed against the most generous system of student support in the western world? Will he confirm that the concessions that he has announced will cost about £20 million? Will he further confirm that both housing benefit and supplementary benefit will be available to students for the long vacations?

Mr. Fowler: Help will be available in long vacations. As my hon. Friend suggests, it is right that that should be emphasised. It seems not to be understood, even by some of those who have been lobbying on these matters over the past month, that the proposals are confined to short vacations and not to long ones. I must remind the House that we are spending £5 million in housing benefit that goes to halls of residence. The administration costs of paying that £5 million is £3 million a year. [Interruption.] It seems absurd that sensible people like the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) should be defending such a system.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the Secretary of State really expect the House to believe that he got his statement through the Treasury without detailing the number of students gaining and the number losing? Will he come clean and tell the House the number of students who will still lose under these proposals? As he is so caught up with cumulative and non-cumulative totals, I am sure that the House would be happy with a non-cumulative total.

Mr. Fowler: I cannot give that figure for the reasons that I have stated. What is certain is that 140,000 students will gain from the full £36 we are making available. There are obviously two main sources of loss—unemployment benefit in short vacations, and housing benefit on unoccupied accommodation in the long vacation. The hon. Gentleman will know, for example, that we are postponing the introduction of that until 1987. It is not possible to give the exact figure that the hon. Gentleman requires.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. Friend accept that I am glad that he has listened to the anxiety of students on covenants who are unfairly affected vis-a-vis those on sponsorship and those on full grants, and has taken steps to remedy that? However, I am still worried about those who can get accommodation only by taking an annual lease. That situation will not disappear in the summer of next year. My right hon. Friend has given himself leeway to think again, and I hope that he will do so.

Mr. Fowler: I hear what my hon. Friend says. I think that she will recognise that postponing the implementation of the proposal for a year enables the position to be examined from the point of view of the student and the landlord. Clearly we shall keep the position under review.

On the matter of the restoration of policy on the treatment of parental covenants, that decision has been widely welcomed. We shall put that beyond doubt in the regulations.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): In relation to the revised proposals announced by the Secretary of State today, can he tell us what the total saving to the DHSS budget will be in the first full financial year?

Mr. Fowler: In 1986-87, which is this financial year, the overall saving will be about £8·5 million. In 1987-88, it will be £16 million.

Mr. Michael Latham (Ruthland and Melton): I thank my right hon. Friend for listening to the expressions of concern of many of his supporters on this matter. Will he give an assurance that it is not the Government's intention that qualified students should be denied places in higher education because they or their parents cannot afford it?

Mr. Fowler: I can readily give that assurance on behalf of the Government.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement seems to be an exercise of unwitting self-condemnation? Does he accept that in some areas there is a serious regionally intense problem? Does he accept that in areas of high unemployment, the Government's underlying assumption that students can work in the long vacation is simply not tenable because of the job starvation in those areas? Does he also accept that the problems faced by students in those area are particularly acute and seem to have escaped his attention in the statement today?

Mr. Fowler: We are not making proposals on the long vacation. It seems that the hon. Gentleman has asked a question based on an entire misunderstanding of the position.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in so far as I understand the statement, I welcome the alleviations in it? For the benefit of myself and the House, will he put in the Library a simplified and clarified version of what he has said in order to give students and their parents the benefit of clear information?

Mr. Fowler: I accept that. I shall certainly endeavour to follow up my hon. Friend's request.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): How much cash has the right hon. Gentleman winkled out of the Treasury for extending the students' dependants' hardship scheme?

Mr. Fowler: I cannot give that figure off hand. I should be glad of the hon. Gentleman's support on this, if I interpret it as support. Clearly that is one area where money will be paid.

Mr. Dalyell: How much?

Mr. Fowler: It is not a substantial amount. What is a substantial amount is the concession that we are making on the method of calculating housing benefit where the savings are £20 million less than would otherwise be the case.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): What peculiar ability is it by which the Secretary of State can estimate projected savings for the Treasury but cannot estimate the projected number of affected students?

Mr. Fowler: For the very good reason that there is a series of proposals which may affect individual students but which are not cumulative. Unless one knows the individual position of each student, it is impossible to give the kind of information that the hon. Gentleman wants.

Students (Support)

4.14 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on student support.

The measures just announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services mark a return towards a system in which support for students will be provided through the single channel of the educational maintenance system. It is a limited step, taken in close consultation with my Department. I am, however, convinced from the many representations I have received that it would be very difficult to make further progress towards disentangling students from the social security system without a wider examination of the whole structure of student support.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I, in association with the Secretary of State for Social Services, have therefore decided to institute a comprehensive review of all aspects of financial supprt for students in Great Britain studying at first degree or equivalent level. It will examine the maintenance needs of students and the extent to which they should be provided for from public funds, having regard to other actual and potential sources of support, including loans.

The study will be carried out under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden). The Scottish Education Department and the Department of Health and Social Security will be represented on it and the Education Departments of Northern Ireland and of Wales will be associated with it. The review will be carried out within Government, but we shall be open to representations and advice from every source. We shall undertake extensive consultations and consider international comparisons. The outcome of the review will itself be in the form of published proposals for public discussion and consultation.

Meanwhile, because the Government recognise the needs of students, we have mitigated the proposed removal of benefit whilst maintaining the level of compensation through the grant system originally proposed. Subject to the agreement of Parliament, the maintenance grants of students living away from home will be increased by £36 per annum from the beginning of the academic year 1986-87. This will be in addition to the increase of 2 per cent. which my predecessor announced on 16 December and will result in an overall increase of 4 per cent. on present rates for students living away from home. That is higher than the current rate of inflation. A similar addition to grant will be made in Scotland. A paper setting out detailed grant rates is being placed in the Library. The main rates of grant applicable to Scottish students are being given separately in a written answer by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland today.

Student numbers in higher education are at an all-time record level. We want still more to benefit. The Government stand by the principle of access to higher education for all who have the necessary intellectual competence, motivation and maturity, regardless of parental income. We want to ensure that students will neither be deterred from entering higher education nor handicapped in their studies by lack of means. But in doing so we must have regard to the claims on national resources. That is why I think that the time is ripe to investigate with an open mind all possible forms and sources of support.

I hope that the House will welcome the review which I have announced today.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I welcome the Government's partial retreat from their original proposals on social security entitlement for students. However, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that they should be withdrawn altogether until the review is complete. Can the right hon. Gentleman, unlike his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, tell the House how many students will lose out as a result of the revised proposals? Is he aware that his statement conveniently ignores the fact, recently admitted by the Minister with responsibility for higher education, that the real value of the student grant has fallen by one fifth in real terms since 1979? The statement holds out no prospect of a significant improvement.

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that his in-house review, with its restrictive terms of reference, ignores the financial needs of non-degree students and pupils who stay on in full-time education after the age of 16, although both groups are vital to the future of this country?

Finally, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his attempt to present the idea of a review of student grants as a promising new beginning has a hollow ring for those of us who remember the previous so-called comprehensive review, which was set up in humiliating circumstances by his predecessor in December 1984 and unceremoniously abandoned last autumn? What guarantee is there that the latest review, for which the right hon. Gentleman has given no completion date, will not suffer a similar fate?

Mr. Baker: As to whether we should postpone the changes announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services until the review has been completed, I remind the hon. Gentlemant that the Social Security Advisory Committee recognised that there was an element of double counting in allowing supplementary benefit and unemployment benefit for the short vacations. Those are the two principal changes being made. As my right hon. Friend said, the administrative costs of dealing with those very small claims this year was out of all proportion for the social security system.

I accept that the value of the grant has fallen by about one fifth or £90 million in real terms, but I remind the House that social security payments have risen to more than £120 million within the system. Housing benefit, which was principally introduced about four years ago, accounts for about £50 million for that. I should also point out that although grants have been cut, the number of students has risen by 80,000 under the present Government whereas under the Labour Government it fell by 2,600.

I do not know whether the Labour Front Bench intends to restore the level of student grant to what it was in 1979. In a speech last Friday the Deputy Leader of the Labour party seemed to put some kind of bridle on the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice). Durham wants to spend but Sparkbrook says "Whoa". A newspaper headline on Saturday read:

"'Expansion not on' Hattersley tells dons".

[Mr. Baker]

On the hon. Gentleman's final question about the review and why I have announced it, I should state clearly that when I assumed responsibility for this office I looked at this question and decided that a review was clearly needed. That is why I have announced it today.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there are two classes of student today—those on full grants and those whose grants are expected to be topped up by their parents, some of whom cannot afford to do so? Will he examine that aspect to ensure a more even situation for all students? Will he also seek to restore the grant lost through inflation?

Mr. Baker: The review will certainly look into that aspect. Student support now comes from two sources—from grants and from the social security system—and that is the sum of money that the review will consider. I have stated that loans are not ruled out as a means of topping up grants in recognition of the very point that my hon. Friend has made.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that one of the major flaws in his statement is that the review is to be conducted within Government and that it is impossible to welcome a review when the membership of the review team is to come from the same ideological straitjacket as the right hon. Gentleman?

Why does the right hon. Gentleman exclude the 16 to 18-year-olds, and why is his proposal confined to first degrees or equivalent? Will the review be sufficiently cross-departmental to include Manpower Services Commission funding which often stops people going into training or education when it could be used for that purpose?

Does the reference to loans mean that the outcome is cash limited and that if the right hon. Gentleman cannot get any more cash on the table when the review findings come out there will be a return to loans? Is he aware that loans already exist? They are known to students as overdrafts.

Mr. Baker: As I said in my statement, the review will be cross-departmental because other Departments are involved, principally the DHSS but also the Scottish and Welsh Departments. The review will be wide and thorough. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will be starting on it later this summer —[Interruption.] It will have to be thorough because it is the first review of student grants for 25 years.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Rubbish.

Mr. Baker: With great respect, it is the first for 25 years.

I am glad that a Liberal Member raised the subject of loans, although he should perhaps clear his channels of communication with the leader of the SDP, who made an important speech at Stirling university in February indicating a fundamental change in student support and floating the idea that student support should be operated by the universities and polytechnics themselves and that students should be given not only the student support money but part of the tuition fees to take around to address different institutions. The leader of the SDP also said that students would be able to take out loans for topping up, so there seems to be some support in part of the alliance for the concept of loans.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I welcome the announcement of a thorough and comprehensive review, but may I impress upon my right hon. Friend that the voices of industry, business and schools must be heard as well as those of higher education and Government? Will the review include the problems of parental contributions and the wider problems of financing research and academic salaries?

Mr. Baker: Financing research and academic salaries are rather separate matters, but I warmly endorse what my hon. Friend said at the beginning of his remarks. The review should certainly cover the attitudes of schools and the other aspects that he mentioned. I am concerned about the disincentive for 18 and 19-year-olds to go into higher education. This has been well measured over the years and probably owes more to the social attitudes and quality of education in schools than to cash considerations.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does not the Secretary of State owe it to students to give a clear statement of the date given to the review team to complete its work? Will he undertake that all evidence submitted will be published? In view of the dramatic reduction in the real value of grants since 1979, does he not also owe it to students to state that new money will be available for a substantial increase in student grants when the review is completed?

Mr. Baker: The review will examine the whole question of student support, which might be a mixed system of grants and loans or grants and sponsorship. All these ideas are opening up. For example, Mr. Ball, who is warden of Keble college and chairman of the board of the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education, which includes the polytechnics, made a proposal last week recommending grants for two years and loans and sponsorship for the third year. Ideas of that kind will have to be examined.

The evidence will be public. I am sure that the various bodies will make it public themselves. If they do not do so, we shall make it public unless they ask for it to be held confidential, as some of it might be in matters of this kind.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on recognising the significance of these problems and instituting a review so soon after taking office. Will the review take into account the disparities which now exist among authorities in relation to discretionary and mandatory grants as this leads to some apparent injustices?

Mr. Baker: I can confirm my hon. Friend's last point.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the Secretary of State realise that the total increase in the student grant that he has announced today, inadequate as it is, is twice the increase in the old-age pension? Would it be right for Britain's 9 million pensioners to conclude that that is where they come in the Government's pecking order?

Mr. Baker: That question would be best directed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. I believe that I have secured a pretty good deal for students this year in that the basic grant is going up by 4 per cent., which is more than the rate of inflation.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Despite some of the carping comments from Opposition Members, will my right hon. Friend accept that the review will be thoroughly welcomed not only in the House but by those in higher education? His reference to student loans will be widely welcomed. We hope that it will receive favourable consideration by the review body. May I ask for further advice? In regard to the 4 per cent. increase that he mentioned, does that mean effectively that at least for this year the grant has been inflation-proofed?

Mr. Baker: The grant for those students who are not living at home has been inflation-proofed. I think this will be welcomed by many students. As to loans, that is a matter which is very much a matter for public debate. Various schemes have been put forward in the student world itself and in the academic world. They relate not just to student support but to the whole financing of higher education. There is now a greater fluidity and mobility in the thinking on that subject than for many years.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that in all his answers about the thoroughly comprehensive review he has — inadvertently, I assume — forgotten to tell us the completion date? Am I right in assuming that the review will not be finished before, say, August 1988, or is it that two years for him is only a short time in politics?

Mr. Baker: I think that it will be completed before that. I should think that it is likely to be completed in the course of the next year. Then it will be a public consultation document. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Surely that is what the House and the country would expect. Surely I am not expected to hold a review under a Government Minister and to slap the result on the table and say "That is that." We want to hear wide views and comments from the many people who are affected.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be a widespread welcome among many anxious students and their families for the decision to re-establish the review and in particular for his willingness to contemplate a properly structured loans element? Can he see any way other than through loans whereby students can be disentangled from the clutches of the social security system and whereby all who are academically qualified may have an equal opportunity to enjoy higher education other than in conditions of penury?

Mr. Baker: The main thrust of what my right hon. Friend and I have said today is to disentangle students from the social security system. I think that enjoys wide support across the House. In the Beveridge report, which I studied last week, he specifically recommended that students should not be eligible for unemployment benefit. We are not making that change at the moment. Under what my right hon. Friend has said today, students will still be eligible for supplementary and unemployment benefit during the long vacation. One cannot withdraw those benefits without having a review to replace them with other forms of support. I do not exclude schemes of sponsorship by industry or a form of loan, possibly on a subsidised basis.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): In attempting to recast the grant structure for students, will the Secretary of State take into account a possible serious knock-on effect if loans were to be institutionalised? Does he realise that Scottish universities offer courses on a four-year basis and that that could be a substantial disincentive to students coming to Scottish universities?

Mr. Baker: I understand that. That is why a Scottish Minister will be closely involved with the review.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): Clearly the Government cannot have a bottomless pit of expenditure on student grants. Is it not right that the Government are spending £2,800 million on student grants? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the review body should examine the question of interest-free loans? Does he agree that students cannot always survive on the grants that the Government give? With the problem of unemployment they may not be able to find work to augment their grants. Therefore, interest-free loans would be an important step forward.

Mr. Baker: Certainly the review body will examine that. It is fair to remind the House that, compared with other western developed countries we have a uniquely high level of student support — three to five times higher per student compared with Holland and Germany, and significantly higher than in Denmark, France and Italy. The difficulty in Britain is that the two systems — the social security system and the educational maintenance system — have become tangled. It is in the interests of everybody to sort that out.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): In view of his statement and his earlier answer, will the Secretary of State confirm that the Scottish Education Department wil be represented fully by a sponsoring Minister, that is, his hon. Friend the Minister at the Scottish Office who is responsible for education, in what the Secretary of State has described as the most thorough review in 25 years? Will the Scottish representatives on the review body take the opportunity to bring again to the attention of his Department additional living allowances for students at universities in cities London which have exceptionally high living costs? In the Scottish contest I think particularly of Aberdeen for obvious reasons. Will the review consider the potential for extending the principle of additional living allowances beyond London to other cities in Britain?

Mr. Baker: Clearly the review body will examine such points. I assure the hon. Gentleman that a Scottish Minister will be involved. There are often many things that we can learn from the Scottish educational system.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Having pressed for this fundamental review on student finance, I should like to join many of my hon. Friends who welcome it. That welcome will also be reflected in Norwich where the fundamental review is very much required by those involved in the university of East Anglia and elsewhere. Does my right Friend agree that higher education is so vitally important that we must attract finance into it in all possible ways? Does he agree that in the fundamental review we must try to find alternative ways of getting finance into higher education for the benefit of young people so that the endless wrangling with the DHSS over finance may cease?

Mr. Baker: I hope that one of the prizes that will come out of the review will be a fundamental examination of the inter-relationship of student support with the financing of universities, polytechnics and institutes of higher education. One of my ambitions is to increase the participation of 18 and 19-year-olds in higher education. We have done very well since 1979 with a further 80,000 full-time students. I want to see progress above that figure.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Having two children on four-year courses at Edinburgh university, may I ask the Minister what is the objection to either he or the Under-Secretary reading out the written answer so that the Scots may question him on it?

Mr. Baker: That is not a matter for me. I have tried to answer as well as I can. As regards universities, of course I have responsibility for those in Scotland.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that his statement about the review will be very welcome on this side of the House, and that many of us wish it more luck than the last one? Does he agree that it is extraordinary that the main form of finance for students comes as non-returnable grants from the state? Is it not time tha we exploited other areas of society and in particular future employers? Should we not encourage them to take more interest in and to give more financial support to students whom they will be recruiting later?

Mr. Baker: I have sympathy with that approach. Many companies—larger and medium-sized ones for the most part—have sponsorship schemes and sponsor students in one way or another both at first degree and at post-graduate level. That is one area where I hope that the review body will be able to see an expansion of involvement of other sources of finance.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): May I congratulate the Secretary of State on maintaining the tradition of his predecessors—every time the heat is on student grants, they set up an inquiry? He will recall that, when the Prime Minister was in opposition in 1978, she promised students a fundamental inquiry. The right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) set the hon. Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) on to a grants review in 1982. When it failed to come up with proposals for loans, it was quietly abandoned. The right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph), when under pressure 18 months ago, set up a review of student grants which was quietly abandoned when the pressure was off.

What guarantee is there that this review will be carried through? What will the timescale be? We were assured on all of the previous occasions that I have described that the fundamental work and the collection of information had been done. May we have a rather shorter timescale? Will the right hon. Gentleman include in the review mature students and access courses for mature students? If the Secretary of State for Social Services does not know how many winners and losers there are in the propsoals, does the right hon. Gentleman, because last time around, even the Prime Minister could answer a question about that?

Mr. Baker: The review body will have to consider the implications of its findings for mature students. I have already been frank with the House about the time. I think that the body will report next year. As for the certainty of the review, I have announced it at the Dispatch Box of the House of Commons and it will happen.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are still in the middle of questions on the statement. We have a ten-minute Bill, another statement and an important debate ahead of us. Some of the hon. Members who are rising in their places wish to take part in that debate. I shall allow questions on the statement to continue for another five minutes, during which I hope that most hon. Members who are rising in their places will be called.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order at the end of the statement.

Mr. Dalyell: My point of order arises out of the statement.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take it at the end of questions on the statement.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I join those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who have congratulated my right hon. Friend, especially on that part of his statement which puts student loans back on the agenda. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, to bring ourselves into line with what is regarded in the rest of the world as an acceptable level of student support, the grant element must inevitably fall?

Mr. Baker: The review body will have to examine that. It is quite true that there is a variety of means of support for students in other countries. In America, for example, support involves a higher element of loans, many of which are cancelled by the employer when the graduate is employed. The review body must examine that type of arrangement. I assure my hon. Friend that the review body will deal with the issues that he has raised.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the review will be especially welcome to those of us who have urged his Department to examine student grants? Does he further agree that that review must be conducted on the understanding that it is no answer to say that our system of student maintenance is better than that in any other country? The system is deteriorating, and something positive must come out of the review.

Mr. Baker: I think that I am right in saying that, since the student grant was established in its current form in the 1960s, it has steadily declined in real terms. There is pressure on whatever Government are in power, therefore. We need a complete overhaul of the system and I hope that that is what the review will lead to.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): My right hon. Friend's announcement is excellent news for students, but does he agree that much damage has been done by the uncertainty of the past few months? Will he therefore give a deadline by which the review should be completed? Does he agree that to let it drag on, perhaps well into next year, would be damaging to students who are anxious about their future? Will he say that the review will be completed by Easter?

Mr. Baker: I am reluctant for obvious reasons to give a specific date for completion. The review must be thorough and take account of comparisons of many other countries. I expect the review to report during next year. I understand the urgency.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Although I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement, which is useful for all students, does he agree that British universities are the best in the world? Is it not therefore a privilege rather than a right for our students to go to university? Does my right hon. Friend agree that once students get to university they must aim to get qualified? If there was the incentive of a part grant, part loan system, would they not do even better?

Mr. Baker: I think that some would. Our best universities are certainly the best in the world, but my statement also refers to polytechnics, some of which are absolutely outstanding. I visited one in north Staffordshire last week, the computer department of which comes third after Imperial college and the computer department at Cambridge university. It is a great triumph for a polytechnic to get to that standard.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Is my right hon. Friend aware that this comprehensive review will be widely welcomed by students, centres of learning and industry? Is he further aware that loans will be welcomed? Does he agree that there is a real fear among students at a time of high unemployment about what will happen to the servicing of loans if the students are unemployed? Does he agree that such a loan should be on a soft basis—that debt service should be geared to future employment and salary levels?

Mr. Baker: Terms of loans and the extent of softness or the subsidy required will obviously concern the review. I understand what my hon. Friend says.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the softness or interest-freeness of the loan is not nearly as important as the fact that repayment should not start until salary levels reach a certain point, as that would avoid the reverse dowry on girls?

Mr. Baker: I accept the problem that my hon. Friend has described. One of the reasons why the review must consider practice in other countries is that they have considerable experience of operating such systems. It is not as if we are breaking new ground. There is plenty of experience to learn from on the continent and in America. That is why the review body must take full international comparisons into account.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): In regard to inflation proofing, would I be unduly rash to assume that, between now and when the report is ready for implementation, student grants will increase broadly in line with the rate of inflation?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is asking me to anticipate the discussions that I shall have later this year with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. I think that I have shown good evidence of the token of the Government's concern today in that the level of grants for students who live away from home will be 4 per cent. higher this year, which is higher than the current rate of inflation.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may not be within your knowledge that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland returned from his official visit to Mexico solely to be here for the statement on student grants, and for no other possible reason. As the Secretary of State referred in his statement to written answer, and as Scottish universities are affected rather differently, would it not have been at least sensible to have allowed the Under-Secretary of State to make a statement so that he could be cross-questioned on it?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid that that is not within my knowledge. We had better have the next statement.

Supplementary Benefits (Board and Lodging)

4.48 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on supplementary benefit arrangements for board and lodging.

As the House knows, when the main lines of the present system were set in April 1985 the Government undertook to monitor its working carefully and to review the financial limits on maximum payments after a year. Following the subsequent decision to have a general social security uprating in July 1986, it was thought sensible to defer any changes until then, but meanwhile, in advance, to make significant increases in the limits for residential care and nursing homes alongside the previous uprating in November 1985.

I am arranging to place in the Library copies of reports on the extensive monitoring and statistical surveys undertaken by the Department since April 1985, together with the full report commissioned from the consultants Ernst and Whinney on residential care and nursing homes. I have placed in the Vote Office copies of Ernst and Whinney's summary of its report, and of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's response to the Social Security Advisory Committee's comments on last November's amending regulations. In reaching our conclusions we have, of course, also taken account of the representations that we have received from Members and from other individuals and organisations.

For ordinary board and lodging, our most recent figures show that expenditure in 1984 rose not to £380 million, as we earlier estimated, but to over £500 million —an increase of no less than 80 per cent. in a year. At the same time, the number of boarders increased from 112,000 to over 160,000. Our monitoring and surveys confirm the existence of an accommodation market unduly influenced by the amount of benefit payable, rather than by normal commercial factors, and of an unacceptable degree of abuse. Many landlords have reduced their charges in response to the restraint imposed, and across the country our studies show average charges are for the most part close to average limits.

In view of this, and of the continued need to ensure firm control in this area, the Government have concluded that no general increase in the financial limits for ordinary board and lodging, or in the associated meals allowances, is at present justified. This is also the case for hostels, where our monitoring showed that average charges in all regions including London were below the present limit. We have, however, looked again at the current limit for couples without young children which is one and three quarter times the single adult limit. This has been widely represented to us as unrealistic, and we have decided to increase it to twice the single limit, as for couples with young children.

It will not surprise the House that many of the representations about ordinary boarders have focused not on the financial limits but on the limited time for which many of those under 26 can be paid as boarders at all. The regulations which came into effect on 24 November 1985 provided for those paid as boarders at the time to be exempt from time limits until 28 July 1986. We propose to extend that exemption indefinitely. New boarders under 26 will, however, continue to be subject to time limits, which we do not propose to change, unless they come within the extensive range of exemption categories covering those for whom longer-term boarding is a genuine need.

I turn now to the limits for residential care and nursing homes. Following the November 1985 increases of £10 a week in the residential care limits and £31·40 in the nursing home limits, the evidence is that in general homes charging at or below the average will fall within the benefit limits —in several categories, well within. While there is therefore no clear case for an all-round increase in July in addition to last November's, we nevertheless think it right to make some further increase where the evidence suggests it is most needed, in the limit for residential care homes for the elderly. We now propose that this should go up by £5 to £125 a week, making an increase of £15 a week overall since April 1985. In addition, we intend to make five important changes to meet specific problems which we judge to be of greater significance than the limits for particular categories of home. First, for those elderly people in residential care homes who are very dependent who are at present limited to £120 a week, we propose an increased limit of £140 a week where they qualify for the higher rate of attendance allowance.

Secondly, for blind people over pension age, where the same limitation currently applies, we similarly propose to increase the limit from £120 to £140 a week.

Thirdly, for those in residential care or nursing homes in Greater London, we propose to increase the limits by a special extension of up to £17·50 a week.

Fourthly, for those whose benefit is being paid at a transitionally protected rate in July, we propose an addition of up to £10 above their protected rate. This is a departure from the normal conventions concerning transitional protection, but one which will I think be welcomed in all parts of the House.

Fifthly, for those who are away from a home for short periods — for example, for a break or to maintain contact with their families—we propose new provisions to meet retaining fees.

Taken together, the changes I have outlined mean that, for example, the limit for a severely disabled elderly person in a residential care home in Greater London will rise by £37·50 a week. To assist the House, I am arranging for details of the new pattern of limits to be inserted in the Official Report.

These proposals are an important step towards the more flexible approach, but within a firmly-controlled framework, which is also the aim of the longer-term studies that we are conducting with the local authority associations, in consultation with the private and voluntary sectors. Subject to the views of the Social Security Advisory Committee, we intend to embody them in regulations to take effect from 28 July.

Residential Care and Nursing Home Limits from 28 July 1986

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): The first point that I should make on behalf of the whole House is to complain about the timing of this statement in relation to the publication of the information on which it is claimed to be based. Most hon. Members will not have seen the monitoring results on which this statement is said to be based, but I have them with me. Clearly it has been impossible for any hon. Member to assess the information contained in them in the time available before the statement was made.

Last July, following parliamentary questions about the results of monitoring, I wrote to the Minister. I wrote again on 15 October, not having had a reply. I finally received a reply in December from the Under-Secretary, which indicated that the information would be published

"as soon as we are in a position to do, although this may not now be until after Christmas."

Obviously, in DHSS language,

"may not now be until after Christmas"

means 18 June.

From the brief glance that I have had at the information, it is clear that the monitoring in respect of care was carried out early in 1985. It also appears that in respect of another report the information was ready in February this year. Why, therefore, was this information in its cold form not made available to the House in time for hon. Members to consider it before this statement was made?

The Minister said that many landlords have reduced their charges. I draw his attention to a report, which I am sure he has seen, entitled "It's the Limit", which indicates that landlords in London have recently put up their prices by 20 per cent. since the limits were set. It suggests that in 1984-85 the average price for a single room was £85·34 a week, compared with the DHSS allowance of £48·30. The report shows that in London only 60 hotels had charges below the limit set, and that of those only 22 had any vacancies. On average, people were sharing four to a room, although in some cases it was as many as 12 to a room. We are talking about 10,000 people who are subject to these limits in London.

In recent weeks, surveys have arrived in the House from various other parts of the country. They have usually been local studies. I refer the Minister to one that we have received from Preston, which indicates that none of the bed-and-breakfast establishments or hotels that could be contacted were within the maximum allowance, and that only one had ever taken unemployed people. In any case, only one had vacancies, and again everyone was expected to share rooms with strangers.

I also refer the Minister to similar reports from Ipswich, which indicate that many claimants are not able to live below the limits that now exist. There is a reference to bed and breakfast costing £73 a week, and no establishment there is within the cash limits for bed and breakfast. Therefore, it is hard for us to believe that the Minister's summary is justified, and I am not sure about the timing of the study that was made.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the fact that there would be no general increase in the meals allowances. I think I am correct in saying that these meals allowances have not gone up for two years, during which VAT has been imposed on takeaway meals and the average increase in the cost of food has been 12 per cent. That must mean that these meals allowances, which are inadequate now, will become seriously inadequate in the coming year.

We are glad that the Minister is now giving the proper rate for couples, as that has always been what landlords have charged, as opposed to what the DHSS has given. We are also pleased that the threat of the time limits has been removed for existing boarders. Nevertheless, I remind the House that all the difficulties that have been experienced will still apply with equal force to new boarders.

The Minister referred to the extensive exemption categories. As there is a great deal of evidence to suggest that those categories are not working properly, will new claimants still have to apply to be made exempt—as opposed to that being considered as a point of principle—and what will happen to appeals?

The hon. Gentleman said that the costs for residential care homes were considered to be adequate. The evidence was collected in 1985 and compares costs at the beginning of 1985 with limits at the end. I refer the Minister to a series of reports from voluntary organisations, such as the Royal National Institute for the Blind, all of which show that existing limits are inadequate. All their complaints will not be met by this statement.

I note that no increase is allowed for the special category of senile dementia, although 22 per cent. of people over 80 fall into that category. If the Minister claims that the new limits are adequate, why is an increase being proposed for transitional protection? Presumably transitional protection is above existing limits and, indeed, new limits, so if the new limits are adequate, why is that proposal needed?

Finally—[Interruption.] I am sorry if I am distressing hon. Members, but this is an important subject and I have drawn their attention to the amount of information on which the statement is based. Will the Minister tell us how the physically and mentally handicapped will be affected by the statement? Their transitional protection was due to come to an end in April 1986 and they are presumably facing the effects of these proposals.

[Mrs. Margaret Beckett]

The information about these regulations was made available to the House only at the last possible minute and in a form that makes them extremely difficult to assess. It is outrageous for the House to be treated in this way when it is clear that much of the information has been available for months.

Mr. Newton: Perhaps I can deal with the hon. Lady's questions in the order in which she asked them. We have made available more extensive monitoring and survey information than, I suspect, any Government have hitherto made available in connection with a matter of this sort. I shall not make any apologies for the fact that it has taken us some time to put the information together and ensure that it was available to the House at the right time.

The Central London Social Security Advisers Forum is a complex matter and it is difficult to comment on everything that the hon. Lady mentioned, but we think that the survey overstated the case. The survey appears to be based on the proposition that supplementary benefit should enable people to compete with tourists for hotels in central London — a proposition which we do not accept. We are not sure whether its data are complete. As the forum knows, DHSS officials merely responded to some advertisements in newspapers over a particular period and found 20 places advertising within the DHSS limits which were not included in the CLSSAF list, so we are sceptical about that.

The hon. Lady is right in saying that the meals allowance has not been increased for some time. On the other hand, one of the surveys by the social security policy inspectorate shows that a majority of claimants think that the meals allowance is adequate. Indeed, it is only a fraction less than the householder rate of supplementary benefit and is significantly higher than the non-householder rate of supplementary benefit. Therefore, we see no good reason for increasing it at present.

The hon. Lady suggested that not everyone would be fully satisfied with the residential care homes limits, and I am sure that that is the case, but she referred to the Royal National Institute for the Blind, and she will have registered the fact that one of the significant concessions in my speech was specifically directed at the elderly blind. Indeed, the general concession that I have announced for those in receipt of the higher rate of attendance allowance is expected, and certainly intended, to cover the group suffering from senile dementia, to which she understandably referred.

I simply do not understand the hon. Lady's point about transitional protection. Its purpose was to cover those in homes who were paying levels which, by definition, were above those that we thought it appropriate to meet through supplementary benefit. We protected them at that time and have concluded that it is right to improve that protection to ensure that their position is fully safeguarded. That is entirely sensible. Indeed, the whole package is far more sensible than the hon. Lady's rather grudging comments gave it credit for.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Does my hon. Friend accept that the majority of us do not take the carping view of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), that we were perfectly happy to listen to what he had to say, and that we shall study the basic information at our leisure, because there will be other opportunities to debate the subject? I wish to thank him for two particular matters. First, I thank him for responding so generously to the genuine problems of voluntary homes which look after the frail elderly, especially in Greater London. The Minister has made immense progress there and listened carefully to the many homes that put views to him.

Secondly, I welcome what he said about the transitional provisions, which 98·5 per cent. of the House understood, leaving 1·5 per cent. on the Opposition Benches who did not, and for what he said about people in accommodation not having to move as a result of the eight week short-term period. My hon. Friend has listened carefully to the points put to him, certainly by Conservative Members, and he deserves warm praise for what he has done.

Mr. Newton: Perhaps I may return the compliment by saying that I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the trouble that he took to ensure that I was put fully in the picture about some of the problems that were troubling him.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I must say that there is to be a debate on this matter. Following this we have a ten-minute Bill, which, I understand will be opposed, so that will delay the subsequent debate even further. I shall allow questions to continue until 5.15 pm and then we must move on. I ask hon. Members to make their questions brief.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): First, is it wise of the Government not to make any changes in the time limits and the exemption categories, considering that a constituent of mine, Simon Cotton, managed to take the Government to the High Court and the Court of Appeal and win? Is there not a case for extending those exemption categories? Secondly, as the fees increase for old people in nursing homes who are eligible for attendance allowance, should not the attendance allowance be unfrozen?

Mr. Newton: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first point is that I am not sure that I understand the connection that he makes with Simon Cotton, because the issue of exemption categories was separate from the Cotton case, and we adjusted the regulations in November — [Interruption.] I understand that Mr. Cotton was not exempt, but the case concerned the technical legitimacy of some parts of the regulations, and that has been corrected. At the same time, we took the opportunity to extend the exemption provisions to give the Secretary of State a discretionary power over exemption in cases of exceptional hardship.

I must make it clear that we do not propose to reintroduce the disregard of the attendance allowance, which undoubtedly led to excessive payments in many cases under the previous regime, as was generally accepted. In respect of residential care homes, we propose to introduce an additional limit for those in receipt of the higher rate of attendance allowance as a proxy measure of their likely need for care over and above that which would normally be provided in the home.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): Clearly both the statement and the accompanying evidence will repay study. However, will my hon. Friend say whether the summary of that evidence is that at present there is sufficient accommodation available in London, particularly for single people, at the present rate?

Mr. Newton: Our general view is that the evidence suggests that there is sufficient accommodation to meet legitimate needs for board and lodging, that the average price comes within our limits and that it is not appropriate to increase the limits for London, which my hon. Friend may have had in mind. I would not necessarily tie those comments to central London. This matter includes an issue on which we have already touched, which is whether the supplementary benefit system should be expected to enable people in London, or coming to London, to compete with tourists for hotel accommodation in central London.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Will the Minister explain to the House the impact of these proposals, and any others that he has in mind, on women in voluntary refuges run by Women's Aid? Will he particularly consider the supplementary benefit position of women, not only during their period in refuge, but at the point of transition when they leave the refuge and start looking for alternative accommodation?

Mr. Newton: The point about alternative accommodation is rather wide and goes into other aspects of the benefit system. Refuges would normally count as hostels, in which case the time limits would not apply. The limit would be unchanged under the proposals. As I have said, our evidence clearly suggests that the average charges for hostels are generally within the limits that we already have.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): I warmly welcome the various changes announced by my hon. Friend in respect of residential homes. He and I have spoken about such homes in the past. I recognise that central London is an expensive area in which to run such establishments. Does my hon. Friend concede that costs are also fairly high in areas close to London? Would it not have been better to introduce a tapering measure so that my constituency, which is the first one just over the border of Greater London, would not be adversely affected?

Mr. Newton: I might have predicted the points raised by my hon. Friend because, as he knows, I pass through his constituency—I do so only because the roads are now so much better—on the way to my constituency, several times each week. I think that my hon. Friend understands the problem. Generally, costs are higher in London than in other parts of the country. There is no such clear pattern elsewhere. Wherever we draw a line, there will be difficulties. I regret that my hon. Friend's constituency is just outside London, but the step that we have taken is the appropriate one for the moment.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Can the Minister assure us that, once the board and lodging regulations for new applicants bite on 28 July, he will carefully review the position over coming months? Some alliance Members fear that there will be great deal of confusion and hardship as a result of those regulations. I welcome the increases effected by the changes. Do they take proper account of the extra impositions placed on residential homes by the Residential Homes Act and the Residential Care Homes Regulations?

Mr. Newton: There is no change in the time limits. New claimants have been subject to a time limit since November. From 28 July, existing claimants as at 24 November will continue not be subject to a time limit. As I understand it, the arrangements are working satisfactorily. About a quarter of the younger claimants fall within the exemption categories.

At the time we made what I might call the interim increase — which was a substantial increase — last November, we had in mind the fact that increases in the charges for registration, and so on, were coming along. The £15 a week increase in the basic residential care limit, taking November and July together, takes sufficient account of the costs imposed by the registration system.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Does my hon. Friend accept that many of the changes that he has proposed are welcome, because they are well chosen and are well directed at specific deserving categories, notably the residential elderly in London? Does my hon. Friend agree that in the longer term there will be a problem that must be addressed? We must get more regional and category differentiation into some of the measures, because there is a danger that what is adequate in some parts of the country will be inadequate in central London, and vice versa.

Mr. Newton: Ideally, we should have more differentiation according to individual homes, instead of on a regional basis. That is why we attach so much importance to the working party with local authority organisations, and to the pilot studies using local authority social service assessment procedures. We hope to start these studies later this year.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I thank my hon. Friend for his sensitive attention to this complicated area. I thank him also for what he has done for the severely physically disabled in residential care homes. I also draw attention to the staggering sum spent on ordinary board and lodging payments. Is my hon. Friend satisfied that all that money is reaching the landlords for whom it is intended? If not, will he introduce a voucher system?

Mr. Newton: I am not satisfied that all the money reached the people for whom it was intended. We are aware that there was a degree of abuse, both among claimants and landlords. We have sought to tackle that. The result of the measures that we have taken, together with those that I have announced today, will be to reduce still further the amount of abuse, to concentrate what money is spent on those who have a genuine need for it, and to tighten up the system generally. It is clear from what my hon. Friend said that he will support our efforts.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I welcome my hon. Friend's excellent statement and his willingness to publish all the information available, including the Ernst and Whinney report. Does he agree that, on the basis of a rough, back-of-the-envelope computation, the increase that he has announced for residential care means an increase, since April 1985, of about 13·5 per cent. for most people in private residential care, and up to 27 per cent. for the more disabled, the blind and the handicapped? Is that not how we would expect a Conservative Government to behave — to target their money on those most in need?

Mr. Newton: I can only express my gratitude to my hon. Friend, without necessarily confirming her second figure. The first figure of 13·5 per cent. is about right. The increases for particular needy and vulnerable groups are substantial. I shall check my hon. Friend's mathematics later.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that some local authorities, such as Leicester county council, have used the Residential Homes Act to discriminate against the private sector? Will he ensure that when the order is drafted, it is done in such a way that local authorities cannot meddle in the benefit system?

Mr. Newton: The matter would be subject to a separate order. I endorse what my hon. and learned Friend said about the tendency of some local authorities to seek to demand from homes in the private and voluntary sector standards higher than they have in their own local authority homes. We are anxious that the registration and inspection procedures should be worked in a sensible and flexible way. Within the past few months we have strengthened our advice to local authorities in that respect.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I welcome my hon. Friend's statement and the good news that there is to be an increase in allowances for residential care homes. Noting my concern that it is a growth industry, can my hon. Friend assure the House that the payments will be properly policed? Has my hon. Friend considered making recommendations about a minimum fee and a maximum fee for those poor, unfortunate people who receive love and attention in residential care homes?

Mr. Newton: The regulations set maxima. Obviously, they do not set minima. We have enough difficulty deciding what the maxima should be, without seeking to venture down the other path. The object of policing is to get a benefits system which directs help to those who need it, and not to those who do not. Some aspects of ordinary board and lodging must be seen in the light of our announcement a few weeks ago about the injection of additional staff into the system to combat fraud generally and, not least, fraud in the board and lodging area.

Child Benefit (Upratings)

5.17 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the Secretary of State for Social Services, in the event of an increase in the Retail Price Index in any calendar year, to lay before Parliament the draft of an uprating order which will make an increase in child benefit with effect from the beginning of the following financial year of not less than a corresponding percentage; and to make future increases in child benefit a charge on the National Insurance Fund.

It is 40 years since Parliament adopted, with all-party support, the introduction of the family allowance. That was a weekly child credit which is now incorporated in the child benefits that are the subject of my proposed Bill. The weekly tax-free allowance, payable directly to the mother, has become the central feature of our system of family income support, and it has been relied on by millions of mothers to help with the feeding, clothing and care of what must now be the majority of British citizens. It is the most economical allowance in terms of administration, because it is a universal benefit. There is no case-work. It has nearly 100 per cent. take-up. It is highly popular. One reason for that is that mothers can rely on it every week in making their plans for the household budget.

In the course of the 1970s, it was decided by Parliament to amalgamate family allowances with the child tax allowances, which were included by William Pitt in our income tax system at the very beginning — before the end of the 18th century. The purpose of the child tax allowances was to leave families with children relatively better off than those without children to support. That is a social objective which I do not think would be seriously challenged by anyone.

I have sought the leave of the House to introduce the Bill because I am concerned at two recent developments in official policy regarding families with children. One is the proposal to replace the family income supplement, which is also normally drawn by the mother, with a new family credit to be added to the pay packet of the breadwinner. The Secretary of State agreed at Report stage on the Social Security Bill to reconsider that suggestion, which has been widely condemned, but we have not yet seen his alternative proposals. My view is that we must maintain the practice of paying the money to support the children direct to the caring parent.

The other evidence of official policy towards the support of the family which is causing concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House is the lack of commitment to maintaining the real value of child benefit. The object of my Bill is to ensure that the real value of child benefit, is not diminished by inflation with the passage of time. It is, in fact, a Bill almost identical to the one that I introduced with the support of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and one of my hon. Friends — now a member of the Government — in 1980. That Bill was not opposed by a single hon. Member, but the DHSS and the Treasury have not taken due notice of that fact.

If child benefit fails to hold its real value, the practical effect is to raise the share of the total tax burden which is borne by the section of the community — between a quarter and a third of all income tax payers — who have responsibility for the care of children. In so far as child benefit is the successor to family allowances, if its real value is reduced, there is a fall in the amount of help that we give to support poor families without obliging them to submit to a test of means.

Last year's uprating of child benefit effectively took 35p a week off its real value. The increase proposed for the coming year would not significantly restore that cut. The effect is to add to the difficulties of families seeking to keep out of the growing number of people dependent on means-tested benefits. That number has now risen to the terrible, unacceptable total of 14 million.

For those in work, an increase in child benefit has the effect of a cut in income tax, aimed selectively at families with children. For those who are not in work, a rise in child benefit assists poor families without diminishing in any way their incentive to take work and to save to improve their position.

In 1975, in the Committee on the Child Benefit Bill, an amendment proposed by my right hon. and learned Friend the present Paymaster General and Minister for Employment on behalf of the Conservative party and supported by, among others, my hon. Friend the present Economic Secretary to the Treasury and myself would have linked child benefit to the retail price index. Unhappily, under Treasury pressure, it was defeated by one vote.

In the debates on the Finance Bill in 1977, my right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Foreign Secretary and other prominent people made clear their commitment to the indexation of the tax allowances on the basis of the principle of the Lawson-Rooker-Wise amendment; but the child tax allowances were not covered by the new rules because they were already being phased out. If child benefit had been raised since 1979 in line with the personal and married persons tax allowances, it would now be £8, not £7, a week. What has happened in practice is that a sum of more than £600 million a year in potential spending power has been lost by families with children and has been distributed to taxpayers at large, the majority of whom do not have children to support.

My Bill is intended to ensure that this process does not continue. It proposes, in effect, that child benefit in future should be treated at least as favourably as the major tax allowances under the Lawson-Rooker-Wise formula, which is accepted on both sides of the House.

My Bill includes the proposal that the necessary funds should be drawn from the national insurance fund. This is not just a trick to get around the rules of order. I think that it is important to revitalise the national insurance fund and to resurrect the contributory principle. Since the contributions to the national insurance fund were put on an income-related basis in the 1970s, many people have come to regard their contributions merely as a form of income tax. I prefer to think that the acceptance of the liability to conribute to society by paying income tax should be seen as the qualification of the citizen for the benefits of a system of income support at the times of dependency, which of course are the reasons why we pay child benefit, unemployment benefit and old-age pensions. The national insurance principle should not be lost but, instead, should be relied on to produce the necessary buoyant source of funds for the provision of a basic income guarantee.

The gross cost per week of maintaining a child in community placements with foster parents range between £37 and £50 a week. The cost in local authority residential care ranges between £270 and £420 a week. Those figures surely prove that it is good sense to give every encouragement we can to parents to look after their children in their family home. I trust that the House will approve my motion.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I rise to oppose this measure being passed without a vote. I do so because, as the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has already reminded us, in 1980 the House passed a similar measure without any objection, yet the passing of that measure did not have the effect that we had hoped for on the collective judgment of the Government. Since 1980, we have had an early-day motion which has shown how strong is the support from both sides of the House for this measure. Indeed, those voluntary organisations interested in promoting child benefit have been busy at work and gained private assurances from numerous hon. Members.

Although I fully realise that votes in the House are only one way of bringing our collective view to weigh on the Government, I believe that it is a very important one. I think that I know my colleagues well enough to believe that the assurances they have given in private will be reflected, when they have a chance in the Division Lobbies, in public. Therefore, when the appropriate time comes, I shall divide the House. Needless to say, I hope that the Bill is passed with a substantial majority.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at Commencement of Public Business):—

[Bill 185.]

Foreign Affairs

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

5.38 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Yesterday, the House spent the entire day discussing South Africa. Today, the opportunity to consider, if the House wishes, the rest of the world has been truncated as a result of the proceedings so far. The House will be pleased to know that I do not intend to extend my sights that far. If points arise during the debate, especially if any hon. Member wishes to say anything further about South Africa, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office will deal with them when he replies to the debate. I shall concentrate mostly on East-West relations, the NATO Alliance and arms control. I shall also say a word about the European Community in the light of next week's European Council and the United Kingdom presidency of the Community, which starts on 1 July.

The previous full-day debate on foreign affairs was as long ago as November. One point on which there has been some development since then is terrorism. I shall not rehearse all the arguments provoked by the Libyan affair some weeks ago, but I underline the growing emphasis, which will be welcomed on both sides of the House, on the simple proposition that terrorism must not be seen to be a cost-free option for fanatics. It is of the utmost importance that the world, and especially the Western world, should continue to strenthen its practical defences against terrorism. We can take some encouragement from the significant progress made in that direction.

At the Tokyo summit and in the European Community, the Western approach has been increasingly concerted. The United Kingdom has played a key role in that search for consolidation and the important follow-up work is being undertaken with diligence and enthusiasm.

It is right, as hon. Members will remind me, that we should address ourselves also to the causes of terrorism. One of the most outstanding is in the middle east, where Her Majesty's Government continue to play an active role in diplomatic efforts towards a solution to the long-running Arab-Israel dispute. The House will recall my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's visit to Israel. I have had the opportunity to discuss in detail the position there with the American Secretary of State. King Hussein is again in Britain for talks, and the matter has been fully discussed in the EC Political Co-operation Committee.

The United Kingdom's position is unchanged; it remains based upon the principles of the Venice declaration. What is needed is action by the parties and, above all, agreement on who should participate in any talks. The judgment of all those with whom we have discussed it recently is that there is no scope for any new European Community initiative. During our presidency, we shall remain active and anxious to help in any way that we can.

That is not the only source of terrorism. The United Kingdom faces its own long-standing terrorist threat from the IRA. The House will be glad to know that the United States Senate has made valuable progress in its consideration of the extradition treaty. We warmly welcome the continuing commitment of the United States Administration to that extradition treaty and to the Anglo-Irish agreement.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that Mr. Geldof's remarks regarding the IRA and the murderers on the other side of the sectarian divide in Northern Ireland have been useful and should be understood by those people in the United States who, perhaps wrongly, oppose the approval of the extradition treaty?

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that some people in Britain have been held responsible for terrorist offences in Italy? In a written reply that I have just received, the Home Secretary said that the cases are being kept under review. If we wish to be consistent, should not those people wanted in Italy for terrorist crimes be deported from Britain?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman spoilt what looked like being a unique occasion. I cannot comment on his second point at such short notice. On the first point, I congratulate him on having, for the first time, interrupted me to make a point with which I wholly agree. I almost included it in my speech, and I am glad to welcome the hon. Gentleman's unusual contribution. I am sorry if I have embarrassed him.

Sadly, terrorism was a topic discussed during my visit to India some weeks ago. I expect that it will be raised again in our brief meeting with the new Indian Foreign Minister when he visits London on Monday next week. His visit will give me an opportunity, which I also take now, to underline the firm commitment of Her Majesty's Government to the territorial integrity and unity of India, to renew the offer that we have made to the Indian Government and to strengthen our bilateral extradition arrangements, which are a practical expression of both countries' shared opposition to terrorism.

Another topic discussed in India was drugs. The House will welcome the fact that the Indian Government have agreed to the stationing of two British drug liaison officers in Delhi and Bombay.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the Foreign Secretary, in the context of his discussions with the Indian Foreign Minister, be able to discuss the help that India could give to bring about constructive discussions with Sri Lanka? It is extremely important that something is done to bring an end to that conflict, which cannot be resolved by military means.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with that diagnosis of the state of affairs in Sri Lanka, which I was able to discuss during my visit to India. The Indian Government and Prime Minister take a close interest in it. If possible, I shall try to discuss it again later.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): There has been some anxiety about answers given during a recent foreign affairs question time, that the agreement on the placing of drugs officers had been made in principle, but that the officers were not yet in place. Will my right hon. and learned Friend press the Indian Foreign Minister on that point when he meets him?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand the need to secure the implementation of the agreement, but it is proceeding along the lines that my hon. Friend would wish. I share his understandable anxiety.

My journey to the subcontinent also included Pakistan. There I had the opportunity of seeing how well Pakistan is coping with the problems posed by the enormous number of Afghan refugees. I visited the Khyber pass and was immensly struck by the phrase used by the Pakistani Foreign Minister, who said that I should encounter there the noble ghosts of Britain's past. That was a striking and vivid phrase, but sadly, my impression after visiting that camp for Afghan refugees and also a Red Cross hospital was one of suffering on a massive scale. That is why the United Kingdom remains determined to keep high on the international agenda the Soviet Union's invasion and continued occupation of Afghanistan. If Mr. Gorbachev is serious in wishing to impress the world with the Soviet desire for peace, he should start in Afghanistan.

That brings me to the wider subject of East-West relations and gives me an opportunity to restate some basic facts about British foreign policy, starting with the fact that, for 40 years, the tragic division of the European continent has set the framework for a large part of Britain's foreign and defence policies. Of course, it must be acknowledged that history has given the Russians some cause to be suspicious of threats to their security, but it must also be said that, even on the most benevolent interpretation, their military posture constitutes the most massive over-insurance in history.

It is not just military tension that divides us. The Communist system has fanned Russian suspicions by preventing the free flow of people and ideas. The divide across the continent is not just military. It is also political and social. We cannot and should not seek a good relationship with the Russians at the price of ceasing to defend our values; that need not be the case. If we believed that, we should be counselling despair. The Government and I believe that East-West relations can be improved, and the tension reduced, through dialogue and exchanges.

If the search for improved relations is to be sustained, we must never allow ourselves to forget the vital difference between societies that are open and free, and societies that are closed and unfree. There is a difference.

NATO is a free alliance, based on genuinely shared values. Free peoples vote to join NATO as was evident in the resounding pro-NATO result of the referendum carried out by Spain's Socialist Government. But although NATO members are free, they are interdependent and they have freely chosen that interdependence. In that sense, Europe and the United States need each other. The commitment of American troops and arms to the defence of western Europe is central to our security. The contribution of Europe to the political cohesion and security of the free world is equally irreplacable.

I am glad to notice that there has been a growing enthusiasm among Labour Members for Europe as an ideal, not because they relish the European relationship for its own sake but because it represents a means of asserting their instinctive and growing hostility to the United States. For them, sadly, Europe is all too often an alibi for knee-jerk anti-Americanism. Our long-standing commitment to building up the strength and unity of Europe does not spring from hostility to the Atlantic relationship. Our aim is to strengthen that partnership and, for the sake of that partnership, the Alliance needs a stronger European partner to make it more balanced.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman comment on the reported remarks of Mr. Caspar Weinberger over the weekend that in future, NATO troops will not be confined to the area of the North Atlantic, but will be used anywhere?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have not seen those reported remarks, although I know that the question of how NATO should react to out-of-area problems has been long considered. However, I would rather not be drawn into that discussion now.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I do not blame the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad to have some sympathy from the right hon. Gentleman.

Since 1979, the Conservative Government have done a great deal, and with some success, to establish Britain's place in the European Community, and have worked, again with some success, to make the Community more effective. As a leading European nation, we welcome Europes growing confidence and coherence in dealing with economic problems. From time to time, economic tension is inevitable, and not always just across the Atlantic. There are new sources of economic tension, such as Japan and the new industrialised countries.

A strong European voice helps to make each of these problems more manageable. They are some of the issues that will be high on the agenda of Britain's six-month presidency of the Community starting next month. The presidency gives us the opportunity to secure progress on many fronts. One immediate objective is to avert, if we can, a major trade war between Europe and the United States. This was discussed at the Foreign Affairs Council in the first two days of this week, and the proceedings of that Council are reported in a written answer to a parliamentary question, given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker).

On the single question of the transatlantic trade conflict, it must be said that the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Community has affected some sections of United States trade. The economic effects of that are of modest significance when compared to the inestimable importance of binding two more countries through treaty ties to the Western democratic family of nations. We in Western Europe have been ready to pay an economic price for that, and we are entitled to look for a similar willingness from our friends in the United States.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): In the context of the adjourned debate on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill—and I agree with everything that my right hon. and learned Friend has said about the need for greater political and economic movement within Europe—will he confirm that there is no intention to move, through the use of the Bill, towards any kind of federal Europe?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I confirm that that question, which my hon. Friend says arises from the adjourned debate on the Bill, is best left to consideration within that context. I shall not be drawn into any such consideration now. I ask my hon. Friend not to be unduly perturbed by fantasies of a federal Europe and to take the matter calmly. Instead, let him join me in ensuring that the Community focuses on another practical question and one of great importance—the world agricultural problem. It is of value and importance that that was identified at the Tokyo summit, which called for global action to redirect the policies and structure of worldwide agricultural production.

It is also important that the general agreement on tariffs and trade round will include agricultural trade matters, as well as trade services. The problems of the CAP are a part, but only a part, of this world problem. Europe has a cereals surplus of about 17 million tonnes while America's cereals surplus is about 80 million tonnes. All the countries that are seeking to look after their agricultural communities, and struggling with the resultant surpluses, know that we must address the problem in concert. The CAP must adapt to changing circumstances, which must be a continuing process, and the CAP will be high on our agenda in the Community in the next six months.

We shall be dealing as well with internal Community issues. We need to keep a tight rein on the Community budget so that we live within our resources. We have a great deal to do in opening up the Community's internal market. A few weeks ago, in consultation with Ireland and Italy, we made three specific proposals for employment growth into the next decade. We hope that that will be the basis for an action plan during our office.

At the heart of all this is our commitment to setting up the largest market place in the world, within which people, goods and services can circulate easily. The United Kingdom is playing a leading and active part in formulating the European positions on all these subjects. We are doing so because we are, in that context, trusted and reliable partners. That would certainly not be the position if we followed the policies of Her Majesty's Opposition. They would isolate us not only in Europe but within NATO as well. That is why it is so important for us to have a clear understanding of Britain's place in the world, of the real threat to Britain's security. Only if we understand those things can we play our full part in collective defence and the collective pursuit of arms control.

The facts are not always palatable, but we do not do the East-West dialogue any service if we refuse to face them. The underlying realities have not changed. During the past 17 years, while the United States has observed a unilateral moritorium, the Soviet Union has amassed 300,000 tonnes of chemical weapon nerve agents, many times more than the rest of the world together. In Europe today, between the Atlantic and the Urals, the Warsaw pact has a superiority of some 1 million troops over NATO, three times as many tanks, three times as many artillery pieces and twice as many tactical aircraft.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Where do the figures come from?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not know why hon. Members are so astonished. These are the facts, as set out in the defence White Paper each year. It may be uncomfortable for Labour Members to know this.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, I shall not give way.

Soviet military might on that scale represents a danger for our security that we neglect at our peril. In the face of that threat, nuclear deterrence continues to play a key role in the defence strategy of Britain and NATO. There is no room for the irresolution and gullibility of the Labour party on a question such as this. We are right to provide bases for the NATO deterrent and to maintain the credibility and effectiveness of the British deterrent, and we are right to keep our conventional forces up to strength.

It is interesting to see the way in which Opposition Members have helped to establish the case that I seek to make. The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), who is not honouring us with his observations today—he may be in unarmed combat with the other David—said on 1 June:

"we should be ready to replace Polaris with a minimum deterrent."

I want to be even-handed and draw my witnesses from more than one place, so I agree, too, with what the right hon. Member from Leeds, East said a few days ago, which was:

"if you want to replace Polaris"— that is the aspiration of the right hon. Member for Devonport—

"there is, in fact, no alternative to Trident".

That is precisely why Her Majesty's Government are committed to the Trident programme. That is precisely why the logic of the Social Democratic party will lead at least the leader of that party to support the Trident programme. It will no longer be possible for the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), within the SDP, to cobble together a fudge with the unilateralists in the Liberal party. They know that better than anyone. The leader of the Liberal party argues and claims that the party's policy position does not amount to unilateralism, but with respect that is disingenuous.

A credible British deterrent in the 1990s means modernisation of the British deterrent now. By trying to put off that position, the leader of the Liberal party and the Liberal party are seeking to achieve unilateralism by obsolescence — obsolescence through inertia, a fate similar to that of the Liberal party in the past. [Interruption.] I am astonished to be receiving such acclamation from the Opposition Benches.

The chasm between those who oppose an independent British deterrent and those who favour an independent British deterrent will not easily be papered over by an SDP-Liberal commission. Until recently we thought that we knew where this massive alliance stood on these issues, represented as it is by the somewhat solitary looking figure of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). Until recently we knew that the Liberals were opposed to the maintenance of an independent deterrent and that they were opposed to the deployment of cruise. We knew that the SDP supported the deployment of cruise and that it was ready to replace Polaris. The position was perfectly clear—total disagreement. Now there is a much firmer position—a firmly proclaimed maybe. The leader of the Liberal party got it right, I suppose, when he said the other day on "Weekend World":

"If we can't agree before we get into government, how are we going to agree in government?"

I am happy to say that that is a question he will be able to contemplate for many years to come.

I turn to the subject in a more serious fashion. The British and French deterrents are in fact very modest in comparison with the Soviet nuclear arsenal, but certainly they are not so small that Mr. Gorbachev ignores them. On the contrary, he knows what they are. He knows that they are an effective deterrent. That is why he hopes to persuade us either to abandon them or to let them fall into obsolescence. That is the basis of the beguiling suggestion that was made to the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), that the Soviet Union will cut one missile for every strategic missile that we cut.

Mr. Healey: It was made to Lord Whitelaw.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That may be so, but Mr. Gorbachev gave a different answer to the right hon. Gentleman.

However, the proposal conceals a fatal and important flaw. The Russians have over 50 times more missiles than we have. That discrepancy did not in the least discourage the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East from accepting the offer with enthusiasm. It would have been amazing to see the look of astonishment on the face of Mr. Gorbachev when they snapped it up with enthusiasm. Mr. Gorbachev knows, even if the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East do not, that this missile for missile offer is total and utter nonsense. Those are not my words. They are the words both of The Guardian and of the Daily Mirror. As The Guardian said, and I do not often find myself quoting it:

"The millionaire and the pauper do not equalise their status by each throwing away a few £5 notes."

On that basis, the position of the Labour party—to give away our deterrent for next to nothing — is as dishonourable as it is ridiculous.

One wonders how it came about that the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East accepted this proposition. One can reflect upon the ventures of the Leader of the Opposition into the deeper waters of foreign policy and conclude that he is still not safe to be allowed out without his water wings, but when one comes to the case of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East we have a different explanation.

The House will remember that in the article he wrote the other day the right hon. Gentleman was positively carried away by the "sapphire skies" and "perfumed lilacs" of the Moscow spring. He waxed lyrical about them in The Observer. And increasingly it must be said, as we look at the right hon. Gentleman, that one gains the impression of someone who, in the twilight of his political career, is returning to his first undergraduate love. I only wish that he showed half as much commitment to the NATO Alliance as he brings to his self-appointed role as Mr. Gorbachev's PR man in this country.

Of course there is a role for dialogue between East and West. That is a dialogue in which the United Kingdom is playing and must play a leading part. Neither side needs to be armed to the teeth to be secure. Neither side, quite frankly, can afford to be armed to the teeth to be secure.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to say that the kind of response he is now making to Mr. Gorbachev was not the response of his Conservative colleagues when that meeting took place? I happened to be there. Will he tell the House whether he agrees that there should be a summit meeting between Mr. Gorbachev and President Reagan and, if he does, what influence he is exerting in that direction?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am just coming to the point that has been raised by the hon. Gentleman.

I was saying that there is certainly a role for the United Kingdom in promoting the dialogue that all of us want.

[Sir Geoffrey Howe]

Neither side can be armed to the teeth to be secure. Neither side can afford to be armed in that way. Of course we acknowledge, as I acknowledged earlier in my speech, that Soviet anxieties about security exist. We have no doubt, however, that patient diplomacy can promote Western interests and security for us all. That is one of the reasons why I have made a point of visiting the Soviet Union and all the countries of eastern Europe; that is why we were very glad to welcome Mr. Gorbachev here in December 1984; that is why we intend to maintain the dialogue between the Prime Minister and Mr. Gorbachev; that is why, on the recent parliamentary visit to the Soviet Union, to which the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) referred, the Lord President of the Council did just that; and that is why I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the Soviet Foreign Minister, Mr. Shevardnadze, is coming to Britain on 14 and 15 July. It will be an important visit. I am looking forward to our discussions on arms control, regional and bilateral questions and human rights.

In pursuing that dialogue it would be foolish to expect that tremendous unilateral gestures by the United Kingdom will in themselves be a catalyst for agreement between the super powers. Certainly we wish that summit meeting to take place—and more than one such meeting in due course. The United Kingdom can, does and will continue to play a part in seeking, to bring about progress.

We believe that the Soviet Union is now seeking seriously to join the United States in the search for an agreement. Certainly it makes sense to proceed upon the basis of that presumption. That is what we mean when we say that we believe that we can "do business with Mr. Gorbachev." Mr. Gorbachev has his own reasons for wanting a significant arms control agreement. He knows the implications of a continued arms race for the Soviet economy, which cannot indefinitely satisfy both the military and the Soviet consumer. The Soviet arms build-up already absorbs——

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): That applies to all other countries.

Mr. Geoffrey Howe: I am not seeking to challenge that. One of the most profound reasons for seeking success in the search for arms control is the burden of arms expenditure on all nations. I do not need to be reminded of that. Indeed, anybody who has held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer knows that as clearly as anybody else.

However, for the Soviet Union, the arms build-up already absorbs nearly 16 per cent. of its gross national product, and on present trends that percentage will continue to grow. So Mr. Gorbachev, like every other responsible leader, has a strong interest in reaching agreement on arms control.

Mr. Freeson: The reason for my intervention was that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was singling out one major power for his remarks in connection with the balance between economic prosperity and the arms burden. The whole world cannot carry on like this. Millions of people are starving in Africa, while millions of other people throughout the rest of the world are living in poverty. That will lead to war, unless all of us can do something about it, instead of just pointing the finger at others.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is remaking the point that I made, but with this important addition. The countries of the Western world have to take decisions about their arms expenditure as a result of democratic consideration through the ballot box and the House of Commons. There is always the check of democratic control on the arms expenditure of democratic Governments. The Soviet Union, because of its political structure, is far better able to sustain the massive arms expenditure that it does. It is only on that basis that it is able to sustain the massive 16 per cent. of its GNP on arms. For the Soviet Union, as well as for other countries, the need to recognise the constraints of economic resources in the end begins to tell and that is why there is that motivation.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend also agree that the Soviet Union spends far less on paying its troops and much more on hardware than we do?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Yes, many components of Soviet expenditure are worth studying.

Mr. Healey rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman will have his opportunity in a moment.

Mr. Healey: I thank the Foreign Secretary so much.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The question to which I want to address myself for the last minute or so——

Mr. Corbyn: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, not now, I am sorry.—is how best to move towards the agreement that we want. Until recently, it must be said, the Russian approach has consisted mainly of unrealistic proposals, backed up by well-orchestrated appeals to world opinion. That is no way to proceed. But there are elements in the Soviet proposals, including those outlined by Mr. Gorbachev in his speech two days ago, which we believe deserve exploration. We must emphasise that progress can only be made not at press conferences but at the negotiating table. Of course, adequate verification measures remain all-important.

The recent discussion of SALT II has raised those problems starkly. The United States has been right to stick until recently to the terms of that agreement. It is right now to dismantle its two Poseidon submarines accordingly. But it must be said that the best should not be the enemy of the good. It is our hope that the United States will not feel the need to abandon the SALT II limits, despite the evidence that it has of Soviet non-compliance.

Of course, there is also an onus on the Soviet Union to demonstrate its willingness to respect those agreements strictly. If not, the mutual confidence required for future progress is in danger and everyone loses. So it is important to remember that a dialogue is taking place between East and West on these important issues. The latest Warsaw pact statements in Berlin and Budapest are now looking more like a serious response to the West's proposals.

Finally, let me remind the House of those proposals in simple terms — comprehensive and coherent arms reduction proposals that were reiterated by NATO members last month in Halifax. There are five distinct elements of the NATO arms control package—first, a 50 per cent. cut in strategic nuclear weapons; secondly, the total elimination of intermediate range nuclear forces—an entire category; thirdly, a worldwide total ban on chemical weapons; fourthly, the progressive reduction of conventional forces in Europe, eventually covering the whole continent from the Atlantic to the Urals; and, finally, wide-ranging confidence-building measures. That approach serves the interests of not just the United Kingdom but the Alliance as a whole. It is an approach in support of which the United Kingdom will continue to play its full part.

Arms control has to be tackled responsibly. As a distinguished British elder statesman has said,

"it is the stability of the military balance between NATO and Warsaw Pact which has kept Europe at peace for over 30 years. . . NATO's nuclear strategy is an essential part of that balance. To threaten to upset it by refusing to let America base any of her nuclear weapons in Britain would make war more likely, not less likely".

Those words are just as true today as they were then spoken in 1981 by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East.

We have taken account of the realities. We have worked and will continue to work to protect and promote British interests, not just in arms control and East-West dialogue, but across the whole range of foreign policy issues. We shall continue to go on doing just that.

6.14 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): I must start with the unfamiliar experience of congratulating the Foreign Secretary on a very lively speech. I have sometimes made rather unkind ovine comparisons about him, but I am bound to say that for much of his speech this afternoon he was frisking like a lamb, although on some occasions he presented a slightly less agreeable spectacle verging on the bizarre or even the macabre, like a dead fleece twitching. Nevertheless, taken all in all, I could not see more than six Conservative Members asleep at any time in his speech, and that must pretty well be a record.

Like the Foreign Secretary—unlike him I mean what I say—I plan to concentrate my remarks on the state of East-West relations and their impact on relations between America and Europe inside the Western Alliance. I want to discuss a little something that the Foreign Secretary hardly mentioned, although it is a British foreign affairs debate — the proper role of Britain in this complex situation. However, I must say one word about a matter which bears or could bear very directly on East-West relations and which the Foreign Secretary practically ignored, and that is the dangerous situation at the moment in the middle east.

We have a war in the Gulf between Iran and Iraq that could reach a climax this summer if Iran, as is not impossible, wins its summer offensive and then moves south into the Gulf states or exerts pressure on those states. This is an issue on which the Soviet Union and the United States seem to have recognised a common interest, but I am deeply disturbed that the new French Conservative Government seem to be attempting to intervene in that war on the side of Iran. I hope that when the Under-Secretary replies he will say something about Her Majesty's Government's attitude towards that new French adventure.

The other part of the middle east situation which presents serious problems is the growing tension between Israel and Syria. The Foreign Secretary may recall that only a few weeks ago when President Reagan was in Tokyo he made some remarks about Syria which were interpreted by Mr. Rabin, the Israeli Defence Secretary, in Washington that day, as implying the readiness of the United States to support military action by Israel against Syria. I am glad to say that Prime Minister Shimon Peres in Israel immediately took pains to deny that Israel had any aggressive intentions of that nature. But the party composition of the Israeli Government is due to change in October, and I hope that the Under-Secretary will tell us something about Her Majesty's Government's attitude——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Minister of State will reply.

Mr. Healey: I am sorry. I apologise for downgrading him. He certainly deserves to be Minister of State. I hope that he will also be a Privy Councillor. My word, what a wonderful life.

I hope that the Minister of State will say something about this because it is a situation which could turn dangerous at any time over the next few months, indeed during the summer recess.

Let me deal now with the major problem of East-West relations. I think that all of us in the House welcomed the summit conference between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev in Geneva last year. We all hoped that it had established a degree of personal confidence between the two leaders which would make rapid progress possible on major areas of disarmament and some of the regional problems which are currently the most likely cause of war, such as the middle east, which I have just mentioned, Afghanistan—I endorse what the Foreign Secretary said about that and we raised it with Mr. Gorbachev when we were in Moscow—southern Africa and Central America. I hope that he is as disappointed as we are that there has been no visible sign of progress in East-West relations since the Geneva summit. Rather, the reverse has been the case. In their press statement after the summit, President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev assured the world that neither side sought military superiority over the other. President Reagan has repeatedly made speeches since then which suggest that he seeks military superiority over the Soviet Union, and notably in a speech at a recent ceremony in a marine training school in the United States. Mr. Weinberger and his Mephistopheles, Mr. Perle, have frequently gone much further.

President Reagan has lumped Mr. Gorbachev together with Castro, Arafat and Gaddafi as enemies of peace, although when that was pointed out to him he said:

"I must have goofed some place because, believe me, I do not put him in the same category."

Inevitably, world statesmen take seriously the words used about them by other world statesmen. In some areas the United States Administration have added to these verbal insults some real injuries. The bombing of Tripoli led to the postponement of the Shultz-Shevardnadze meeting which was supposed to set the agenda for the forthcoming second summit in the United States. The Foreign Secretary must agree that Britain's support for that bombing postponed the Shevardnadze visit to London, although I was delighted to hear from him today that that visit take place in a few weeks.

President Reagan's public decision to abandon the SALT 2 constraints next autumn on the eve of his proposed date for the next summit conference must be seen by everybody who follows these events as a damaging blow to East-West relations. In the same week Washington vetoed proposals to improve human contacts between East and West. Those proposals had already been agreed in Berne by the United States local representative and were supported by all of America's allies.

All these decisions by the United States Government were taken in flat defiance of the known views of all their allies. They deliberately sought to ascertain those views through visits by General Walters to Europe about the Tripoli bombing and a visit by Mr. Nitze to Europe about the denunciation of SALT 2. I am surprised that in the course of his speech the Foreign Secretary paid no attention to the great strains which have undoubtedly been imposed on the alliance as well as on East-West relations by those actions of the American Administration.

On top of the military and political strains on the Alliance there is now—the Foreign Secretary used these words—a trade war looming because the United States has decided to cut its imports of European food and drink in retaliation for what it sees as discrimination against some of its products as a result of the entry of Spain and Portugal to the Common Market. I fully endorse what the Foreign Secretary said about this matter, and I hope that his actions will follow his words. As an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, nobody knows better than the Foreign Secretary that a trade war between two parts of an alliance would have the most damaging political and military consequences.

Mr. Winnick: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what causes much offence in western Europe but certainly not to the Foreign Secretary and his supporters is the way in which the United States supports by various means terrorist regimes in Latin America in places such as Guatemala and certainly in Chile, while at the same time doing its best by military and diplomatic means to undermine a Government the United States does not like, the Government of Nicaragua?

Mr. Healey: I support my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on that matter. One thing that slightly surprised me in the Foreign Secretary's speech was his suggestion that his loyalty to all the divagation in American policy was strengthening Britain's position in Europe. He must know better than anybody that the apparent deceit that he perpetrated against his European colleagues on the eve of the Tripoli bombing, which he knew would take place, and his support for that bombing and his position on central America have all caused serious strains between us and our European allies.

While all that has been happening on one side, the Soviet Union has made a series of new offers to the United States and the West on all the major areas of the disarmament negotiations, and so far no positive response has been elicited from the United States or the West on any one of them. Mr. Gorbachev made it clear to the noble Lord Whitelaw and to the other members of the recent delegation to Moscow that he has no interest in going to the United States for a second summit simply as an actor in a television commercial, the purpose of which is to boost President Reagan's image as a peacemaker. Mr. Gorbachev will not go the summit if there is no prospect of concrete results coming from his visit. The British Government have always rightly taken the view that summit conferences which do not produce concrete results are likely to do more harm than good.

There has been much speculation in the West, and we had a little from the Foreign Secretary today, about whether the new Soviet proposals were intended seriously and sincerely or were made simply to divide the Alliance. I recently returned from the Soviet Union. I was a member of an Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation and I was deputy leader to the deputy leader of the Government—a sort of gentleman's gentleman. The impressions which I will describe of this visit would be endorsed by all the other members of the delegation. The delegation consisted of hon. Members from all parts of the House, and we would all agree on our impressions, although we might draw different conclusions about the policies that the Government ought to follow.

We all left the Soviet Union with the conviction that Mr. Gorbachev sincerely wants disarmament, not because he sees himself as potentially militarily inferior to the United States, because in some key areas he is potentially superior, not least in space, as was pointed out in "Jane's" this week. That is especially true in the shadow of the recent dsasters in the American space programme. Mr. Gorbachev sincerely wants disarmament because he knows that it will be much more difficult to carry out his plans for economic reform in the Soviet Union if he cannot make cuts in his programme of defence spending. I endorse what the Foreign Secretary said about that, although I found that the slightly contemptuous way in which he described the situation came ill from a key member of a Government who came into office pledged to increase defence spending by 3 per cent. a year and have just decided for economic reasons to cut it by 6 per cent. over the next three years. I shall come back to that in a moment.

We concluded that Mr. Gorbachev genuinely wants disarmament. Secondly, I think we all agree that he has brought from Stavropol a fresh mind to Soviet foreign policy and is trying to feel his way towards a new approach. The House will know that since the Russian revolution of 1917 Soviet foreign policy has been dominated by the doctrine of the two camps — the capitalist camp and, as the Soviets call it, the Socialist camp — which are doomed to be locked in everlasting conflict until the final victory of the Socialist camp. This doctrine was fleshed out in some detail by Zhdanov shortly after the second world war.

To me, as to any student of the Soviet Union, the most important single statement made by Mr. Gorbachev since he took over was made in his speech at the recent party congress in Moscow. In it, he buried the doctrine of the two camps for good, and invoked the concepts of Leninist theory in order to justify that burial. I should like to read what he said, because it was a speech to the party faithful by the head of the party and not a speech by the leader of the Soviet Union to foreign journalists. He said:

> "The prevailing dialectics of present-day development consist in a combination of competition and confrontation between the two systems and in a growing tendency towards interdependence of the countries of the world community. This is precisely the way, through the struggle of opposites, through arduous effort, groping in the dark to some extent, as it were, that the controversial but interdependent and in many ways integral world is taking shape."

That profoundly important statement was made by the leader of the Soviet Communist party and the head of the Soviet Union. It implies a totally different approach to the problems of the outside world. I believe that it will prove as cataclysmic in its consequences as the famous secret speech of his predecessor, Khrushchev, to another Soviet party congress 30 years ago.

The bombardment of new proposals from Mr. Gorbachev during the past 12 months represents an attempt to achieve that interdependence by, to quote him, "groping in the dark . . . as it were".

From our visit we gained the impression that a great upheaval is still going on in the personalities and structure of the machine that makes foreign policy in the Soviet Union. Mr. Shevardnadze, a man with deep party experience but no experience of world affairs, has been made Foreign Secretary. Mr. Dobrynin, a man with deep experience of diplomacy, who has spent 24 years in Washington, has been put in charge of the party machine. Mr. Yakovlev, who has served as ambassador in Canada, is a key figure in Mr. Gorbachev's inner Cabinet.

I think that we all agree that Mr. Gorbachev is now running Soviet foreign policy. That is a quite different situation from that prevailing during the latter years, at least, of Mr. Brezhnev, when Mr. Gromyko, now the President, was running foreign policy. We also gained the impression, which was recently confirmed in a public statement by Mr. Falin, the head of the Soviet news agency in Bonn, that because of the upheavals in the structure in Moscow, it is taking time for some of Gorbachev's publicly stated ideas to work through to the coalface of negotiations in Geneva.

One good example is the change in Soviet policy on research into star wars. Mr. Gorbachev first said that he thought that there should be a distinction between research in laboratories or universities, and the testing of models, in an interview with Time magazine journalists last autumn in Moscow. But that surfaced for the first time as a formal negotiating position in the recent proposals made privately by Mr. Gorbachev to President Reagan, the details of which have been slowly leaking out during the past few weeks.

If we are wise, we must accept that the real nature of the new Soviet negotiating position will take some time to work through. But it is already clear that in almost every aspect of disarmament Mr. Gorbachev is making his negotiators adopt a very different attitude towards the problem of verification. He has made it clear, as Mr. Zagladin made it clear to our delegation when we were in Moscow, that the Soviets are now prepared to allow on-site verification in many of the most important areas. I believe that those changes are important, and I deeply regret the fact that the Foreign Secretary completely failed to refer to them. He just treated us to a turgid rehash of the defence White Paper without paying the slightest attention to those very important new initiatives or to that important new trend of policy in the Soviet Union.

I shall now look at the American side of the equation. The Foreign Secretary, in his usual way, accused anybody who attacked any aspect of President Reagan's policy of being anti-American. Let me remind him that I have said nothing in criticism of President Reagan's policy that has not been said with far greater force by American ex-Ministers with whom I have worked, as Secretary of State for Defence and as Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Washington. I think, for example, of Mr. McNamara. Indeed, my criticisms of the President's strategic defence initiative had already been made by each of the last three American Presidents: two Republicans, Mr. Ford and Mr. Nixon; and one Democrat, Mr. Carter.

The most telling criticism of President Reagan's foreign policy was made by one of the most outstanding contributors to American international policy since the war. I refer to Mr. George Ball, who served as Minister of State under several American Presidents. He said that American foreign policy today reminded him very much of a series of pictures in a strip cartoon called, I believe, "Peanuts". That cartoon figures a rather innocent young man called Charlie Brown and a young lady who bears some resemblance to our Prime Minister called Lucy. Lucy is talking to Charlie Brown, and says: "Charlie, you should know that on this great ocean liner of life, upon which we have both embarked, there is a sun deck and deck chairs. Some of us will put up our deck chairs facing the stern of the ship so that we can see where we are coming from, and some of us will put up our deck chairs facing the prow of the ship so that we can see where we are going. Charlie, where are you going to put your deck chair?" Charlie replies, "Well I just don't seem able to get my deck chair unfolded." That paints a picture of American foreign policy today.

The tragedy is that the struggle between the ideologues and the pragmatists that we witnessed when President Reagan first took over, still continues. We had a period of some months when the pragmatists appeared to be winning. We have had periods, such as the one in which we are now enmeshed, when the ideologues have been winning. Nothing shows that more clearly than the President's surprising and confusing behaviour on SALT 2. He began by saying only a few weeks ago that he would unconditionally break the limits imposed by SALT 2 and that SALT 2 no longer had any force. A few days later he told the world at a press conference that his decision would depend on whether the Soviet Union could be persuaded "to join in things they are talking about: arms control and arms reductions."

The President then said that he would have to break SALT 2 because it was blocking plans to modernise America's strategic forces. Of course all his acolytes joined in. Mr. Larry Speakes publicly contradicted the President and said that SALT was dead. The next day, the Secretary of State, Mr. Shultz, said:

"I do not like the use of the word 'dead'".

There is similar confusion over America's reaction to the latest Soviet proposal for deep cuts in strategic forces on condition that the anti-ballistic missile treaty is prolonged for another 15 to 20 years. For the first time, the Russians have said that they would not oppose research into space weapons, provided that there were no tests of models. That is a proposal which the British Government should solidly endorse. The Prime Minister's only reason for opposing a ban on research into strategic defence was that it would not be possible to verify research, but the Russians are now offering to forgo a ban on the sort of research that cannot be verified and to have a ban on tests of models, all of which can be verified. When the Minister of State replies, I hope that he will tell us that, now that the Russians have removed the obstacle which prevented the Prime Minister from opposing star wars when she first met President Reagan on the matter some 18 months ago, the Government will change their mind.

We are told by the newspapers that Mr. Kampelman, the President's negotiator, believes that it is well worth exploring the offer and that President Reagan sent an encouraging letter to Mr. Gorbachev at the same time. We read in this morning's edition of The Times, however, that a senior Pentagon official — Mephistopheles again, I suspect — Mr. Perle, told the defence correspondent of The Times only yesterday that America would reject the Soviet offer because it would block star wars.

It is difficult for any Government, allied or otherwise, to negotiate with Washington when its policy is so confused and contradictory. It is not anti-American to say that, because this criticism is made in the United States day in and day out by those who have been responsible for American defence policy, foreign policy and disarmament policy.

In spite of this, I think that we would all agree — those of us who visited Moscow recently — that there is no question but that the Soviet Union is anxious to negotiate on all these issues if it is humanly possible to do so. One advantage of having Mr. Dobrynin at the top of the party policy structure in this area with 24 years of experience of the Washington jungle and many close contacts — even friends — among senior American politicians and officials is that the Russians will not easily take no for an answer. Although the abandonment of SALT 2 by the United States, which is threatened for this autumn, could allow the Soviet Union to establish a commanding lead over the United States by doubling the number of warheads on their intercontinental SS18s—as the Foreign Secretary will know, this is why the American chiefs of staff were insistent that the United States should observe the limits — I believe that their response to anything that the Americans do will be proportionate, and that they will wait and see before they take any action.

With American policy so contradictory and so confused, I believe that Mr. Gorbachev and President Gromyko—the latter made the same point when he met us — were sincere when they said that they hoped that the United Kingdom could play a constructive role in helping the super-powers to reach agreement. President Gromyko made a comparison with the role that Sir Anthony Eden had played on many occasions during on many occasions during and after the war. I have no doubt that this is why, in spite of disappointment with some aspects of British policy, Mr. Gorbachev has decided finally that his Foreign Secretary should meet our Foreign Secretary to discuss these matters.

I shall run quickly over the areas where I believe that the British Government could make a useful contribution. First, there is the ban on chemical weapons. From the way that the Foreign Secretary discussed the matter, one would not have thought that the British Government were deeply concerned about the American proposal to produce binary weapons and have refused to commit themselves to receive them if the American Government request them to do so. Perhaps the Foreign Secretary will confirm that. No, he has sunk in a study of his papers. That is very wise.

Britain is chairing the discussions that are taking place in Geneva on a ban on chemical weapons. I understand that Mr. Issraelyan has been in London this week — he may still be here — to discuss this issue. I hope that the Minister of State will tell us something about the attitude that the British Government will take in the talks. We were told in Moscow that the Soviet Government are now prepared to allow the on-site inspection of the destruction both of stocks of chemical weapons and their production facilities. That certainly removes a major obstacle — perhaps not every obstacle — to an agreement. The whole world would breathe more easily if that could be achieved.

The second area in which I believe that we have a central responsibility is negotiation for a comprehensive ban on nuclear tests. We on the Opposition Benches — I think that I speak for all the Opposition parties that are represented this afternoon, but I am not quite sure what the latest position of the party for Devonport is on this matter — believe that a comprehensive test ban treaty would be by far the first and best contribution to a complete freeze on the development of new weapons.

Scientists have long believed that verification is possible even without on-site inspection. We were told that the Soviet Government have now agreed to on-site inspection of test sites both by national and international means, by which I would assume that they would accept the manning of monitoring stations inside the Soviet Union by representatives of the non-aligned states, which have promised to undertake this responsibility.

We are still told that the United Kingdom wants such an agreement; the Prime Minister has said so on many occasions. Why does she not invite the Soviet Union and the United States to meet Britain, as they did up to a few years ago when America broke off the talks, to discuss the introduction of a ban? Or are we sliding into outright opposition to a ban because the Ministry of Defence believes that we need tests to perfect the Trident warhead? I was confused, as I expect all Members were, by an answer given on 13 May by the Secretary of State for Defence, who said:

"We all wish that a way can be found as soon as possible of eliminating nuclear weapons altogether; but, while they are there, testing is essential for safety and operational reasons."

The British Government have never said that in the past. But then the dear old Secretary of State for Defence went on to say:

"The Government's policy is to do everything possible to negotiate a comprehensive test ban treaty as soon as verification can be made credible." — [Official Report, 13 May Vol. 97, c. 542.]

What the hell is the Government's policy? Are they in favour of a ban if verification is possible, or are they against one as long as nuclear weapons exist? I hope that the Minister of State will clear up this disturbing confusion. Until the Secretary of State for Defence made his statement neither the Government nor any other Government had maintained that testing of existing weapons was necessary.

The third area where progress is possible and where we can play a role is on the strategic defence initiative. The Russians have now accepted the Prime Minister's position that it is not possible to verify a ban on research in people's heads or laboratories. It is possible, however, to ban the testing of models. Indeed, both sides announce these tests when they are carried out because they know that the other side will observe them.

Will not the Government reconsider their support for the strategic defence initiative? Any commercial gains that they might have expected from co-operation with the initiative went for a burton a long time ago. We know that British firms now expect at the most a few scores of millions of dollars against the $1,500 million for which the previous Secretary of State for Defence was asking. We know also that British participation in the research will be damaging to our own research efforts and will be subject to technological control by the United States. I hope that the Minister of State will tell us whether the Government are prepared, in the light of this new situation, to change their position on SDI.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As one who has constituents in Heriot-Watt university working on optical lasers, may I tell my right hon. Friend that some of those engaged in the work are worried—and not before time—about intellectual property rights, an issue which has not been sorted out?

Mr. Healey: I am aware of that, and I hope that the Government will publish the memorandum of understanding. The German memorandum has already been leaked totally to a German newspaper and some of the features of the German memorandum of understanding are profoundly disturbing to us in Britain. There can be no security reason for the British Government not publishing the same details.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the subject of SDI, is it not obvious that Mr. Gorbachev and the Soviet authorities are so anxious to come towards the West and scale down the expense of their armaments because the United States is developing SDI and the fear of the expense of that is too great for the Soviet authorities to contemplate?

Mr. Healey: The Soviet authorities obviously do not want to spend money on SDI. I am glad that the hon. and learned Gentleman has that feeling. We are always told by the United States that the Soviet Union is spending more money on SDI than the United States. That, of course, is totally untrue and I am glad that the hon. and learned Gentleman agrees with me on that.

The point about SDI is that the Soviet Union does not want to have to spend more money in an area which will compete with the introduction of new technology into its own industry. However, it is capable of doing so if it is forced. It does not want to spend more money on any weapons, nor do we in Britain—which is quite clear from the Government's decision—or the American Congress. The real question is whether we can turn those economic pressures into useful disarmament agreements. I believe that we are now moving into a world in which the pressure of defence spending on national budgets is becoming intolerable for everybody, for us in the West no less than for the Soviet Union.

The American Congress is imposing a cut on planned American defence spending of $80 billion over the next three years. The British Government, originally pledged to a 3 per cent. annual increase, have now announced a 6 per cent. cut in defence spending over the next three years. I have an increasing feeling, which some arms control experts have had for some time, that perhaps a series of leap-frogging unilateral cuts will be the way in which, in the end, some form of disarmament is finally achieved. It is vital that, as this process proceeds, the unilateral cuts which are made by the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union should not destabilise the balance between the two sides, especially in Europe. Again, that is where Britain's position is vital. Stability requires America's commitment to the defence of western Europe. Since the war NATO has always been an indispensable foundation for Britain's security. However, at the moment NATO is desperately one-sided and needs much more influence from Europe. I think that that is common ground between both sides of the House.

The key contribution which Europe can make towards NATO is in conventional weapons. That has been made clear again and again by American Administration spokesmen and by American Congressmen such as Senator Sam Nunn, who is threatening massive cuts in America's conventional contribution unless the Europeans improve their conventional contribution. There is no chance of Britain improving its conventional contribution if it goes ahead with the Trident programme. I am glad to see the Minister of State agree with that. Trident will be taking 40 per cent. of our budget for equipment in a couple of years. If that money was spent on improving the equipment of our reserve force, it is calculated that we could double our ready conventional forces in central Europe.

It is now more than 40 years since the end of the second world war. Enormous changes have taken place in every part of the world. Nobody, least of all the Government, who are chopping and changing their policies on all these issues from week to week, should be ashamed of confronting new situations with new policies. In 1945 many of us believed that George Orwell's prediction for 1984 was a realistic sketch of how the Communist countries might develop by that year. It has proved to be far from the reality. The Foreign Secretary, like me, went to Hungary recently. In many respects that country is more free than many countries in western Europe—certainly Greece under the colonels and Turkey. In many ways I think that Budapest has recreated the Austro-Hungarian empire in a far more effective form. Its relations with Austria are far closer than those with its Communist neighbour, Romania, as the Foreign Secretary knows very well. Immense changes have taken place in the Soviet Union even during the 25 years in which I have been a regular visitor.

In the United States power has shifted from the eastern seaboard, with its traditional and human concern with western Europe, to the southern and western states with increasing Hispanic and Asian populations which exert a growing influence on American policy. Whatever we do, American attention will be increasingly focused on Latin America and the western Pacific.

Those trends offer opportunities as well as some dangers for western Europe. In Britain we have every interest in seeking to build a new international security system based on co-operation between the two alliances and on co-operation, which I hope that the Foreign Secretary was attempting to suggest in one part of his speech, between eastern Europe and western Europe. I believe that in this new developing world, in which we in the West are groping in the dark no less than the Russians, Britain will play the central role which I believe it has the political and economic capacity to perform.

6.56 pm

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): I am extremely flattered to be called this early in the debate, and it is an honour and pleasure to follow the speech of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). I confirm what he said about the harmony of the recent delegation to the Soviet Union and I should like to pay a tribute to him, as he has paid tribute to the Lord President, for the way in which, in all the private meetings, he supported the Lord President and the delegation as a whole and our national position. We are much indebted to him for that.

I want to deal with these points in my own way during my speech, but, in a matter-of-fact way, I shall confirm what the right hon. Gentleman said about the four basic conclusions that came out of the Inter-Parliamentary Union visit to Moscow.

The first conclusion, with which I would agree—I shall confirm all four—is that Mr. Gorbachev sincerely wants disarmament. I would agree that there is a new approach to Soviet foreign policy, and I would endorse that rather telling quote from the speech at the Party Congress to the party. I would also confirm the third conclusion, that the structure of the making of foreign policy is very much Mr. Gorbachev's in the running thereof. That should not be forgotten. However, I would add that one gets the impression that he is running foreign policy with a relaxed and reasonably consulted and agreeable leadership. In other words, he is taking advice and is relaxed with those who advise him. I would agree with the fourth and final conclusion, that the Soviet Union is anxious to negotiate. I wanted to read all those into the record because they are important.

I shall make one preliminary point before I begin what I want to say. It is relevant to my own speech. It is nonsense, in terms of taking a grip and assessing approaches that come out of the Soviet Union, always to say that those approaches amount to propaganda, that their major motivation is one of propaganda and that anyone who happens to agree with any part of them is somehow being anti-American. I shall address the House frankly. I would say to the House, as has been said before—I have said it myself in previous debates on foreign affairs—that in the course of dealing with Americans and American policy one is only making the same points as many people in the United States are making themselves. There is grave concern in the United States, as we all know, over aspects of foreign policy. I shall deal with some of the specifics, although not at too great a length.

I should like to cover the current situation from both the Washington and the Moscow angle and then to concentrate a little on the position of Britain, the contribution that we can make, and how vigorously we should prosecute the options available to us.

It is impossible to ignore the United States in a foreign affairs debate, because our policy is rightly intertwined with that of our major ally. We are extremely dependent upon the Americans. Questions therefore arise as to how independent we can be in our approaches to them and our comments about them. I hope that the whole House also agrees that the NATO Alliance must be the backbone of any foreign policy that we may have. We are in the debt of the United States and we shall remain so. I approve of that and fully go along with it. Moreover, we are more dependent on the United States than most countries because, as a result of a decision taken in Nassau in 1961, we depend upon the Americans for our national nuclear deterrent. I fully agree with that policy and differ from the right hon. Member for Leeds, East and the Labour party on that aspect, although with the foreign policy aspects of the right hon. Gentleman's speech a large measure of agreement will emerge.

My hon. Friends do not want to hear me go on about the special relationship with the United States, but it is important to acknowledge it. We are dealing with friends and with a democracy. We are dealing with people who differ among themselves and we can be reasonably vigorous in our approach to them. I believe that in the longer term we shall pay a price if we do not adopt such an approach.

At present the United States and Washington are under the domination—that is perhaps a rather extreme way of putting it—of a hard-line Right-wing Administration. There is no hiding that fact. They stood for election as such and were elected as such. Having attended the Republican convention in Dallas, President Reagan's inauguration, and so on, I confess that I had sincere hopes that President Reagan would want to go down as a man of peace in his second term of office. I have to tell the House, however, that I no longer believe that to be so, and I am not alone in that view. I shall refer to the Pentagon in less colourful terms than were used earlier, but aided by the newer appointments at the White House the Pentagon appears to all intents and purposes to be getting its way. Nevertheless, there are great divisions within the United States and in Washington. Congressional feeling is extremely strong. There are misgivings about SALT 2, about the rearmament programme and how on earth it is to be financed, about central America and even to a lesser extent about the middle east.

It is clear to anyone who visits Washington that there is also an element, albeit not the predominant element, which firmly believes that the arms race and general policy can be conducted on the lines of stretching the Soviet economy because it is not strong enough to stand the competition and will eventually decline, if not collapse, with the possibility of a change in the system and the belief that in any event the capitalist system will eventually triumph. That is not the majority view, but it is a serious matter because anyone who tangles with Soviet patriotism or attempts to push the Soviet Union to the wall is adopting an extremely dangerous policy. The opposite is perhaps much better—the hope that Mr. Gorbachev's internal plans will be successful, leading to a more relaxed attitude to the outside world and progress on the important questions of human rights, contacts, transfers, visits, tourism and the rest. However, there seems little prospect of any change in the approach of the American Administration until the next presidential election in 1988.

My impression of Soviet policy is that the Soviet Union is playing it long and playing it patiently, but it will not go on doing so for ever and at some time we in the West may have to respond more positively. The views that I have expressed in previous foreign policy debates were unchanged by my visit to the Soviet Union. The last thing that I want is for the House to imagine that I have come back from the Soviet Union trumpeting out some great new view as a result of my visit. I am repeating the views that I have expressed before, but with the additional confirmation of a further visit to the Soviet Union and further contact with its leadership at the highest level.

I am absolutely convinced—this is most important—that the Soviet Union is genuine in its desire for peace and for dialogue. I do not say that naively. We are dealing with tough people who have a different system and the way ahead will not be easy. There will be hard negotiations ahead, but I believe that the desire of the Soviet leaders is genuine and will have to be met. They are not insane so they want peace, not war, but there are also practical reasons relating to the Soviet economy. They want to concentrate on their economy. With due respect to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) it goes a little further than the strategic defence initiative, although that is one element. The emphasis in the Soviet Union since the change in leadership has been to concentrate on internal change and the speed and extent of the changes have been remarkable by any standards, especially by conservative standards of conduct in the Soviet Union over many years under a system that tends to stagnate.

There is evidence that the Soviet leaders want progress in that direction and they know that they cannot afford the arms race as well. Nevertheless, they will afford it if they have to, because they are determined about it. The economy is the practical reason for their willingness to do business. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, we can do business with them, and I believe that we should get on with it as quickly as possible because the mood will not last forever. Even Communist leaders have to deliver to their people. Even Soviet leaders can stick out their necks only for so long before they suffer, hopefully not by being chopped off. A leadership that has been so dynamic in bringing about change cannot expect to be universally loved by all those who have been moved or dismissed. The moves have been extensive throughout the system, and we saw evidence of that.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): As my hon. Friend knows, I also visited the Soviet Union. On the important question of the economic problems facing the Soviet Union, does my hon. Friend agree that one of the problems is the need to earn hard currency to buy grain to make up its agricultural deficiency? The cost of that grain is between $6 billion and $7 billion per year and total earnings in hard currency are no more than that due to the collapse of oil prices and the halving of the 60 per cent. of hard currency earnings attributable to oil.

Mr. Temple-Morris: I agree with my hon. Friend that that is an important aspect. It was clear that the Soviet Union wished to trade with us to gain more hard currency rather than relying on the prices of raw materials such as oil. There are undoubted possibilities for British business. That point should be made loud and clear. Companies should get out there and see what they can do by way of joint enterprises, and so on.

By way of illustration of the difficulties that face bridge builders, when we were in the Soviet Union at one moment we were talking about the summit and the very next moment we heard on the news the United States pronouncement threatening abrogation of the SALT 2 treaty. That did not make life easy. At that moment I was not exactly proud of the Western Alliance.

In regard to the summit, I want to emphasise what has been said. I am sure that the Soviet Union wants the summit, but it must be able to deliver. Leaders of all systems have to deliver. That was put graphically to us by Mr. Gorbachev when he said that to go on any basis other than the agreement of something that was carefully prepared would be to deceive the people. It would deceive the people to talk agreeably for five and a half hours and come out smiling, as applied to only one summit. More has to be achieved at the next summit.

I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench to bring what influence they can to bear upon the United States not to miss the opportunity of another summit, because the Soviet Union is willing to participate. The British people want and expect that. If things get difficult in East-West and international relations, commensurate with that difficulty will be a mounting electoral relevance of that aspect of foreign affairs. At the next election I do not think that any of us can expect not to mention foreign affairs. The worse things get, the more we will have to talk about it. I do not want us or our Government to be on the defensive.

In regard to the United Kingdom position, I have dealt with the need for a slightly more vigorous approach and greater independence. I appreciate the background of the United States and NATO, the fear of American isolationism and all the rest of it. Nevertheless, there is a duty to speak out on such topics as SDI and star wars, but I do not propose to go into detail because I have already done so in a previous debate. On SALT 2, I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Government for doing their utmost to save the day.

Progress can be made, and we should speak out to achieve it, on chemical weapons, accompanied by verification, and on nuclear testing. The whole Soviet attitude on verification was simple. It was, "Just come on, try us and see." I do not see why we should not do that. If it did not work out, it would be simple to dispense with all that had been said as propaganda. In other words, the gauntlet was thrown down firmly and I think that it should be picked up.

As for the future, one deals very much with the United States and the Western Alliance in debates on East-West relations, but we must not forget our European links and our eventual future with Europe. Because of the dependence on the United States that I have been talking about, the British voice is regrettably getting weaker rather than stronger. That voice represents a considerable force for good in the world, but it can be exercised more powerfully if it is concerted with a policy that recognises our future as being within Europe.

There is a fundamental choice that has not yet been made. I say that advisedly and deliberately. People who try to have it all ways often end up with nothing. Our voice should always be fielded in these matters to the maximum effect. The world expects it. I am confident enough to feel that the world would like it too.

7.13 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): It is a particular pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) in the debate, because he and I shared a car in the wanderings in the Soviet Union that have been described extensively. If the executive of the Leominster Conservative association and the executive of Leominster Liberal association knew the degree of political co-operation that we were able to develop as we discussed these issues, he and I might both be in trouble. Today he has spoken clearly, frankly and with much the same emphasis as so many members of that delegation shared in their reaction to the visit to the Soviet Union. The Minister of State should be aware that the hon. Gentleman gave a true reflection of reactions on all sides. Even though we may draw some different conclusions, our assessments were similar.

If there is one depressing thought that hangs over a foreign affairs debate in present circumstances, it is that to many of us there is no apparent distinctive British foreign policy, at least on the part of the Prime Minister. That impression was brought vividly home by her support of and direct complicity in the United States bombing of Libya, an act so misguided that it is now being openly questioned at the most senior level in the White House. The Prime Minister is President Reagan's most reliable and compliant friend, but it is of no value in a friendship not to be a candid friend and not to be prepared to take a clearly different view at times. That the right hon. Lady has failed to do. I say that as a dedicated supporter of NATO and our alliance with the United States.

I am strongly opposed to those who rank the United States and the USSR as two equivalent super-powers and two equivalent societies which pose the same threats and the same dangers to us and who are equally hostile to us. They cannot be viewed in that light by anyone who values democracy and the extent to which the United States exemplifies that democracy, but at present it happens to be the case that the foreign policy of the Soviet Union is moving marginally in directions of which I and my right hon. and hon. Friends approve, while the foreign policy of the United States has been moving steadily away from those directions over the last few years. That view is shared by a great many people within the United States of America.

I believe that many of President Reagan's foreign policies add up to a recipe for disaster. That is why I wish to see a stronger British challenge to many of those policies, including those on East-West relations and arms control. That is why I wish to see a stronger British effort to end United States support for authoritarian regimes like that in Chile, and of American attempts to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. That is why I want to see a stronger British effort in other areas of United States foreign policy where the United States is exercising a damaging influence.

To take a specific example, let us consider Namibia, which we did not discuss yesterday in the extensive and good debate on South Africa. I hope that the British Government will seek to use their influence to keep Namibia on the agenda and to stop the current American attempt to link Namibia with the ending of Cuban involvement in Angola. I am in favour of the ending of Cuban involvement, but it is not relevant to the solution of the Namibian problem, nor is it reasonable to visit upon those fighting for the genuine independence of Namibia responsibility for Cuban actions in that other territory.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): How can the hon. Gentleman possibly express that sentiment in the light of the fact that South African policy on Namibia is significantly motivated by the Cuban presence in Angola?

Mr. Beith: South Africa involvement in Namibia has been to defy the United Nations, to defy the international community and to deny democracy and self-determination to the people of that country over a long period. Currently, the fears of the South African Government are indeed exacerbated by their relationship to Angola, in which they have a substantial military involvement in backing the UNITA forces. In any objective assessment of the rights of the people of Namibia, it is irrelevant to seek to apply the criterion of Cuban disengagement.

On the issue of East-West relations, which has dominated the debate so far, all of us who took part in the recent visit to Moscow were impressed by the shrewdness and relative open-mindedness of General Secretary Gorbachev. We reached perhaps three similar conclusions. The first is that Gorbachev is serious about what he has to do to make changes in the Soviet economy and to raise the standard of living of the people. He is applying himself to that task. I see his recent visit to Hungary as part of the process by which he learns from other states and compares other relevant experience. There are great opportunities for British trade in the longer term as that process goes on. That will require some revision of our present COCOM rules and the extent to which we restrict technological imports of things that the Soviet Union can buy as single items freely on the open market in other parts of the world.

We all gained the impression that the Soviet Union means business about arms control. That impression is confirmed by more recent statements and by what Mr. Gorbachev said about SDI. That statement went much further than earlier ones. I believe that the US signals on SALT 2 are the wrong signals. They are symptomatic of the fact that around President Reagan are several people who simply do not believe in arms control. I acquit the British Government of holding that view, but there are among the President's advisers some people who do not believe in arms control and do not want it. They want a substantial arms build-up. They see a commercial advantage for a lot of people in the United States in that, and they are rushing like mad to get as many SDI contracts as possible in place before the end of President Reagan's term of office.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman will recall that Mr. Gorbachev raised all these issues when he talked to us, but that President Gromyko spoke at greater length. He said that the American Establishment had dealt blow after blow against SALT 2 and had finally put a high explosive charge under it, but that he did not think the American people wanted to bury it. He made some distinction between certain politicians and the wishes of the American people. He made it quite clear that they wanted SALT 2 and that he hoped that we would help to do something about that.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman faithfully records what was said in answer to a question. It is rather interesting that President Gromyko did not himself raise complaints about SALT 2 — his comments came in answer to a question raised by our delegation.

I must differentiate between my view and that of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). In some of his public responses he seemed almost to be eating out of the hand of General Secretary Gorbachev when he suggested arrangements that a British Government could come to with the Soviet Government. The Foreign Secretary made much of the incongruity of the proposition that we could achieve a great deal by reducing the number of Soviet missiles in exchange for removing British deterrent. That is not a useful calculation, for the reasons that the Foreign Secretary gave. The arguments for and against the British deterrent concern whether it has a real defence utility. That argument should be taking place rather more widely than in the confines of the alliance to which I happen to belong. It is a significant argument.

The Foreign Secretary did not refer to the other aspects of what the right hon. Member for Leeds, East said concerning the possibility that, in exchange for the removal of United States nuclear bases in Britain, the Soviet Union would agree not to target its weapons on the United Kingdom. That proposition is so valueless that I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman attached any credibility to it. It seemed to me to be a way of getting some return for a decision, which has already been taken in the Labour party, to remove what I believe is the central feature of our nuclear defence.

Even those who are firmly wedded to the desirability, on wider political or strategic grounds, of having a British nuclear deterrent must concede that central to the defence of the United Kingdom is the presence of the NATO nuclear deterent on British soil. If that is removed, our fundamental defence stance is, to use the right hon. Gentleman's words, destabilised. It is the basis of our current defence. The British deterent poses a quite separate question, which is whether we could conceive of launching a nuclear response when the NATO deterrent was not brought to bear because the United States did not regard it as right to launch it. On that, as with the quite separate issue of whether there should be a direct exchange between the Soviet Union and Britain on the British deterrent, I do not believe that we should do side deals with the Soviet Union. Our role is to seek a wider settlement and an arms agreement which involves the two super-powers and us alongside, not to do a side deal, because that would not achieve general disarmament.

I should like to mention a third impression which many of us got but which has not been mentioned so far. I do not believe that General Secretary Gorbachev has addressed himself to the civil rights problems in his country or to the implications of changes in the style of the Soviet economy for what people will want in terms of civil rights and freedom. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) raised these issues on our behalf. I see no sign of any improvement in civil rights in regard to political dissidents or religious groups. There are many professing Christians who are imprisoned, and there are many Jews who want to emigrate.

We hope that we will get a positive response to some of our suggestions and the cases that we took up, but I see no positive sign yet of a crack in the basic Soviet attitude. The Soviet Union's efforts to win friends in the West would be enormously strengthened if it made changes in regard to civil rights. Moreover, it would greatly assist General Secretary Gorbachev's domestic policies if he ceased to make enemies of a great many people who would make perfectly good Soviet citizens if only he gave them a chance to be. Nobody should have any illusions that the significant changes in Soviet foreign policy or in how its economy is run signal, as yet, any change in basic civil rights—the position in that respect remains as worrying and unsatisfactory as I believe it has been for a long time.

Mr. Crouch: The hon. Gentleman referred to my raising human rights with General Secretary Gorbachev and the President. Does the hon. Gentleman remember that when I raised the matter with Mr. Gorbachev he smiled and said, "I know what is coming."? I think that I dared to respond, "This is no laughing matter." I told him and the President that this was an issue that clouded public opinion in the West and was taken serously here, that no matter how seriously we discuss disarmament, verification, SALT 2 and the like, human rights were of prime importance to us.

Mr. Beith: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. We tried, and continue to try, as I hope do the Government, to get it across to the Soviet leadership that this is not some propaganda exercise. We do not raise these matters to belittle the Soviet Union; we raise them because they are of the deepest concern to our constituents and a great many other people in the West.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: Much as I should like to give way, I shall not do so as I shall be in trouble with the Chair, because I have a number of other matters to raise.

I should now like to consider the middle east. I am glad that the Prime Minister visited Israel. I am glad that she was moved, as she clearly was, by her visit to Yad Vashem — a reminder of the horrific experience of the Jewish people. I am also glad that she found so much warmth towards Britain among so many Israelis. Those were welcome features of the visit. I am also glad that she made an effort to talk to some people from the Palestinian community, despite the difficulties attendant upon arranging that. I am deeply sorry, however, that the visit was able to achieve so little in advancing their cause or in advancing a general resolution of middle east problems.

There is no escaping the role and responsibility of the Palestine Liberation Organisation in the solution of that problem, and it is no use trying to bypass it or assuming that other leaders can be found to replace the PLO in that capacity. There is a lesson there for Israel, Jordan, Britain and the United States, which keeps looking around for means of avoiding talking to the PLO. There are also lessons there for Syria, which has been trying systematically to undermine the leadership of the PLO.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: I have just said that I shall not. I will be in trouble with the Chair if I give way much more.

In a debate such as this, we must also pay attention to some of the forgotten or nearly forgotten conflicts of the world. I refer, for example, to Afghanistan, where the Soviet Union is still present in large numbers and increasingly embarrassed about it. It is looking for ways of reducing its commitment. We must keep up the diplomatic pressure to make the Soviet leaders recognise that the West cannot stand by and watch a country such as Afghanistan invaded and make no complaint or fail to raise the issue. I was struck, during the visit of Hu Yaobang of the People's Republic of China, by how strongly China still feels about the Russian presence in Afghanistan. That was a very successful visit, and Hu Yaobang brought life and sparkle to the diplomatic scene when he was over here. There is no doubt about the strength of Chinese feeling about the continued Soviet involvement in Afghanistan, and we should be as ready as the Chinese are to continue the pressure on that issue.

In Eritrea, there is still massive Soviet involvement in backing the Ethiopian regime with its denial of self-determination to the Eritreans. That battle is increasing, and civil war in that country makes a solution to the famine problems impossible. It greatly worsens the problems about which so many British people care deeply and in respect of which so many of them have tried to help and contribute.

Moroccan occupation continues in the western Sahara, and the people of that country continue to be denied their rights, despite OAU approval and the approval of about half the nations of the world for the recovery of their statehood and status, to which they are clearly entitled on any assessment of international law. I hope that the British Government will not rest on the rather cosy relationship that they have sometimes had with Morocco and that they will continue to press that case.

Earlier I mentioned the situation in Sri Lanka, and the Foreign Secretary kindly said that he would continue to press that point with the Indian Foreign Minister during his visit to see whether there are ways in which we can help to secure resolutions to a problem to which there is no military solution. Unless there is some constitutional development there, there cannot be a military solution.

Miss Betty Boothroyd (West Bromwich, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Lady makes it impossible for me to say no.

Miss Boothroyd: I understand that in the last 48 hours the Sri Lankan Cabinet has agreed proposals to put to the all-party conference to be held next month in Sri Lanka, which will create provisional councils in that country with a considerable measure of devolution and opportunities for co-ordination between the regions. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would want to welcome those proposals and to wish them well, while at the same time wishing for a cessation of hostilities on the part of the security forces and the Tamil extremists.

Mr. Beith: I know that the hon. Lady takes a close interest in what goes on in Sri Lanka. I have not studied the proposals that she described, but I hope that she will use all her influence to ensure that the Government of Sri Lanka recognise that they must make significant constitutional moves if they are to avoid a continued, insoluble problem in that country.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Beith: This will be my last occasion.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Will he reflect that one of the problems in Sri Lanka has been the systematic exclusion of the Tamil people from the constitutional process? I believe that to be at the root of the problem, and it is compounded by the large number of arms sales by a number of western European countries to the Government of Sri Lanka, as a result of which the civil war is now raging. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one part of the peace process would be the cessation of arms sales to the Government of Sri Lanka?

Mr. Beith: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about arms sales. I am glad that I have allowed two balanced interventions on Sri Lanka.

We must be given back our self-respect in relation to foreign policy and should be given the right to an independent British foreign policy. On several occasions, it has seemed as if the Foreign Secretary has been on the point of doing precisely that. I felt so when he made his notable speech on the strategic defence initiative. There is no better critique in existence of the SDI programme than the 18-point summary of its weaknesses and drawbacks that was delivered by the Foreign Secretary, but scarcely had he made it than the Prime Minister came to the House effectively to dismiss it. She made it very clear, very quickly, that she would back SDI all the way.

When the Foreign Secretary spoke in Halifax, Nova Scotia and gave some indication of Western and European concern about the American attitude to SALT 2, he was beginning to show the signs of an independent British foreign policy, but it only needed the Prime Minister to come to the Dispatch Box and that independence quickly disappeared from the Government's stance.

Even today, I felt that there was a coded criticism of the United States in what the Foreign Secretary said about his hopes that the United States would feel the need not to breach SALT 2. I wonder whether the Prime Minister will come to the Dispatch Box tomorrow and find words to disagree with that as well and to make it clear that such independence is not to be tolerated.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): I remind the hon. Gentleman that in answering questions about SALT 2 the Prime Minister has already used almost exactly similar language and pointed out that she hopes strongly that SALT 2 will be observed by both sides.

Mr. Beith: What is it about our Prime Minister that makes even her choice of the same phrases as the Foreign Secretary sound totally different in flavour and meaning? There is something about our Prime Minister that makes her able to convince large sections of Right-wing Republican opinion in the United States that she is totally with them, while convincing many people both in America and this country who hold rather different views that she is very much against them. The Foreign Secretary evokes a rather different response.

Indeed, I think that the Prime Minister could win the Republican primary in California outright, but the stance that would make it easy for her to do so will help to make it impossible for her to win the next general election in this country. I believe that the lack of independence and self-respect in foreign policy is something with which the British people are becoming increasingly impatient.

7.35 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Fate sometimes smiles on Back Benchers, and, having failed to catch your eye in last night's debate on South Africa, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of returning to that theme without apology, sure in the knowledge that I have on my side the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) who declared yesterday that the South Africa debate

"is one of the most important issues which the House has ever debated".—[Official Report, 17 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 901.]

I do not dissent from that view. The passing of about 24 hours has allowed a few particles of dust to settle. It has given us some time for limited reflection. It gives us time to be selective and to extract from yesterday's debate points of commission, so to speak, of particular significance and points of omission of similar significance.

A debate on South Africa may to some observers be seen as the chosen battlefield for a cavalry charge by the Right wing of the Conservative party which is met by a counter-charge from the Left wing of the Labour party. That leaves quite a number of us as innocent bystanders, increasingly confused as the exchange becomes more heated.

During much of last night's debate I felt that all too often the fundamental objective was overlooked. What in the de-imperialist and de-colonial era can we possibly do about South Africa? The objective of what we do and say must surely be to try to encourage those people who can create a fairer and more equitable society in South Africa to do so and to discourage those people who do not want that objective from pursuing their aims. During much of last night's debate, that fundamental simplistic objective was lost sight of.

I have chosen three themes, and I shall be selective and somewhat disjointed in my comments because I am aware that I am pursuing a debate that has passed. I want to talk first about the changes that have happened in South Africa. I want to look again at selected aspects of the debate on sanctions and then, in more detail, and perhaps more controversially, at what by implication we appear to be demanding from South Africa.

The hours of debate yesterday in my judgment produced insufficient and inadequate acknowledgement and recognition of the changes that have taken place in South Africa. I was in Pretoria in January 1985 and spent the best part of a week in discussion with what for convenience one can call the Pretoria establishment. That was 18 months ago. I listened to what they said and drew my conclusions.

In January 1985 I concluded that the Pretoria establishment did not want fundamental change. It was playing with words and would adapt superficially and insignificantly to preserve the status quo. Just over a year later, in February 1986, I returned to Pretoria and had almost identical discussions with the same people. I detected a fundamental difference. Within those 12 months the Pretoria establishment had changed its tune. It was no longer playing around for a superficial re-presentation of apartheid. It was talking of fundamental change.

I shall not go much further than that because the next dimension of my analysis is that the Pretoria establishment did not know its goal or objective and, therefore, the route it should follow and, therefore, the speed at which it should go. Nevertheless, a vital change had happened in 12 months, which was that the heart of Afrikanerdom had realised that things could not continue as they had been doing and as, perhaps, in its heart of hearts it would like them to continue. Yesterday, Opposition Members debased, devalued and weakened their case. Obviously, there are strong arguments for the imposition of sanctions, but Opposition Members did not give due acknowledgement to a significant change that has taken place in the thinking of the Afrikaner.

I have now seen the video of last Monday's TV-am programme, which included an exchange between a spokesman from the South African embassy and the Leader of the Opposition. The embassy official argued that the South African Government had taken a number of significant steps towards dismantling and removing apartheid. The Leader of the Opposition dismissed him as a "fibber". We could spend a long time arguing about the delineation between grand apartheid, petty apartheid and the whole area in between, but during the past two years or more there have been most significant changes in South African society. I ask the House to consider the removal of job reservations; the repealing of the Mixed Marriages Act; of the Immorality Act; and of influx control; from the perspective of the Afrikaner, what amounts to the constitutional revolution of the establishment of the tricameral Parliament. There is also the extension of freehold rights for blacks and the declared objectives of education parity for all population groups. That is just a selection. Five or 10 years ago none of that was remotely conceivable in the history of the development of the South African nation.

The embassy official, whom I happen to know and respect, was not telling fibs when he said that Pretoria was no longer defending apartheid, but he did not go the whole way. The greater truth, which he neither contradicted nor asserted, is that Pretoria does not know what it is defending. That is an essential dimension of the crisis that is too often too little perceived by many people who presume to participate in the debate on South Africa. Pretoria does not know where it is going, the route it should take, or the speed at which it should travel. So much for the changes which have happened.

I now turn to the central issue of sanctions and the degree to which we should or should not impose further "effective economic measures" as the Opposition would have us do. Last night the House dismissed that proposition, and it was utterly right to do so. However, I agree with Opposition Members on one essential point. The Government's amendment substituted for "effective economic measures" the phraseology "effective measures". I listened to virtually all the debate and left completely confused about what the Government meant by "effective measures". If the debate demonstrated anything, it demonstrated the meaninglessness of that expression. There are no effective measures other than the wholesale economic measures which Opposition Members wish to see implemented. I was further struck forcefully by the Government's inability to attach any meaning to that expression.

For my part, I would neither support nor refuse to support the concept of "effective measures", unless it could be explained to me what those measures were. At present I am none the wiser.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that there are considerable difficulties in setting out precisely what is to be done in this context at this juncture, and that we have several weeks in which to get things right? Furthermore, does he accept that it is absolutely essential to bear in mind that, although some people would like to see apartheid dismantled, as I would, others would indulge their moral consciences at the expense of the carnage of black people, if things went wrong.

Mr. Hunter: Once again, on this topic as on many others, I find myself embracing the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend. That is an added dimension to the complexity of the debate which we had last night and which will continue. I would prefer the debate to have been postponed until the Government had pursued negotiations with Commonwealth Heads of State, the European Community, the seven industrial nations and so on.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Is not the hon. Gentleman being a little unfair? If he had listened carefully to the speeches of the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of State, he would have seen at least some attempt to give signals, but one which could not be taken further because it was constrained by the complete intransigence of the Prime Minister in this area.

Mr. Hunter: No. Until the last sentiment I could agree with much of that. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue, I shall develop an answer to that point.

In our debate last October I declared my opposition to further economic measures against South Africa. During the intervening months the position has demonstrably and irrefutably deteriorated. This has led some of my hon. Friends to change the emphasis in their thinking and to believe that, perhaps, we should reconsider the position. Indeed, we should always reassess. However, I have confirmed and consolidated my opinion of last October that the imposition of further economic sanctions against South Africa would be highly undesirable. The arguments against sanctions were well rehearsed last night, so I will accelerate through them.

The first essential question is how effectively sanctions can be implemented. In a sense it is a peripheral point: I am arguing not about their merits or otherwise, but about the practical course of action to follow. If sanctions were not implemented universally, we would merely lose our commercial interests and hand over a free market to our competitors—the sanctions busters. That is peripheral. Let us assume, however, that sanctions can be implemented effectively.

There was one omission from last night's debate. I apologise if I am mistaken in saying that not one hon. Member pointed out that the first casualties of effective economic sanctions against South Africa would be 1·5 million black immigrant workers in South Africa.

Mr. Budgen: They did.

Mr. Hunter: I apologise if I missed that point. I do not recall it being made. It would be a long and arduous march home for 1·5 million people. Perhaps some would be herded on to cattle wagons and sent back by railroads. Many would not survive physically. None would survive financially. One and a half million is a lot of human lives.

The second victims would be the blacks in South Africa whose jobs, lifestyles, and financial expectations would be hit. More to the point, those to whom social spending and Government programmes are directed would be casualties.

The economies of the front-line states—the border states — would be savaged by effective economic sanctions.

A further dimension was not stressed sufficiently in yesterday's debate. The debate more or less assumed that, in the event of the implementation of sanctions, the South African Government would sit idly by and endure whatever had to be endured. There is a further dimension — that of counter-sanctions. Peter Younghusband, a South African journalist, in an article in the Daily Mail, of all newspapers, a week or so ago, said that counter-sanctions would wreak havoc on the economy of the entire African continent.

Each year, $200 million-worth of goods go from South Africa to the rest of the African continent. An amount of $1 million goes back to South Africa. If that $200 million were cut off, what would happen? Ninety-nine per cent. of Lesotho's imports are from South Africa. The figure for Swaziland is 91 per cent. and for Botswana 88 per cent. The President of Zimbabwe acknowledged that his country would last three weeks without its supply routes from South Africa. If we implement wholesale economic sanctions against South Africa, and if the South Africans indulge in counter-sanctions, within two months we would have to call off the effort because we could not finance the crippling burden which our policy would inflict on other countries, some of whom are independent Commonwealth countries.

There are two further misconceptions which, in my judgment, ultimately destroy the validity of the arguments for sanctions. The misconception of lesser importance is the proposition that sanctions are a nice, cosy, remote and non-violent means of creating change in South African society. They are not. Deliberately to impoverish and starve is to promote and provoke violence. Deliberately to promote and provoke violence cannot be right. To believe that by promoting and provoking violence in South Africa one can create a more just and equitable society is self-delusion, pure and simple.

A greater misconception is the ultimate fallacy in the argument in favour of the imposition of sanctions. Suppose they work. Suppose we irrevocably destroy South Africa financially. What then? Do hon. Members believe that by cornering an Afrikaner and destroying his economic well-being they will turn him, overnight, into a western enlightened liberal? They would achieve nothing of the sort.

We talk about the laager mentality of the Afrikaner. Once upon a time, the Afrikaner nation, in its embryonic state, was forced into an inner laager. On 15 December 1838, 10,000 black men attacked that inner laager. Six hours later, 3,000 were dead. The forces of law and order in South Africa have not yet started to deliver their goods. If we push the Afrikaner into a position of no hope and no retreat, we shall not achieve our objective of creating a fairer and more equitable society in that country.

Economic sanctions have worked — not economic sanctions imposed by politicians but economic sanctions which are the result of that indefinable quality, business confidence. There is no significant new investment in South Africa. Whatever disinvestment can take place under the law of the land is taking place. What Opposition hon. Members seek to achieve, through advocating a policy for the future, is already the reality. Business confidence has gone. There is a remarkable naivety in the cry for effective economic measures. They have already been taken by the international business community, not by the politician. That is the tragedy. How is progress financed? How are social programmes financed outside a flourishing national economy?

Last night Opposition Members referred to education in South Africa. They pointed out the disparity in spending on a white child as compared with a black child. This year, the public expenditure programme in South Africa is running at 41 billion rands. If there were to be equality of spending on education for black children and white children, that amount must be doubled. If there is no economic base on which to finance that spending, where will it come from?

What do we expect of South Africa? The Government have said frequently that they do not seek to impose a form of government on South Africa. Rather, they seek the creation of a form of government acceptable to all races. I think that Opposition Members would broadly accept that. Perhaps they would prefer the expression "acceptable to the majority". In the debate yesterday, words such as "democracy", "freedom", "unitary state", and so on, were used. What do they mean in reality? If a President of Tanzania says that he does not believe in democracy and a President of Zimbabwe says that he does not believe in democracy—I ask the question only because I want to know the answer—why should a President of South Africa believe in democracy? Why do we demand of South Africa more than we demand of the rest of the African continent, Commonwealth countries included?

The forces of evolution are at work in South Africa. There have been significant achievements in the past two years. My belief still is that the forces of evolution in South Africa need help and encouragement, not discouragement, and that the House was right last night to reject the proposition of wholesale economic measures.

8 pm

Mr. Leo Abse (Torfaen): The hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) has clearly learnt what most parliamentarians learn—never throw away the notes of an undelivered speech. I advise him that, if he is not to cause dissonances in House of Commons debates, he should put his notes in the drawer for longer than 24 hours.

All of us are concerned that the summit talks may be again at risk. It is inevitable when such an awesome possibility arises that people of my generation are bound to look back to the end of the war. How did it come about that all the high hopes of co-operation held by my generation during the immediate post-way years—that the West would work with the Soviet Union—were so speedily dashed? NATO was established and the long cold war began.

Our husbandry of our atomic know-how, for the sake of what proved, inevitably, to be a short-term advantage, was undoubtedly one of the main reasons. But there were good reasons for the Soviet Union, after the long appeasement years, to be fearful again. Even more important reasons were clearly shaping Russia's attitude. I recalled them vividly a few weeks ago when, for the first time in 40 years, I was in Vienna, observing the obscene election of Waldheim and witnessing the appalling manner in which the Austrians, unlike the Germans, seek to exculpate themselves from their own terrible guilt. I naturally thought of the immediate post-war years. By the accident of war, I had found myself awaiting demobilisation in a small RAF unit—the only one in Vienna—surrounded by a sea of Russian troops. That was my first contact with them. Some of their political commissars were Jewish and I was able to speak to them in my sort of Yiddish.

Mr. Winnick: Welsh.

Mr. Abse: I may have spoken Yiddish with a Welsh accent, but those commissars were able to understand me. I dare say that those poor fellows were killed off in Stalin's paranoic years. The bulk of the troops however were kids, and I thought of them as such even then when I was a young man. They were simple, untutored men scraped up from the fringes of the Soviet empire. The depletion of the Soviet Union's manpower was tragically visible to us. That impress—the reminder of the 20 million Russians who had lost their lives—has always been with me and, more importantly and more relevantly, it has always been with the Soviet leadership who, until recently, were men of my age, or, indeed, usually older. A failure of imagination by the West to appreciate that those losses prompted the compulsive, often seemingly irrational, security needs of Russia led to the speedy contretemps and misunderstandings that, within two years of the end of the war, were to bring about the great and dangerous division that has extended, as has been emphasised, for almost 40 years.

Now, when I listen to the interesting contributions by hon. Members who had the privilege of visiting Russia with the delegation, it is clear that a new generation of Soviet leaders is emerging, less shaped, perhaps less distorted, by wartime memories. There is, too, a new awareness in Western Europe of the need to rethink policies towards Russia. I emphasise that that is not how the United States of America sees it. During an academic sojourn of four or five weeks in the United States during its pre-election period, I saw people who pressed home to me that the gulf between European and Reagan thinking was wider than the Atlantic ocean. Doubtless, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said, there has been a shift from the more sophisticated east to the south and west of America which has played its part, but it is unhappily true that the British Government are colluding in widening the gap between the United States and Europe, as evidenced by the Libyan adventure. Constant apologies for our subjugation to American policies come from the Prime Minister and from the leader of the Social Democratic Party, who in the past few weeks has lectured us about the dangers of anti-Americanism. That constant refrain, which we heard again from the Foreign Secretary, is based on their belief that our defence security wholly depends upon America.

If we act on such an assumption, we are on the road to Armageddon. The aeroplanes from American bases here could one day carry H-bombs inviting our obliteration. It is nonsense to believe that military necessity leaves us with no alternative but to condone Reagan's self-indulgent caprices. The Libyan intervention shows how important it is that we free ourselves from our thraldom to the United States.

There are more than 250 million people in Western Europe with tremendous industrial resources and long military and diplomatic experience, who are potentially able to defend themselves militarily and diplomatically against some 200 million Russians who are contending at the same time with 1 billion Chinese on their borders, with the rising dangers of Islamic fundamentalism in eastern Russia and with all the disgruntled peoples of eastern Europe. If we had a Government who genuinely placed upon their agenda the Europeanisation of west European security, instead of attempting to sabotage it—as occurred with the Anglo-American attack on Libya—we might avoid the final disaster.

Those who accuse people who speak like me, British people, of anti-Americanism and those whose emotional attachment to the United States is similar to that of the Leader of the SDP or the Prime Minister—who complain that the British seem to have been seized with an anti-American mood—are mocking the realism which they lack. It is no use us pretending that Reagan's America is that of Roosevelt or of Kennedy. There is abroad in the United States a dangerous politicised fundamentalism, an unhappy form of Christianity, that is soaked in gnosticism, a belief that this world is so sunk in evil that rescue is necessary. Such gnostic beliefs lead to the conclusion that there is a demiurge, or a limited evil power. That power is said to be the satanic representative of cosmic evil. It can then be speedily identified as the Russians and, therefore, must at all costs be overcome.

[Mr. Abse]

United States policies are ambiguous because they are worked out within the ambience of President Reagan's provocative "evil empire" speeches. Those who, out of old affections, plead, as I suspect the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) pleaded in his interesting contribution, that Reagan is a mere blink in the history of American Presidents, should stop deceiving themselves and those whom they seek to influence.

Last week, we saw Vice-President Bush's setback against a fundamentalist contender for the presidency. We are speaking not of a wild fringe movement but of a movement in the main-stream of American politics. Europe could, if we permitted it, become the victim of that primitive mythology. It is almost impossible to open a newspaper without encountering corroboration of that new mood. The last bastion in the United States of America—the Supreme Court—has been breached with the President nominating Judge Scalia and making William Rehnquist the Chief Justice. That was, of course, applauded by the Rev. Jerry Falwell and the Rev. Pat Robertson, the fundamentalists who are having such an inimical influence upon America and upon American foreign policy.

The worst insanity that emerges from America's contemporary sick culture is Reagan's yearning for the fulfilment of what he has called his dream. That is the misshapen dream of star wars defence. Every depth psychologist would insist that what none of us can tolerate, and what we fear most, is to be reduced to utter helplessness—the utter helplessness of a babe. The goal of star wars is to be enabled to launch nuclear attacks upon an enemy without fear of retaliation. To aim to reduce the Soviet Union to helplessness is to invite pre-emptive retaliation. For Britain blithely to co-operate in such an adventure would be to co-operate in our suicide. Narcissistic rage, as the psychoanalysts describe it, can move groups as well as individuals. Such deep-seated rage, which has been provoked by concepts such as star wars, is relieved only by violence. But we should not be disengaging from American adventurism merely out of self-interest.

Last month, I wandered round Czechoslovakia. These days, in Britain, it is an almost forgotten country. No people in Europe have less deserved their fate. Betrayed at Munich by Britain, brutally ruled by Nazi Germany and then invaded by Russia, the Czechs nevertheless show extraordinary resilience, surviving the Russian occupation with wondrous ingenuity and pressing to their limits the parameters imposed upon them by the Soviet Union, yet never allowing their personal integrity to be eroded by the evasions that they are daily compelled to make. We owe it to such people to do everything possible to assist them. But so long as Britain and Europe remain locked into American policies, so long will the Russians wish to throw out their defensive perimeters to produce the greatest possible area within which they believe they have freedom to manoeuvre. That is why the hapless Russian service men, to whom no Czech will speak, remain in Czechoslovakia.

It is becoming increasingly clear that to assist such lands and ourselves, we need a considerable lurch in our foreign and defence policies. Fortunately, with the British people now taking an unusual interest in non-domestic affairs, there is every hope that, come the election, they will not be debauched by tax concessions and other bribes. I trust that, ere long, we shall have a Government more conscious of the fact that peace cannot be assured, as this Government believe, by deferring on almost every issue to dangerous American backwoodsmen.

8.15 pm

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Listening to the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) and remembering what great campaigners both he and the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) have been in the cause of Soviet jewry caused me to reflect that there must be a big improvement in the lot of those unhappy people before some of the euphoria that we heard from the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) is entirely justified.

As the debate started unnecessarily late, I shall not make a great tour d'horizon. I shall confine myself to the Western European Union.

The debate has prompted me to make two rather cynical observations. Listening to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) describing the oppressive South African measures that have been lifted from the backs of the unhappy black people — the marriage laws, the sexual repressions and others — reminded me that for many years successive Governments — the Conservative Government of which I was a member, and Labour Governments — so far from seeking to impose sanctions when all those oppressive measures were still in force in South Africa, tried to encourage civil trade with South Africa. I make no comment, but merely make that observation.

I was inspired to make a second cynical observation after listening with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who mentioned Afghanistan. It was right that he should remind us—and it caused me to reflect—that about a third of the population of Afghanistan have become refugees. Those who have been killed in Afghanistan can be numbered not in tens, or hundreds, or thousands, but in hundreds of thousands. The amount of coverage of Afghanistan by our media has been about two or three hours. The coverage of South Africa must run into hundreds of hours. I merely make those observations without comment.

I shall confine my remarks to the Western European Union, of which I have been a member for nine years, serving on the defence committee and on the General Affairs Committee. We participate in the Western European Union because we believe that it is a vital political forum concerned with the defence of the West, because it is the political arm of NATO—the Atlantic Alliance — and because it involves the important contribution of France outside NATO. The seven European countries which shared views on Europe formed the Western European Union by treaty, animated by a desire for collective defence and committed to the Atlantic Alliance and the European Community.

The cornerstone of the treaty is article 5, which states:

"If any of the high contracting parties should be the object of an armed attack in Europe, the other high contracting parties will, in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, afford the party so attacked all the military and other aid and assistance in their power."

I quote that to demonstrate the importance of the Western European Union. The wording of the treaty is in some ways more powerful than that of NATO. In addition, in an age of highly technical defence, often cloaked in great secrecy, it is essential that there should be an instrument which is an effective communication between the military authorities and European public opinion.

The Western European Union is also a forum for discussion of civil, military, technical, technological and scientific co-operation. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who is chairman of the Committee on Scientific, Technological and Aerospace Questions, plays a notable and distinguished part in the Western European Union. That should be recorded by colleagues here who are not aware of the good work being done.

No organisation remains stable. It either grows and adapts to change or it dies. Over the nine years that I have been a member of the WEU, I have observed a steady decline in its effectiveness. Therefore, I rejoiced in the move to reactivate it at the Rome meeting in 1984. I thought that the WEU would play an enhanced role and that other nations would be encouraged to participate. I thought that the Council of Ministers and our own Ministers would share that view.

Alas, at the WEU meeting in Venice this year, Ministers showed little intention of achieving this. They poured cold water on the whole idea. I know that recently in Paris the secretary-general announced some initiatives and set up agencies of a relatively minor nature, but no real assurance was given that the WEU was to play an enhanced role.

The hopes of many members were dashed. As so often happens in European matters, initiatives and enthusiasms sink in the bureaucratic and diplomatic sludge. The WEU Assembly is often treated by the Council of Ministers perfunctorily and with little more than contempt on some occasions.

It suits the Council of Ministers to have the Assembly as a cosmetic front, but it seems determined to avoid anything being done, any change being made or any proposal being accepted that would result in Ministers and their officials being shaken out of their cosy, comfortable nest. I regret that in the nine years that I have been in the WEU I cannot recall a British Defence Minister coming to address the WEU. We are always pleased to see Foreign Office Ministers, and we were delighted to see the noble Lady, Baroness Young, at our last meeting. Defence is a fundamental subject. Other nations manage to field their top Defence Ministers. Why do we not do so as well?

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, in a rather colourful phrase, described the dilemma faced by the Liberal and SDP Members on defence as meaning that they were likely to suffer obsolescence through inertia. I shall not burst a blood vessel if that happens to the alliance, but I do not want it to happen to the WEU.

I can give two recent examples of ministerial inertia. First, the President of the WEU, Mr. Caro, of France, proposed a powerful initiative for the WEU to help in the battle against terrorism.

In the Assembly of the WEU we spend hours debating this subject, condemning it, regretting it and deploring it, but nothing happens in the way of practical results. President Caro produced helpful ideas for the seven nations to co-ordinate their actions against this beastly modern scourge, but once again buckets of cold water were immediately poured on his idea by the Ministers. They said that they preferred to deal through the EEC, despite the fact that the EEC has shown remarkably little enterprise in this respect and, in the case of Greece, positive negligence.

Secondly, there is the problem of enlargement. The WEU either grows or it dies. I should have thought it was obvious that the inclusion of Portugal, which is keen to join and is a member of NATO, and later that of Spain, would enhance the interests of the WEU. It was most creditable of the Spanish people, so wisely led by the moderate Labour Government, to decide quite firmly that they wish to remain in NATO, despite the clamourings and squawkings of the lunatic Left. In addition, Denmark, Norway and even Turkey, if they so wished, could make a contribution to the WEU.

Such an enlargement is opposed by Ministers on the astonishing ground that in some way the political will of the Seven might be jeopardised by the accession of new candidates. What nonsense. What great political will does the WEU exercise now that would be disturbed by the presence of our oldest ally, Portugal? All that will be disturbed is the comfortable lethargy of the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Tindemans, the Belgian Foreign Minister, described what, in his view, were the three main obstacles to the enlargement or revitalisation of the WEU, all of which were completely inexplicable. The first was:

"the instinctive feelings of national and cultural identity that had to be overcome."

What does that mean? The second obstacle was:

"The post-war political concensus in many European countries was in danger of breaking down."

How will that be made worse by other nations joining the WEU?

Thirdly, he said:

"Matters relating to security have to be dealt with in a discreet way, and should not be shouted from the rooftops."

We all know that from our own Parliaments. At least he went on to say:

"The WEU could make a significant contribution to the cause of European unity, especially as its expertise encompasses the vital field of defence policy."

So it can.

Ministers of the WEU, and that includes ours, must show a great deal more drive and determination to make this organisation work in the interests of the defence of the West. I have no doubt about the commitment of my right hon. and learned Friends to the European cause or to the defence of our nation and of the West. However, I should like my hon. Friend the Minister of State to give an absolute assurance that the Government wholly support the WEU and its revitalisation and will do all that they can to encourage the lethargic other Ministers in the WEU to secure its advancement as rapidly as possible.

8.26 pm

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Like the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), I shall in due course settle into my own corner of interest, but I shall first make a few detours, in view of what has so far been said.

It was sad to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) about South Africa, particularly the part that referred to the need to defer and avoid sanctions for the sake of the black people. Sometimes we should listen to the voices of those who are being persecuted when considering what should be done to prevent that persecution. I proclaim my own sad conclusion that there is no alternative to firm sanctions, and my great regret that they have not been imposed and will not be imposed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Lawrence: Is not the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that those of us who share the view expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) are listening? We are listening to Chief Buthelezi, who represents the largest tribal grouping of black Africans and to Bishop Mokoena, who represents 4·5 million black Anglicans. They are both leaders of oppressed black groups who are asking us not to introduce economic sanctions.

Mr. Janner: There are matters about which the hon. and learned Gentleman and I agree. This is not one of them. His selective listening is, alas, in this case leading him to a false conclusion. The vast majority of black people in that country wish nothing more than an end to the vicious apartheid regime under which they are forced to live, and believe that it is only real and effective pressure from other lands that can bring that about. They further believe that they will not get it from our Government.

I listened with concern to the speeches about the United States. I share the prevalent distaste for its foreign policy, but I do not share the anti-American feeling that is pervading the House and entering too many debates in this country. I wholly abhor and hate many of the policies of our own Government, but I proclaim the freedom that we have to attack those policies. We do not attack our own country because we loathe the policies of this Government. We take steps to get rid of that Government.

We should apply precisely the same principles in our approach to the United States — a great and vibrant democracy in which huge numbers of its citizens not only loathe the policies of their Government but have the freedom to say so openly, clearly and vehemently. The pendulum, which today has unfortunately swung in the direction of the far Right in the United States Supreme Court, will, I trust, swing back as swiftly as possible. Meanwhile, let those who go to the United States, as well as to countries where people cannot speak their mind, never forget the difference between the freedom that is enjoyed in the United States and the West to attack the Governments and policies of the day as opposed to the lack of freedom that is to be found in totalitarian regimes, especially in the East but also in the middle east.

That leads me to my next point. I so greatly wish that hon. Members, not least my hon. Friends, would understand the difference between democratic lands, such as Israel, with all its failings, in which its citizens may attack its Government — Israel has a Government created by a curious form of democracy, as real as anyone can achieve — and the totalitarian dictatorships in, for example, Syria, which was referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), and feudal monarchies: oppressive and wicked lands where there is no right to speak without being shot, unless one happens to agree with those who are in command. Any Arab who speaks against the Palestine Liberation Organisation is not only liable to be shot but too often is. That is the problem.

I do not see how my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East can be right about negotiations with the PLO, when the PLO is not prepared to recognise the right of those with whom it is asked to negotiate, to exist as a country and as a secure land; the PLO is not prepared to give up terrorism in any land, including this one in which we are so free to speak. We have the right to speak without the fear of being shot. All civilians should have the right, in any land, to speak their minds without being terrorised.

I congratulate the Prime Minister on her visit to Israel. I was glad that she went. I was there shortly afterwards. She is a Tory Prime Minister. Israel has a Labour Prime Minister who is a close friend of mine. The two of them got on and emerged after their talks saying that it would be boring if there was nothing to disagree about. Neither of them was bored. That is the civilised way in which people ought to do business. I was also glad that at the end of her visit the Prime Minister said that one could not look just to the PLO when negotiating for peace in the middle east. She pronounced openly and clearly that others must be involved in the search for peace in that area.

I cannot spend the time that I would wish in commenting about India, but what a marvellous and magnificent land that is. How it can be governed by anybody is beyond the belief of those who visit and who love it.

I am glad that India's Foreign Minister is to visit this country. Those of us who rejoice in democracy and in the freedom to speak, take pride in a land where 780 million people enjoy democracy. Democracy does not exist in any country next to it. Indeed, it does not exist almost anywhere else in that part of the world. Certainly democracy does not exist, other than in Israel, anywhere in the middle east.

The position in Sri Lanka is not as simple as many of my hon. Friends would suggest. I have been there. The Government of Sri Lanka have tried very hard to create conditions of peace with the Tamils. They have failed. We have failed in Ireland. We in this Chamber are not in a particularly marvellous position to criticise others for their failures. Ours stand before us in all the brutality of death.

I express appreciation to all those colleagues, on both sides of the House, who took the opportunity of their visit to Moscow to raise matters relating to human rights in general, with the Soviet authorities, and who also raised a matter that is very dear to me. All my grandparents were fortunate enough to emerge from the Soviet Union. I want others, not least Jewish people, to have the right to do the same.

I shall never forget that the Red Army was our ally in war. Those who are most hurt today by the Soviet Union's behaviour over human rights are its friends.

I hope that one day those who have won the award of the all-party Parliamentary Committee for the release of Soviet Jewry — people like Vladimir Slepak, Ida Nudel, Alexander Lerner — as well as Alexei Levin and others less known — will come to this House and be received in freedom. I hope that Shcharansky, whose freedom we celebrate, will come here one day and will receive the Bible that so many of us signed, in the hope but never in the belief that he would be free to receive it from us.

That leaves one matter upon which I shall spend a little time. On almost every occasion that I have sought to raise it I have been ruled out of order. I was invited to raise it on another hon. Member's Adjournment debate last Friday, but that debate did not take place.

It is right that we should look at the past in order to light our way into the future. We should look at what happened to British soldiers who were murdered after they were taken prisoner in order that we may see who did it, and why. We must try to ensure that the kind of people who followed the Fuehrer never achieve power here, as they have done, alas, in other lands, very recently. I refer to the Waldheim matter.

I wish to place before the House information that has not been placed before it in the past. A number of British military personnel were arrested in Greece by German Army Group E. Lieutenant Kurt Waldheim was in charge of all interrogations. I have here a copy of a document that I have passed to the Secretary of State for Defence, which shows that in December 1943 Waldheim was in total charge of all interrogations by that unit.

In April 1944 – at a time when, at one stage, Waldheim said that he was out of the army but when clear records show that this was a lie – a team of seven British commandos and three Greek partisans set out on a raid. They were captured. All of them were interrogated by Waldheim's unit, and probably by Waldheim himself. Only one of them survived, Captain William Blythe. He died several years ago. The rest, so far as we know, were sent for what was called "sonderbehandlung." I served as a war crimes investigator in the British Army of the Rhine. "Sonderbehandlung" was a hideous word which we all got to know. It means, very simply, elimination – the murder of prisoners and civilians.

All these British prisoners of war other than Bill Blythe were eliminated. I even have a telegram in German, which I shall translate. It referred to certain people, including a man called Carpenter, a radio operator, and a Greek sailor called Ligaris. The telegram was sent after Waldheim had asked what was to be done with these people after their interrogation was over.

"They are no longer required", said his opposite number,
"and they should be sent for 'sonderbehandlung' in accordance with the Fuehrer's order."
They died. They were murdered.

I have managed to trace some of the brave commandos, in this country. Details have been provided to the Defence Secretary, along with another four names which came to light last week. Finally, a letter was received by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle), who was kind enough to send a copy to me. He is with the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegation in Gibraltar, and I thank him for his agreement that I should raise this case here. I thank my research assistant, Steven Cohen, who visited a man called Frank Notley, who kindly gave permission for his name to be used and who lives in Warrington. I shall read only two paragraphs from his extremely moving letter. He said:

"I was a regular soldier and after completing 23 years in the Army I retired in 1957. I was taken prisoner in North Africa and escaped on two occasions from camps in Italy and Germany. I know a little about this swine Waldheim. I first saw him at Camp 182 in Italy. He was present when approximately 30 British soldiers who had been shot dead were returned to Camp 182 for burial. The poor lads were slung out of the back of German lorries as if they were sacks of garbage. You may draw your own conclusion what hand he had in this matter. I again saw him at the Interrogation Centre where I was held."

I hope that other British prisoners who saw this man Waldheim involved with the death of British troops will come forward and let it be known.

Waldheim was not brought to justice. I have a United Nations War Crimes Commission document which puts him in category A—the top category—of war criminals. He was accused by the Yugoslavs for putting hostages to death and for murder. He was never tried. Instead, he became Secretary-General of the United Nations. The first time around, the United Kingdom vetoed his appointment. The second time, we approved it. I hope that the Minister of State will explain why the veto was applied and why it was lifted on the second occasion. If he tells us that that was because of suspected inefficiency, no one in his right mind will believe it. Waldheim was an efficient senior staff officer in charge of interrogations and the veto was applied because we knew precisely what he had been up to during the war, including his part in the killing of Yugoslavs, Greeks, Italians and Jews. Perhaps we did not know about the British prisoners, but we know about them now.

When I first inquired about the British prisoners at business questions, the Leader of the House said:

"I see no particular profit in having a debate . . . or getting involved in the controversies that now rage between the World Jewish Congress and the supporters of Dr. Waldheim". [Official Report, 1 May 1986; Vol. 96, c. 1108.]

That was a disgraceful statement which, I am pleased to say, he was good enough effectively to withdraw. He personally asked the Ministry of Defence to conduct an inquiry into these matters. We have not had the result yet.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my hon. and learned Friend accept that many of us gentiles – if I can put it that way – non-Jewish people, are becoming increasingly concerned by what we are learning and particularly at the idea that a man could in any way be category A? What on earth were the United Nations and the British vetting systems up to?

Mr. Janner: I thank my hon. Friend. This is not a matter of Jewish concern; it is a matter of human rights concern, for everybody. It is true that Waldheim was in Greece at the time when almost the entire Jewish communities of Salonika and Rhodes were wiped out, but far more Yugoslavs, Italians and Greeks were killed by his unit and, directly or indirectly, not a few British.

Why that happened is a curious story. I have a feeling, which I hope one day to be able to prove, that when the war with the Germans was over we, and the Americans in particular, had only one main concern, and that was now to deal with the Russians. Therefore, thousands of Nazi war criminals were allowed to go free.

If one then asks why the Russians approved of Waldheim's appointment that is another question. They well knew what he was up to. The answer was probably that they were blocking a Finn whom they did not want as Secretary-General, partly because he was a Finn, partly, I fear, for other reasons, and perhaps partly because people sometimes like to have others in positions of authority over whom they believe that they have some hold.

What is now coming out is that all over the world there has been a cover-up operation, and I regret to say that it appears to extend to Britain. Researchers went to the Public Record Office to look for files about British prisioners of war and about Waldheim. Among the files, they found that a series was missing.

I asked the Prime Minister why those files were missing and whether we could see them. She replied that we could not see them because they were of military or security or intelligence importance. I then asked what they were about. How, after 40 years, can that be? She replied that it was not customary to give details of the contents of files of that sort. I have written again and told her that I would not ask for anything to be revealed which could affect Britain's security in any way. No self-respecting Member of the House would do so. But I cannot believe that after 40 years there could be anything that could today affect Britian's security by one iota; that there could be anything from that time which could affect what happens today in the military or other intelligence sphere affect this land.

I believe that this concealment is part of a cover-up operation which applies to Yugoslavia, to the United States, the United Nations and certainly to the Soviet Union. I should like to think that Britain was not involved in it. When those missing files are opened up we will know. If they do not show complicity, let us see them. They cannot have military significance after all these years. If they conceal guilt and they are covered up, there will be a swell of feeling on both sides of the House. Hon. Members will demand that they be produced.

Mr. Dalyell: Ought there not then to be a Government statement on the operation of the weeding system?

Mr. Janner: I agree.

I have been trying hard to obtain a statement from the Government and have failed. Perhaps if there is enough pressure — many hon. Members on both sides of the House feel strongly about this — we shall get the documents and people will see that this is not a vendetta against a man for what he did years ago. He has lied yesterday and today about the matter. He has been elected President of Austria and our Government have sent congratulations to him while we are holding an inquiry into his involvement in the killing of British prisoners of war. How could we do that?

When Waldheim is seated on the presidential throne, are we to send representatives to clap and to cheer? I fear that we shall and that we shall say that it is normal protocol because he was elected.

If that happens I remind the House that it will be a direct repetition of what we did, not in 1933 when Hitler was elected, but in 1934 when he became head of state. A reception was held at which British people were present along with the rest. We as a nation regretted that for many years thereafter.

There are standards of decency of which we in Britain can be hugely proud; standards without which some of us would not be in the House, proclaiming our freedom to speak our minds. But that freedom must be watched over and preserved. The Waldheim case is of great importance, as a touchstone of decency. There will be many in the House who will pursue it until we reach the truth.

8.47 pm

Mr. William Shelton (Streatham): I am glad to follow the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), whose work I admire very much. He is a great fighter for justice and truth. I hope that what he has said under privilege this evening is well substantiated. Knowing him, I am sure that it is.

I envied the certainty with which he spoke in the first part of his speech for several million blacks in South Africa and the certainty with which he spoke for several million whites in the United States. I wish that I could be as certain about the feelings of those in other countries as he is.

It is on southern Africa that I want to spend a few minutes this evening, not South Africa, but a major country of great importance in south-west Africa — Namibia. I was there a few months ago with my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn), who led our delegation.

I am speaking about Namibia because it is an important country for three reasons. They are little known but nevertheless they are important. First, it has enormous untapped mineral wealth and is one of the wealthiest countries in minerals that are least developed. The Rossing uranium mine in Namibia provides, I think, about 45 per cent. of all the uranium used in western Europe. That fact alone must give cause for thought.

The second reason for its importance is that it lies between Angola to the north and South Africa, which occupied many hours of parliamentary time recently, to the south. What happens in Namibia in the next year or two will have an impact on South Africa. Thirdly, the changes that are taking place in Namibia could be a lesson to us as to what, perhaps, could or should happen in South Africa.

Namibia is undergoing profound constitutional change. In June last year the new transitional Government was inaugurated and power was genuinely transferred from South Africa to this new Government. The Government have complete power and authority, except, at the moment, in foreign affairs and external defence. The Government are genuinely democratic and pluralist and there is no apartheid in Namibia, except in certain schools, and the new Government are in the process of legislating to remove that.

The Government are transitional because the leaders in the Cabinet, which contains only one white member, the rest being black, are not elected—they are party leaders. The House will know about the problem of the South West Africa People's Organisation. It is based in Angola and is leading guerrilla raids into the north of Namibia. It has refused to take part in this transitional Government.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The Government are illegal.

Mr. Shelton: As the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) says, they do not have international recognition. That is why I say that they are transitional. That Government lost their case in the European Court of Justice, but their purpose, which I am sure the hon. Gentleman would support in general terms, if not in particular, is to form a new constitution which they will put to a referendum. If and when it is approved, they will hold internationally supervised elections which they hope will lead to international recognition.

Namibia stands at a crossroads and that is why I am drawing it to the attention of the House. One road could well lead to a Marxist-style unitary state, a closed state as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier, along the lines of its northern neighbour Angola, or along the lines of Mozambique. Such a state would be hostile to our interests and probably wretched for the people of Namibia. The other road could just possibly lead in the opposite direction, to a free, prosperous, democratic, westward—looking open state. The road which Namibia follows may well depend upon the outcome of the offensive taking place in Angola against UNITA, and waged by Angolan troops led by Cubans, advised by Russians and East Germans and using jets that are piloted, I am advised, by Cubans and East Germans. That gives the House an idea of the state of play in that offensive.

The offensive has now started and its purpose is to crush UNITA and to drive Dr. Savimbi out of Jamba where he has his headquarters. If UNITA survives it will be because it has received help from South Africa. More important, it will also have received help from our friend and colleague, the United States. If UNITA survives it will be because of the Stinger anti-aircraft missiles that have been supplied by the United States to the UNITA movement. One might say that South Africa should not help UNITA, but I say that it should, and the United States has also lent a helping hand.

Let us examine what would flow from the crushing of UNITA by Angolan forces. The Cubans would then be able to withdraw from the north of Angola. If that happened, the South Africans would, willy-nilly, have to implement their undertaking on resolution 435 of the United Nations, which I am sure the House knows about. South Africa has said it will implement that resolution if the Cubans have withdrawn by 1 August. That would lead to the abolition of the present transitional Government and, until the elections took place, Namibia would be ruled by a South African director general and by a representative of the United Nations. There would be elections, perhaps a year later, supervised by the United Nations.

In general, the Namibian people believe that the United Nations supports SWAPO. Why should they? In 1973 the United Nations said that SWAPO was the "authentic representative of the Namibian people."

The House will know that it was the United Nations Assembly that said that and not the Security Council. However, such a distinction would pass unnoticed by the average Namibian voter. Secondly, the United Nations gives financial support only to SWAPO among the Namibian political parties. Thirdly, only SWAPO has the right to address the United Nations Security Council and the General Assembly. Finally, only SWAPO has permanent observer status at the United Nations. Of course, United Nations observers would be neutral, but the result would be likely to be an overwhelming SWAPO victory and that would be due to the bandwagon effect often seen in Africa, because the Namibian voter would believe that SWAPO had the official backing of the United Nations and was therefore most likely to win. [Interruption.] If Opposition hon. Members will stop speaking for a moment perhaps other hon. Members might be able to hear what I am trying to say.

The implementation of resolution 435 would load the dice in favour of SWAPO. If UNITA is crushed and the Cubans go and if resolution 435 is implemented by South Africa by 1 August the elections that follow will be supervised by the United Nations. If the people of Namibia think that SWAPO is supported by the United Nations that would load the dice in favour of a SWAPO victory. An overwhelming SWAPO victory would not be in the best interests of Britain or of the people of Namibia.

Let me remind the House that in its 1976 political programme SWAPO said that it wanted to impose scientific Socialism, introduce the social ownership of all the resources of the country, and foster anti-imperialist international solidarity with Socialist countries. The Opposition may say that that is a good idea, but I do not, nor do I think it would be in our best interests.

Mr. George Robertson: The hon. Gentleman specifically wanted my attention. Is he saying that we should load the dice against an organisation in the unlikely event, at least in the short term, that there are free elections in that country? Are we going to choose who the new Government will be, or are we going to take a chance, as we did in the Zimbabwe settlement?

Mr. Shelton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his interest. It is possible to have elections in which the dice are not loaded. I am sure that he would favour that just as much as I would. But if elections were held against the background that I have described, the dice would be loaded in favour of SWAPO. Like, I am sure, the hon. Gentleman, I should prefer to see free elections.

If UNITA survives, the Cubans will not be withdrawn, because the Angolan Government will need them in order to defend themselves against it. Consequently, resolution 435 will not be implemented, which will give the new Government time to put the constitution to a referendum, to implement their legislative programme, which I hope will gain support, and to call elections by the end of next year. There could be independent observers, perhaps from the Contact Group or the Common Market, and SWAPO could be invited to take part in the elections. So far, SWAPO has always refused [Interruption.] I am afraid that the interest shown by the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) was very fleeting.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): The hon. Gentleman needs a brief.

Mr. Shelton: On the contrary, it is the hon. Gentleman who needs a brief. If he listens to me instead of to his colleagues on the Opposition Front Bench, he will get one.

If the transitional Government call elections before the end of next year and invite SWAPO to take part, SWAPO may well do so. Its base in Angola will be in some difficulty, because UNITA has not been crushed, and the Government may be achieving their programme in Namibia. Thus, SWAPO may take part in free independent elections. However, I very much doubt whether SWAPO will have an overwhelming victory.

So I say to the House and to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench, who no doubt are paying much more attention than those on the Opposition Front Bench, that if resolution 435 stacks the dice in favour of SWAPO, which could then form a Marxist Government hostile to our interests, our own Government should reconsider our unquestioning support of it. That is especially so if there is on the horizon an alternative road to genuine independence, which is more likely to lead to democratic government.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has told me that resolution 435 is the only option with which everyone agrees. But that is not so. In Namibia SWAPO's supporters may total 30 or even 50 per cent., but in general terms, no one else supports that resolution. I should like to see equal recognition of all Namibian parties by the United Nations and an extension of equal rights to them all.

The United Nations should stop paying funds to only one party, which probably represents a minority, albeit a large minority. Our Government should do all that they can to get SWAPO to talk to the transitional Government. Lessons can be drawn for South Africa from events in that neighbouring country.

[Mr. Shelton]

All the political parties, bar two, in Namibia, are co-operating with the white people, in order to move towards free elections and democratic government. That move forward does not spring from the men of violence. It is not SWAPO, but the moderate black peoples, through their political organisations, who have achieved that. Of course, they are accused of being puppets of South Africa. I do not believe that they are, but even if they were, it would not matter as long as they gained genuine freedom and democracy. Surely a peaceful process is better than a violent process.

That road forward must be right, and I urge the Government to support those endeavours.

9.3 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): A full-scale foreign affairs debate is almost as unlikely as a knighthood for Arthur Scargill. But this week we have had two opportunities, because there was a debate yesterday on South Africa and we now have this sprawling and wide-ranging debate. It is ridiculous that there should be inadequate opportunity for full-scale debates on individual international issues. I should like to contribute to a full-scale debate, for example, on arms control. Perhaps I should have said "the arms race", because there is precious little control at present. That is a subject on which the House has failed to make its voice clear. At the same time, the Prime Minister lamely defends virtually every act of the United States Administration in nuclear expansion.

We have not had a debate on the need for a chemical weapons ban, an issue which I raised yesterday in Defence questions and upon which the Government need full-scale chivvying if they are to show the will to come to an agreement.

I do not recall a full-scale debate on the middle east since the 1983 general election, despite the fundamental nature of the injustice and conflict in the area. It has a continuing potential to spread violence and to bring the world to the brink of war. I am one of the sponsors of early-day motion No. 948, which supports the "rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination within an independent sovereign state" and

"recognises the Palestine Liberation Organisation as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people".

There is a need for a debate on Afghanistan. A few cursory references have been made to it during the debate but that is all. I visited Afghanistan recently. Indeed, I was the first western politician to meet the new leader, Dr. Majeeb. There is a need for an informed debate in the House on Afghanistan. Instead, in the Foreign Secretary's contribution, we had a succession of slurs and remarks of undiluted hostility. That is no way to create the conditions that will lead to the Russian troops leaving that country and enable Dr. Majeeb to emerge with his country from feudalism.

Those debates and my contribution to them will have to wait for future opportunities to arise. I wish to address my remarks to the crisis in South Africa, on which there was a debate yesterday. I make no apology for directing my contribution to South Africa despite yesterday's debate because there was not an opportunity for me to participate in that debate. The pressure must be maintained upon the Prime Minister and her Government from inside and outside the House to end her deliberate intransigence, which so helps the current regime in South Africa. I understand that there will be a Cabinet meeting tomorrow, which means that this debate is a suitable occasion on which to point to the action that it is necessary to take.

British capitalism is the main support of apartheid. British companies are the main investors in South Africa. About 40 per cent. of direct investment comes from British companies, and that amounts to £5 billion. Over half the foreign companies operating in South Africa are controlled from the United Kingdom and British banks raised over a quarter of all the capital raised for South Africa. Barclays bank is one of the prime banking houses involved in South Africa. Incidentally, the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), the SDP spokesman on economic affairs, is a paid adviser to Barclays bank.

It is the Conservative party, and especially the Prime Minister, which is the apologist for South Africa everywhere. It is the right hon. Lady and her Government who have been stonewalling and blocking sanctions at every opportunity in the Commonwealth, in the Common Market and at the United Nations. I have a copy of the memorandum that was presented to the Foreign Secretary today by the Anti-Apartheid Movement. It states:

"Britain has lamentably performed the role of protecting South Africa from international action. As worldwide opposition to apartheid has mounted, Britain has chosen to play the prime role in developing and sustaining this evil system. For example, British oil companies are the main suppliers of fuel to the apartheid war machine. British banks dominate the apartheid economy. British electronic companies equip much of the South African police and military and British chemical companies sustain its explosives industries."

What an indictment that is. The Government will not speak to the African National Congress but they disgustedly welcomed President Botha here in June 1984. They are prepared to sacrifice the Commonwealth in subservience to apartheid protectionist policy.

Let us dwell on how the Government have effectively put the boot into the Commonwealth. In October last year a Commonwealth accord was adopted at Nassau dealing with a mandatory arms embargo and economic measures. What is the Government's record on that accord in detail? One of the agreements in the accord was:

"A readiness to take unilaterally what action might be possible to preclude the imports of Krugerrands".

The Government waited seven months before they took any action on that score. That can be contrasted with the United States who took action within a few days of declaring its intention to do so. Another part of the accord stated:

"No government funding for trade missions to South Africa, or for participating in exhibitions and fairs in South Africa".

The Leeds chamber of commerce visited South Africa with Government funding after the adoption of the accord. Trade with South Africa is encouraged by the United Kingdom South Africa Trade Association which enjoys the support of the British Overseas Trade Board. Government funds are still expended in the promotion of trade with South Africa through the presence of commercial attachés in the British embassy in South Africa.

Another agreement was:

"A ban on the sale and export of computer equipment capabale of use by South African military forces, police or security forces".

Such computer equipment can still be exported without a licence from this country to South Africa. The Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985 provides a massive loophole because it effectively removes control over the export of computers other than those specifically categorised in that order. Therefore, there is a great loophole of which the South African military can take advantage.

Another part of the accord provides for:

"A ban on new contracts for the sale and export of nuclear goods, materials and technology to South Africa."

The British Government refuse to disclose information about the sale and export of nuclear goods. However, a formal agreement exists between the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and the Nuclear Corporation of South Africa. The agreement provides for access by South Africa to British nuclear technology and know-how.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) rose

Mr. Cohen: I shall give way when I finish dealing with the accord.

The accord also states that there should be

"A ban on the sale and export of oil to South Africa".

No such ban exists. It also states:

"A strict and rigorously controlled embargo on imports on arms and ammunition, military vehicles and para-military equipment from South Africa."

No

"strict and rigorous controlled embargo" exists.

It also states that there should be "An embargo on all military cooperation with South Africa".

No such embargo exists. It goes on:

"Discouragement of all cultural and scientific events except where these contribute towards the ending of apartheid or have no possible role in promoting it".

Britain is not enforcing that measure. Funds are still provided through the British Council for visits and activities in South Africa which are not to do with the ending of apartheid.

What a dismal record the Government have on the Nassau accord.

Mr. Winterton: I am not sure who prepared the hon. Gentleman's brief for this important debate, but is he aware that the United Kingdom has honoured the arms embargo against South Africa in a unique fashion, unlike most other countries and particularly France, which stepped in to supply arms when the United Kingdom introduced the embargo?

With regard to the nuclear situation, is the hon. Gentleman aware that Israel — a country that he often supports in the House — is probably responsible for providing the nuclear technology now possessed by South Africa?

Mr. Cohen: I condemn all countries which provide support, especially military support, to the apartheid regime. The hon. Gentleman referred to Britain's unique role in this matter. It is certainly unique because it is full of holes and has been breached in all the ways that I have described.

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has often spoken of South Africa in glowing and admiring terms. His claim that Britain has adhered to the arms embargo is nonsense in view of the sale of computer equipment, chemicals and other back-up technologies for the assistance of the police state in South Africa. In that respect, the British Government are defying their own embargo.

Mr. Cohen: I agree entirely. I cannot recall the full details, but in a case last year it was the trade unions who managed to prevent the export of military equipment to South Africa by stopping it at the port.

The Government have treated the Commonwealth in a disgraceful fashion and seem prepared to sacrifice it altogether. In the past, the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs spoke of sending a signal to the South African regime, but the only signal from the Conservative Government has been that they will appease and apologise for the South African regime at all times. There has certainly been no signal of any effective action to say that apartheid must end.

One of the reasons for that attitude is the Conservative party's ties with companies with investments in South Africa. More than 30 per cent. of donations to the Conservative party come from companies with assets in South Africa. Despite that, however, the Conservative party is split on this issue. On the one hand, there are the out-and-out racists who have crept into the party by the back door and those who have vested interests in South Africa.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Name them.

Mr. Cohen: It is clear from the Register of Members' Interests which Members go on trips paid for by the South African Government and are directors of companies with investments in South Africa.

On the other hand, some Conservatives rightly regard apartheid as morally abhorrent. Others fear Britain's isolation in the world. Others rightly regard support for the South African regime as bad for business with black Africa and in the long term with South Africa itself.

The racist regime in South Africa is a vicious and murderous regime. In the last state of emergency there were well over 1,000 deaths and it has started again on a large scale. We know from our television screens how the news blackout has been imposed, and the official propaganda is blatant lies.

Mr. Corbyn: On the first day of the news blackout Soweto day a whole congregation was arrested in church, but that could not be reported by any of the international press there. Is it not incumbent on all Western countries which maintain relations with South Africa to take on the role of telling people what is happening in Soweto and other townships in the hands of the South African military?

Mr. Cohen: I agree with that comment. Conservative Members who hear their hon. Friends supporting and justifying a Government who arrest a whole church congregation must surely think twice about having such people as party colleagues. Part of the nonsense we hear is that black is killing black. The main violence is carried out by the security forces of the regime and by the vigilantes who have been set up, sponsored and supported by it. Then there is the imprisonment of Nelson Mandela and the harassment of Winnie Mandela and countless others who are struggling for freedom.

The regime also exports its apartheid to Namibia. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has just made a speech about that, but he did not tell the House that more than 100,000 South African-controlled troops are in illegal occupation of that country and that the transitional Government is a puppet of South Africa. No wonder that Government do not have control over foreign affairs and other issues; SWAPO is the legitimate voice of the people.

The South African regime is also a threat to the whole region, as the attacks on the three neighbouring capitals during the visit of the Eminent Persons Group showed. Direct raids, destabilisation and subversion of neighbouring countries has cost billions of pounds and thousands of lives. Yet the British Government defend that regime.

The Government's excuses for not imposing sanctions are feeble. The first main excuse is the argument about jobs in Britain being at risk. What crocodile tears. The Government have not cared about jobs in this country during their seven years in office. They ignore also the opportunity for expanding trade with independent black Africa and the jobs that that would create. They ignore too the prospects for the security of those assets and investments and for trade with South Africa which will be so important for jobs when the inevitable change to black majority rule occurs. If we are frozen out then because Britain supported the racists, the prospects for jobs in Britain will be much worse.

The Anti-Apartheid Movement memorandum summarised the argument on jobs:

> "At best it reflects a failure to grasp the dimensions of the crisis now facing Southern Africa and the possible consequences and costs for human life. At worst, they are a cynical justification for maintaining existing trade and investment patterns and the profits which flow from them. Those profits are from racist and murderous oppression."

That is a very good summary.

The second main argument of the Government against the imposition of effective sanctions is that they will hurt the blacks. They should tell that to the families of the blacks who have already been murdered. The blacks want sanctions so much that they are imposing them themselves via strikes and boycotts. When Sam Nujoma, the president of SWAPO, addressed a Labour party meeting here he summed up the argument succinctly. He said that the Africans are a dispossessed people and that sanctions hurt the whites, not the blacks. The front-line states have been prepared to make substantial sacrifices to impose sanctions.

Let me give Bishop Tutu the last word on the erroneous and phoney argument of the Government about sanctions hurting the blacks. In a statement today he said:

> "I cannot accept Mrs. Thatcher's argument that South Africa's black people would suffer most if sanctions were applied. Blacks are suffering now. We have prayed. We have pleaded for decades with the western Governments in the name of humanity to help end apartheid. Instead we keep being reminded of reforms. We do not want the chains around our necks to be loosened. We want them removed. Apartheid must be dismantled. Our suffering must end. If we do not have sanctions soon then Heaven help us. If sanctions are not applied soon then the future will be catastrophic."

We should support those who argue for sanctions and those who are struggling for change with effective sanctions now.

We should take up the Anti-Apartheid Movement's call to break off diplomatic relations with the South African regime. We should support those who are fighting for a non-racist, democratic, majority rule South Africa. That will happen anyway. We should be supporting it, not because it is inevitable but because it is right.

9.25 pm

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Before he became hysterical and beside himself with plastic indignation, the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) made a good point. It is often made and seldom reacted to by the usual channels. It is that we do not have enough foreign affairs debates. I believe that more hon. Members would be present if we had more debates on specific foreign affairs topics. If the hon. Member for Leyton had confined himself to making sensible points such as that, we could all have applauded his speech.

A little before him, the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) made what I think all of us would regard as startling and horrific revelations about the alleged activities of President Waldheim. They would shock us all, and further investigation is obviously vital. The Government must respond positively. I hope that there will not be any in this House who think that such revelations should be swept under the carpet because bygones should remain bygones. If the generation that has been born since the Nazi atrocities should ever be protected from such knowledge, is it not that much more likely that those atrocities could happen again?

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made a wise and witty speech. It was witty in that the so-called dead sheep actually did savage the bruiser from Leeds. It was wise because it is wise for the Government to undertake no new initiatives in the middle east. Although they pay lip service to the Venice declaration, I am pleased that it now seems to be dead. Although they pay no lip service to Camp David, it sounds as though the Camp David agreement is being allowed to revive.

My right hon. and learned Friend's speech was wise because he spoke of the importance of the Atlantic Alliance, which is under strain, not least as a result of the behaviour of our friends who appear to have rewarded our brand of loyalty to them in a rather less than responsive way.

There is also the wisdom of our commitment to improvement of the world food supply to famine-prone nations. I am delighted to see that the Government Front Bench is now occupied by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development, who has done much to help guide British foreign policy in Europe and in the Commonwealth to provide a better distribution of food supplues and resources that will help peasant farmers to provide more food of higher quality themselves. Many of my constituents and others will welcome the accolade of an award for Bob Geldof for the wonderful work that he has done to alert all of us to the pressing needs of the African sub-continent.

It was a wise speech because it referred to the need for nuclear strength as the strongest bastion of world peace and to human rights as the strongest bastion there is of a humane and happy society.

There is sanity from the Government over economic sanctions. I have been here for all the speeches, and it is ridiculous for some hon. Members to sound off as though in our resistence of economic sanctions we are demanding something that is contrary to the interests of the black majority in South Africa. To relieve our own feelings of guilt and the emotional hatred of apartheid which we all have, we are being pressed to cause economic collapse, because that is the object of the exercise. If we take away the jobs that are now being filled by 1 million or 2 million blacks in South Africa, they will go on to the streets and will be driven by leaders into revolution. They will therefore spark off repression, and there will be infinitely more bloodshed, infinitely more quickly, than if by negotiation we try to sort out the mess and confusion of South Africa.

I am told that this is against the wishes of the blacks, but Labour Members have a terrible hang-up about going to South Africa and meeting South Africans. They should meet those people, because when the leader of 6 million Zulus says, "No sanctions," and when the leader of 4·5 million blacks Anglicans says, "No sanctions," we are indeed listening when we say that economic sanctions are not the best way of getting South Africa out of this problem.

Mr. George Robertson: Before the hon. and learned Gentleman makes such statements, perhaps he will check the facts. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) are both going to South Africa next week with that precise purpose in mind. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East, who is our spokesman on South Africa, spent nearly a fortnight there last year consulting precisely that opinion to ensure that the opinions that we hold are as authoritative as possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: He met a very narrow group of people—the UDF.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman is a paid apologist and a Fascist.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) made a remark from a sedentary position which I am sure he will want to withdraw. We ought not to allege lack of integrity and honour against any hon. Member.

Mr. Foulkes: I withdraw the second part of what I said. The hon. Gentleman is a paid apologist of the regime.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman accused me of being a Fascist. I ask him to withdraw. It is unjustified, and he says it without proof.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say that I did not hear that remark.

Mr. Foulkes: I withdrew that remark, but sustained my remark about the hon. Gentleman being a paid apologist of the apartheid regime.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I am certainly not a paid apologist. If the hon. Gentleman can prove that I have received any money from the South African Government——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley again knows that that is an allegation of dishonour against an hon. Member that is not allowed, and he must withdraw it.

Mr. Foulkes: If you insist, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I withdraw.

Mr. Lawrence: I was rather hoping that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) would repeat that outside the House so that I could offer my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) legal assistance, for which I would be paid.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: And I would accept.

Mr. Lawrence: Having praised the Government, I must also say that there are one or two inconsistent features of our policy. If we are determined, as the Foreign Secretary said we were and I am sure we are to take a stand against terrorism and violence, which we would all applaud and to that extent we sent packing two representatives of the PLO who refused to renounce violence why then do we call for the release of Nelson Mandela before he renounces terrorism and violence? That is an inconsistency.

On a less violent and more ideological level, the determination to enhance Britain's reputation and to foster adherence to principles of democracy and freedom under the law, which we all embrace and would like to see advanced, clashes somewhat with our reluctance to spend adequately on teaching overseas students in this country and bringing our system of education and the British way of life more closely into their lives. I sometimes think that the same is true of our reluctance to fund BBC overseas services properly, which would do more than anything to spread abroad the good name of Britain's democracy and our way of life and rule of law.

Perhaps I should tell my hon. Friend the Minister of State that a famous refusenik I am sure he will not mind my naming him Victor Brailovsky in Moscow told me that he thought the reason why the Soviet Union did not jam the BBC overseas services in English was that the authorities had some respect for the quality of the broadcasts, which were balanced, and contrasted with some of the other English language broadcasts from other nations, which will remain nameless. That is my tour d'horizon.

I now turn to the central issue of both Front-Bench speeches — United Kingdom-Soviet relations. Soviet leaders listening to the speech of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and to a lesser extent to speeches of other Opposition Members, will have reason to pat themselves on the back for having taken in some important Members of Parliament. Obviously, Mr. Gorbachev is a new leader with a more presentable and attractive face, and so has his wife. Surely it is far too premature to conclude on that evidence that this is a new Soviet Union with a new approach to the United States and Western Europe?

Hon. Members should ask themselves some questions. Would Mr. Gorbachev have come so far so quickly if he had not had the backing of the old guard, which means that he was endorsing their policies? Is there any reason to think that the international department of the Supreme Soviet, which inspired the invasion of Afghanistan, has changed its attitudes or policies? Does not the appointment of a Soviet Foreign Minister with little experience of foreign affairs—the right hon. Member for Leeds, East used that fact in support of his argument—mean that foreign policy is more likely, not less likely, to be guided by party officials the apparatchiks? When we have weak leadership, Ministers or councillors, who takes power? It is the civil servants and local government officials. Is there any reason to think that the KGB or the GRU are to be wound down, or that subversion will be any less in the world than it has been in the past? What evidence is there that the Soviet Union has changed its ideological and opportunistic spots? It has not withdrawn from Afghanistan. It has not stopped banning Russian-speaking broadcasts. It has not improved the free flow of ideas. It has not done much to improve trade between our nations, and it has not made any noticeable concessions on human rights.

As the Foreign Affairs Select Committee stated in paragraphs 2.10 and 2.11 of its third report on United Kingdom-Soviet relations, which was published at the end of May:

"No one who has had direct discussions with contemporary Soviet leaders can fail to have observed their implacable ideological opposition to Western capitalism, their attribution to the United States and its allies of responsibility for the current causes of international tension, their belief (though declining) in capitalism's 'inevitable' demise, and their professed faith in the inevitable victory of world socialism . . .

There was no sign of a shift away from these fundamental, ideologically-based perspectives in Mr. Gorbachev's recent report to the 27th Congress of the Soviet Communist Party, nor could such a shift be expected."

To conclude that the Russian bear after Mr. Gorbachev's accession is a different animal, or that the fresh mind referred to by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East is necessarily a different mind, is wishful thinking of the kind in which the right hon. Gentleman usually indulges to great excess.

Lest I sound despairing, I tell my hon. Friend the Minister that I am not. It is quite clear that a change of attitude is emerging in the Soviet Union from which the world could benefit. It is important to appreciate that we are dealing with a new position. We should not be deluded into thinking that we are dealing with a different adversary.

The change of attitude has come about because the Soviet Union is desperately anxious for nuclear disarmament. I think that all hon. Members welcome that and agree with it. The main reason for that change is that the Soviet Union has now to face the problem of a total lack of resources in the face of the strategic defence initiative. The problems facing the Soviet Union are many. It has difficulty feeding itself. It has difficulty running its economy efficiently. It has difficulty, in a world of mass communication, keeping its consumers happy. Its consumers will shortly, if they do not already, be able to see more clearly on their television screens the pleasures enjoyed by citizens of other countries. The Soviet Union has difficulty funding its satellite countries.

The Foreign Affairs Select Committee recently visited Vietnam. It was clear to us that the Russians have put a limit on the amount of money that they are able to pour into Vietnam and the army in Kampuchea. I think that that is why a date of 1990 has been set for their withdrawal, although that seems to me to be contrary to what one would expect to happen in the far east. If the Russians do not withdraw in 1990, there will be a loss of face.

The Soviets have difficulty funding Cuba, Central America, and all their activities throughout the world. They have difficulties within their own empire. One of those is the rise of Islamic fundamentalism, which is beginning to worry them greatly. They have problems of defence against China, ideologically as well as militarily, on their borders. They have difficulty controlling the far-flung provinces of the Soviet Union. Vladivostok is almost a million miles away from Moscow. One can see, when the Soviets have to deal with the leaders of those countries, how difficult it is for them to exercise control.

I do not know whether the stories from Chernobyl are true. Stories are coming out of Chernobyl that the extent of the medical disaster is more considerable than we would like to think. If that is so, the Soviet Union will shortly be trying, throughout the world, to gain access to medical equipment and supplies which it cannot provide.

As a result of all those problems and the strain on the resources of the Soviet Union, the new man with the new look has come in. He visited the United Kingdom in November 1984 as the guest of the IPU and the Select Committee. He came with his Foreign Affairs Committee. The Foreign Affairs Committee of this Parliament and the IPU visited the Soviet Union. The Soviet Foreign Affairs Committee is, we hope, to visit Britain again. The Soviet Foreign Minister is coming here in July. There is a greater exchange between the Soviet Union and Britain. I have no reason to think that the same thing is not happening with other countries.

The Soviets are wooing the United Kingdom in particular. That is not just because they have a certain admiration for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister which I think was manifest to us when we were in the Soviet Union. They have a certain respect for the prompt action that we took in the Falklands. They think that we are capable of putting a restraining hand on the United States of America. They hope that they can drive a wedge between the Atlantic Alliance and either Britain or Europe and stop the United States developing the strategic defence initiative. They are afraid of matching the expense of that programme. I cannot help but feel that those in Britain who press strongly for the reversal of that programme and for Britain to stop its support of it are playing the Soviet game.

In the face of such an objective, we should be strengthening the Atlantic Alliance, not weakening it, and backing the strategic defence initiative, not trying to kill it. When we were in Russia, it was clear that the Supreme Soviet was paranoid about SDI—as paranoid as some of those hon. Members who have spoken against SDI. If that is a fair assessment, that feeling provides the best hope of bringing the Soviet Union to the negotiating table, which it did, and keeping it there, which it is doing. We hope that the Soviet Union will come forward with more genuine, meaningful, and acceptable proposals for nuclear and conventional arms reductions. The card of the SDI is a strong one in Western hands.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman not deeply regret President Reagan's decision to abandon the latest SALT negotiations? Will he confirm that, in recent years, there has been no occasion on which the Soviet Union has walked away from negotiations? The Gorbachev plan is to enhance negotiations rather than to walk away from them. Would the hon. and learned Gentleman not do better addressing his remarks to President Reagan?

Mr. Lawrence: The United States did walk away in Geneva. It was showing a more solid face against the negotiating procedures in a number of other fora than we have seen since the SDI was launched. I agree with the Government's view, which, strangely enough, is shared by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), that we should try to persuade the United States to think again about its proposals on the SALT relationship.

Human rights — the release of Soviet Jewry, the honouring of religious freedom for Christians, Jews and those of any other religious sect and cultural freedom — are important to us. My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) said to Mr. Gorbachev that the human rights issue was not a laughing matter because for us in the West it was important for its own sake. That point has been endorsed by a number of hon. Members.

But it is even more important than that. The Soviet attitude to human rights is an indication of how much we can trust the Soviet Union in a world in which the absence of trust is what separates the West from the East. If the Soviet Union fails to honour its undertakings to its own people, how reliable are its undertakings to other people? Paragraph 6·11 of the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs states:

"We would add that whoever those commitments may benefit, the fact that an internationally binding agreement, given in the glare of world publicity, fails to be honoured, can only undermine confidence that subsequent internationally binding undertakings may not meet the same fate. Lack of progress on human rights therefore remains a serious obstacle to public perceptions of the Soviet Union and its reliability and integrity. That is why the honouring of such an international undertaking as the Helsinki Accords is considered by other governments to be so important a test of the likely reliability of the Soviet Union in any other international undertakings which it may seek to make, particularly on arms control."

The message that we have to get across to Mr. Gorbachev is that if the Russians want us to trust them when they promise to enter into binding undertakings on arms control, they must first honour their international binding obligations on human rights. When they do that, we can trust them and we shall be a united House in rejoicing when that end is achieved.

9.50 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I associate myself with what the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) said about cuts in the BBC overseas service. The speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) was important, and many gentile Members would like to know about past British Governments and military personnel.

I shall concentrate on one subject. It is what my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) referred to as serious deceit over Libyan bombing, particularly that shown to European colleagues. This is a live issue. The "World in Action" programme on Monday, done by Ray Fitzwalter, David Mills and Eammon O'Connor, was a remarkable programme that posed questions that have to be answered. The programme said:

"As more terrorism threatens, some Americans argue the whole crisis is unnecessary and has been manufactured by President Reagan . . . Some prominent Americans believe the Reagan Administration has exaggerated the threat of terrorism and deliberately forced a confrontation with Gadaffi."

Rear-Admiral Eugene Carroll, admittedly one of the critics of the Administration, said:

"This has been very adroitly done. We have made Gadaffi an enemy, a symbol of terrorism."

The programme continued:

"Tonight some of President Reagan's own advisers admit that the attack on Libya had less to do with terrorism and more to do with reversing years of humiliation that began with Vietnam."

A clip was then shown of President Reagan, and the commentary said:

"In 1981 these past humiliations swept President Reagan to power. He promised things would be different in future."

The programme continued:

"The obvious targets were either Syria or Iran . . . both had been deeply involved in many terrorist attacks on America.

But both have powerful defences and are close to the Soviet Union.

So the Americans turned instead to Gadaffi and Libya, a country with a tiny army and population half that of London."

It then showed a clip of Gadaffi and said:

"Gadaffi was chosen not so much for organising terror but for taunting America. He became the perfect target for President Reagan."

Mr. Jenkins, an adviser to the Reagan Administration, then said:

"you know the United States is brought up on stories that have good guys and bad guys . . . heroes and villains."

The programme then showed a clip of President Reagan saying:

"We have evidence which links Libyan agents or surrogates to at least twenty-five incidents."

The programme said:

"Despite the rhetoric, incidents last year like this hijacking of a TWA jet were never proven to be directly linked to Gadaffi."

Nor was the tragedy of the Achille Lauro.

Dr. Kupperman then said:

"The whole notion of bringing thirty capital ships well before we attacked Libya . . . to bait them, to cross this ridiculous line of death . . . our intention was to bait them."

The programme then went on to comment about the next incident:

"That came in April with the bombing of this West Berlin disco and the death of an American GI. As with some of the earlier incidents there is now evidence that Syria rather than Libya was primarily responsible."

On 12 June, I tabled a question to the Prime Minister asking her

"what information Her Majesty's Government received from the German authorities both before and after the decision by Her Majesty's Government to grant approval for the use of United Kingdom bases for the United States attack on Libya, regarding the evidence available to the relevant authorities in Germany of any alleged involvement by Libya in the recent bombing of a nightclub in Berlin."

The Prime Minister replied:

"We have kept closely in touch with the German authorities on this matter. There is clear evidence that Libya was involved in the bombing of La Belle discotheque in Berlin on 5 April."—[Official Report, 12 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 287.]

It is about time that this clear evidence was produced, because some of us have been deeply unhappy, from an early stage, about the whole episode.

I go back to 14 April. For the sake of time, I shall refer only to column 579 of the Official Report for 14 April 1986. On a point of order, I regretted that the private notice question of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East—this was before the bombing—was never granted. Although I believe that Mr. Speaker's motives were wholly honourable——

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Dalyell: No, not until I have finished my sentence.

It was deemed a great pity that the private notice question of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East was not granted, as the obvious question about the use of British bases would have been asked. The House of Commons would then have had some input into events and the bombing of Tripoli before they took place rather than simply holding a post mortem. I now give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Faulds: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Is it not a fact that on that unfortunate Monday when the House was not allowed to express its views about the impending attack on Libya the Foriegn Office was apparently prepared to make a statement, that it was overruled by No. 10 and that, unfortunately, Mr. Speaker felt unable to allow questions on the matter? The significance is that, had the House uttered on that day, the Prime Minister's exercise in allowing the Americans to use bases in Britain might have been a little more difficult to project as something that was acceptable to the British public.

Mr. Dalyell: I have no proof of that. I am extremely careful to say what I know and what I guess to be the truth. I guess that to be the truth. My only comment is that when the House of Commons is in any way deprived of its say, it is not to the advantage of our country.

However, I suppose that one can understand the Prime Minister's decision not to reveal the use of British bases before an attack. What the House of Commons desires to know is to what extent the Prime Minister's senior colleagues were consulted. For example, the Secretary of State for Defence said on Radio Ayr:

"Something has got to be done. I think that my colleagues and I are very dubious as to whether a military strike is the best way of doing this. It is liable to hit the wrong people, it creates other tensions in the area. There are a lot of other things that can be done which my colleagues are certainly looking at very hard—further withdrawals of permission for diplomats from offending countries, action like reducing trade and reducing contacts of one sort or another, with those who refuse to outlaw terrorism."

Those are not the words of a man who expected this action to take place.

I refer to Malcolm Spaven's chapter in Pluto's quickly produced book "Mad Dogs". On the permission to use F111s and tanker aircraft from British bases, he said that British military forces were also involved and that "The Ministry of Defence admitted on 17 April that RAF Nimrods at St. Mawgan, and possibly Gibraltar, were put on standby to provide search and rescue cover for the F-111s returning from the raid."

If that is true, at least the Secretary of State for Defence should surely have known about it. I quote again from "Mad Dogs". Mr. Spaven said that my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) told the House on 17 April 1986:

"it 'never occurred to anyone' when US bombers arrived in the UK in 1950 that these aircraft would be used for non-NATO purposes."

So much for the Secretary of State for Defence. I ask, when was the Foreign Secretary consulted? Was it after or was it before anything could usefully be done to act on the considered advice of the Foreign Office? The Foreign Secretary said:

"No evidence emerged during the discussion that any Foreign Minister was aware during the meeting of a final American decision to attack. For my part, I had no confirmation of any decision by the President, still less of any decision to authorise raids that night, until I came back to London and met the Prime Minister." [Official Report, 16 April 1986; Vol 95, c. 950.]

These questions are not simply Opposition mischief-making. In his remarkable speech in the other place on 18 April, Field Marshal Lord Carver recalled at column 894 that the Prime Minister had said that discussions with the President covered a week. The Field Marshal asked Lady Young to tell the House who was consulted and who agreed. To date, the Field Marshal's questions have gone unanswered. The House of Commons deserves an answer.

The House of Commons is also entitled to press the Prime Minister as to her real motives for agreeing to the use of British bases. On 15 April, in answer to the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken), the Prime Minister said:

"That was a factor in the decision to use our bases and why those aircraft were especially right for the action that was undertaken."

The hon. Member for Thanet has asked:

"Was she influenced not only by loyalty to an ally with a just cause, but by a much more practical consideration: that fewer risks were likely to be caused to Libyan civilians and to United States military personnel if the United States used the much more precise equipment, the F111, rather than carrier-based aircraft?"

To my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam), the Prime Minister replied:

"the F111s were required because they are more accurate on particular targets" [Official Report, 15 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 726.]

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion in the name of the Prime Minister for the Adjournment of the House may be proceeded with, though opposed, until Twelve o'clock.—[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

Foreign Affairs

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Dalyell: Yet from the Pentagon come very different reasons. First, the attack on Libya provided a proving ground for weapons. US News and World Report carries an article by William Broyles, Junior, on 12 May 1986, on the politics of war, in which he writes:

"The budget, in short, is the mission. 'It all comes back to the budget', says one ex-Pentagon analyst. For years we've been saying that radar, infra-red and smart bombs are the way to go. We've spent billions on night-mission avionics, so we had to try to use them, even if a daylight strike would have been better."

Equally bluntly, Aviation Week of 21 April asserted that the attack on Libya:

"provided a good proving ground for the F111s to be flown into the Mediterranean, and gave the Air Force a chance to demonstrate its capabilities."

A raid of this kind was deemed to have great value in the presentation to Congress of the case for greater spending on the United States Navy and Air Force. But it was not a reason given by our Prime Minister to our House of Commons.

Secondly, there was inter-service rivalry between the United States Navy and Air Force. As a senior official of the Pentagon artlessly put it to Aviation Week, page 19, 21 April:

"Understandably, after the all-Navy action in Libya last month, the Air Force wanted a piece of the action."

Again, that was not a reason given by our Prime Minister to our House of Commons for the use of territory in Britain as a base for non-NATO operations.

I refer again to Spaven, page 23, who says:

"Libya has large numbers of Soviet-built weapons; engaging them in limited combat would give US forces experience in employing electronic countermeasures and untested new weapons, and assessing the performance of Soviet weaponry."

Thirdly, there has been the formidable lobby in the Pentagon which has been championing the idea of joint service operations, particularly the land-based aircraft in support of naval operations. When the joint chiefs of staff sat down in December 1985 to consider the military options against Libya, Admiral James Watkins, and others—Watkins was chief of naval operations—saw a useful opportunity for a joint naval-air force operation to demonstrate the value of their concept to doubters in Congress and the Pentagon. Again, that was not a reason hinted at by our Prime Minister to our House of Commons.

We are dealing with what is referred to as the best all-weather precision aircraft in the world. Spaven said:

"The main night-attack capability on US Navy aircraft carriers is the A-6E. In 1984, US Secretary of the Navy John Lehman described this aircraft as 'the best all-weather precision bomber in the world'".

Why could not they do the job? Why could it not be done by the Coral Sea or the United States sixth fleet? It is simply not true that the bomb-aiming equipment of the F111s was superior to the bomb-aiming equipment ot the carrier-borne A-7s. They both had the same TRAM system, or its equivalent.

Fourthly, and possibly most important of all from the point of view of the House of Commons, whereas certainly the internal politics of the United States military were an important reason for the attacks on Libya, the nature and timing of the raid had much wider political implications.

I quote from the April 1986 issue of Sanity. On page 18, Dan Pleasch asked Rear-Admiral Carroll of the Center for Defence Information in Washington:

"In your experience, would it have been practical to use the F111s, and ask the British afterwards?"

Rear-Admiral Carroll replied:

"That was the basis on which the plan was prepared."

The implications are chilling. A major reason for including the F111s in the operation was to tie in Britain as one European country seen to be supporting the United States. Again, this was not a reason that the Prime Minister offered to the House.

On 3 June I put to the Prime Minister a question about the characteristics of the F111 aircraft based in the United Kingdom which rendered their use essential for the United States' attack on Libya. The Prime Minister replied:

"The F111 aircraft based in the United Kingdom provided the best equipped means of carrying out the United States operation against specific terrorist targets in Libya, with the lowest possible risk of Libyan civilian and United States service casualties. As the United States has indicated, the F111 possesses advanced avionics and other capabilities which made it particularly suitable for such a mission."

I then asked the Prime Minister to:

"name the senior American, or Americans, who told her that the F111s were more precise than the carrier-based aircraft."

The Prime Minister replied:

"That was the advice that we received both from across the Atlantic and from home."—[Official Report, 3 June 1986; Vol. 98, c. 730-1.]

When pressed on that occasion and later by my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Welsh) the Prime Minister becomes uncharacteristically vague about the question of what she was told by the Americans. In The Scotsman Martin Dowle asserts that President Reagan did not talk personally to the Prime Minister in the week before the Libyan raid. What senior American speaking to our Prime Minister implied that the expensive carrier-borne A6s and A7s were so inferior to the F111s that they could not carry out the Libyan mission? Any American who said that would have been asked some awkward questions by the United States Navy and by United States taxpayers back in Washington. I ask the Prime Minister to let us know who exactly did tell her, if anyone did, about the F111s being more precise, avoiding collateral damage, and cutting down civilian casualties? The Prime Minister has got to the stage where she will invent any cock and bull story that will get her out of a jam.

On page 63 of Aviation Week of 2 June we read:

"In the Libyan Raid the 6th Fleet Commander was given the time frame to attack, and he had the responsibility of putting it all together."

The implication is that it was the sixth fleet commander, down in the Mediterranean, who planned and organised the raid, and for that reason the House should be told how the Prime Minister could possible know how the raid would be conducted. The sixth fleet commander had full responsibility. Command and control of the operation was given to the on-scene commander. How does the Prime Minister make out that she had any kind of a British veto?

The Minister may switch ground, and claim, as the Prime Minister claimed, in answer to the hon. Member for Thanet, South on 15 April when she said:

"We were also influenced by the fact that the United States has hundreds of thousands of forces in Europe to defend the liberty of Europe. In that capacity they have been subject to terrorist attack."—[Official Report, 15 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 726.]

If this is a reference to the bombing in West Berlin. Could the House of Commons be told why the Bundeskriminalamt, the Federal Police in West Germany, have even now refused to confirm the Libyan connection and why Herr Lochte, the chief of the Verfassungschutz, the bureau for the protection of the constitution, has said that he excludes any Libyan connection, and why the German intelligence, the Bundesnachrichtendienst, differs substantially for the Americans about the interpretation of Libyan messages?

The Parliamentary Questions that I put down for the Prime Minister and the Foreign Office have got me nowhere and the answers are misleading. For example, on 3 June the Under-Secretary replied:

No. Berlin is not part of the Federal Republic of Germany and is not governed by it. The allies, who have supreme authority in Berlin, remain in close touch with the German authorities in the city. [Official Report, 3 June 1986, Vol. 98, c. 414.]

I ask the Government to be a little more candid about the advice that they are receiving from Germany about the connectionss between the tragedy in West Berlin and Libya. Before someone launches an attack on Benghazi or Tripoli, he had better be very clear about the basis for doing so.

I am no admirer of Mr. Botha, but he was quite justified in drawing comparisons between what our Prime Minister and President Reagan did, and the attacks so universally deplored on Zimbabwe, Zambia and Botswana. It is not just the Prime Minister's critics who think along those lines. Ferdinand Mount, writing in the Spectator not exactly the house journal of the Labour party on 24 May 1986, says on page 6:

"For the comparison does throw a fascinating if rather eerie light on our confused and conradictory attitudes towards terrorism and the response to terrorism. The two raids are as nearly alike as any two events in an untidy world. The Governments of Zambia, Botswana, and Zimbabwe may not sponsor terrorism in quite the same way as Colonel Gaddafi does, but the distinction is not a crucial one."

But what is crucial is the whole question of the control of operations. I shall refer briefly once again to the excellent case deployed by Michael Spaven in the book entitled "Mad Dogs". I shall quote three extracts. The first states:

"What Mrs. Thatcher's words do not indicate is whether there are any circumstances in which Alliance solidarity would not operate, making refusal possible. Nor do they give any indication of whether such a refusal would be accepted by the United States; in other words, whether Britain actually has the power to control the activities of US military forces stationed here."

The second extract states:

"Early in 1986, Mrs. Thatcher could say only that she 'would expect to be informed, when US nuclear forces in Britain were placed on alert."

Mr. Corbyn: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way on this important point. Will he confirm that under the 1953 war plan made by the then United States President Eisenhower, when the United States considers itself to be in a state of war or readiness for war, it does not necessarily consult any of its western European allies before attacking a third country?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) resumes his speech I remind the House that five Back-Bench speeches have lasted for more than 20 minutes. The debate started late, and some hon. Members who have sat in the Chamber throughout the debate will not have an opportunity to speak unless hon. Members speak briefly.

Mr. Dalyell: I reply to my hon. Friend by saying that the Foreign Secretary said that "it is not a question of a publishable agreement".

Mr. Spaven adds:

"Nor is there any way in which the British air traffic control authorities could stop US aircraft from taking off; they have no right to question the purpose of US military flights, which in any case are under no obligation to file flight plans with the authorities unless they are intending to fly through what is termed 'controlled airspace'."

Finally, Mr. Spaven says:

"The danger is that the US will not sign any deal on control of its bases which does not contain a get-out clause of that sort — which would bring a future British government right back to the square one of 'joint decision in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time'."

That is a real problem for the Alliance. However, in view of the time factor, I shall leave it at that. Nevertheless, the question of controls is a very important issue. I ask for a considered reply by letter.

Foreign Affairs

10.13 pm

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): The theme throughout yesterday's debate was political and human rights in one country, South Africa. This evening, as well as referring to the situation in South Africa, I shall discuss our approach to human rights generally.

There is no doubt that Britain, perhaps more than any other country, stands for the maintenance of freedom. One can argue that the House is a symbol of that freedom, as was certainly the case during the last war. In every country, without exception that I have visited since 1979, the reputation of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has stood as high as Churchill's ever did in support of freedom.

Mr. Foulkes: Come off it.

Mr. Atkinson: The hon. Gentleman has obviously never been abroad, or, if he has, he has not listened to what people say.

There is no doubt that the denial of human rights remains the major obstacle to world peace and security, and to trust and confidence between nations. As the world knows, we as a nation have always accepted a major responsibility in attempting to make the international treaties and institutions concerned with human rights succeed, and one such is the Helsinki Final Act. There have been many times when I have questioned the continuation of the Helsinki process because of the continued failure of the Soviet Union and its allies to implement the provisions which they have approved and supported, but I accept that we must persevere.

The Helsinki process provides too valuable an opportunity for violations by participating states to be raised. It keeps them in the dock of world opinion and enables us to raise specific outrages, such as the current persecution of the Turkish ethnic minority in Bulgaria. That issue was raised at Ottawa last year, but the fate of the Turkish minority has not, in my view, been sufficiently appreciated by the free world, with the result that Bulgaria continues to force its Turkish citizens—about 10 per cent. of the population—to change their names, to close their schools, and to abandon their language and customs.

All this is highlighted in a report of the Council of Europe last year. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who is to reply, for raising this matter in Sofia last month. I look forward to his comments later.

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman condemns the persecution that is taking place in Bulgaria, but will he condemn the Turkish Government for their denial of the liberty and identity of Kurdish people within the national boundaries of Turkey?

Mr. Atkinson: I think that the hon. Gentleman is confusing the attitude of the present democratically elected Turkish Government with that of their predecessors, when there was no democracy. Instead, there was chaos and anarchy and the military Government took over the running of the country to try to put matters right and to restore democracy to Turkey.

The Helsinki process enables the cases of individuals to be raised. These include those who are harassed or discriminated against, persecuted or imprisoned for courageously campaigning in their own countries for rights and freedoms which we take for granted. These include Rostislav Evdokimov, who is serving five years' imprisonment and five years internal exile for campaigning for free trade unions in the Soviet Union, and Father Gleb Yakunin, who is serving seven years' imprisonment and seven years internal exile for advocating the end of state control of religion. I had the privilege of meeting both these people in Leningrad and Moscow when I was gathering material as the Council of Europe's rapporteur on these matters.

I pay tribute to the work of Amnesty International, which is now 25 years old, and to other organisations, such as Christian Solidarity International, of which I am the United Kingdom president. I must say, however, that I continue to be disappointed that we as Members of Parliament receive so little lobbying on behalf of people such as those to whom I have referred from our own free trade unions and from our churches. In my view, they are put to shame by the Jewish communities in Britain, who so frequently and efficiently supply Members with the facts about refusniks. I was pleased when I heard that their cause was presented to Mr. Gorbachev by members of the recent IPU delegation to the Soviet Union.

As we know, such perseverance pays off. Shcharansky, Solzhenitzyn, Bukovski, Ginsberg, the Siberian Seven, Georgie Vins and more recently Father Calciu from Romania, and others are all living proof of that. They are now enjoying freedom in the West. Worldwide campaigns on their behalf made them an embarrassment to the Kremlin, and so they were released. But so many remain. These include Sakharov, Irina Ratushinskaya, the Russian Catholic poetess whose state of health is giving so much cause for concern, and Valeri Barinov, the rock gospel singer, who are others known to us. We must raise their case at every opportunity, not so much for them to be released to the West, because they do not want to come to it. They wish merely to be able to go home and to see an end to persecution. There are many thousands more whose names we do not know.

We should most certainly consider the withdrawal of any support that we might give by the way of aid to those countries where we learn that their citizens are being persecuted for being Christian or Jewish, for example, as is the position in Nepal at present. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary knows this as a result of my fact-finding visit earlier this year and from his visit later in February. As a policy of human rights that is not enough.

We know from our own experience and that of the 35 countries which enjoy the same freedoms as we do that it is democracy which represents the best guarantee of human rights and the best protection for minorities. Moreover, it remains the best force for peace. In recent times, I doubt whether a democratically elected Argentina would have occupied the Falklands or whether a democratically elected Soviet Union would have invaded Afghanistan. We need no reminding that two world wars were started by dictatorships and won by democracies.

The central theme running through British foreign policy should be the promotion of democracy to those 100 or so remaining countries which are neither democratic nor Communist. They must understand that they must make a choice before a choice is made for them. Unfortunately, that is a battle of ideas which democracy is not winning. More countries have had Communism foisted upon them since the last war than have opted for democracy. That has partially been because for too long democracy has been on the defensive. We have been too negative in advocating it for others. We have been too apologetic in defending our own colonial past, which has left behind throughout the world parliamentary systems and freedom under the law which we had attempted to introduce in good faith. In so doing, we sowed the seeds of freedom which led to independence. That is a record to be proud of and which we should defend at every opportunity in the United Nations and elsewhere. I wonder whether we do that enough.

I accept that we should not assume that parliamentary systems which work in our countries will always survive being foisted upon others. Our European systems have taken centuries to evolve. In most of black Africa, pluralism has already reverted to tribalism and we have to accept that. What we cannot accept is the end to the independent judiciary and the dismantling of those constitutional restraints on arbitrary power which guarantee human rights for all people. That is the true test of a free society.

The alternative is a regime where there is no justice because the judiciary and legislature are one, usually one party. Regrettably, that appears to be the direction in which Zimbabwe is now moving and that is the situation which already applies to almost one third of the states which make up the Commonwealth. In my view, it ill behoves the Commonwealth to seek to destroy the economy of one of its former members, South Africa, when millions of its own citizens enjoy far fewer rights and freedoms than South Africa's black citizens do.

I want to record my opposition to economic sanctions against South Africa, not just for all the good reasons given to the House yesterday by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary but for one other very good reason. Either we apply sanctions against all the regimes we object to or we do not apply any at all. If we are not prepared to take meaningful action against the Soviet Union for continuing to occupy Afghanistan or for applying far worse apartheid against Christians, Jews and others within its own country, we should forget any further economic sanctions against South Africa.

In my view, we should not underestimate the effect of what is already happening in South Africa — the damaged economy, the pressure for change from business, the effect of the present violence, the political reforms already undertaken, the negotiations going on behind the scenes with black leaders and the whole experience of the Eminent Persons Group.

Even though the Nationalist Government may not admit to being shaken by those factors, I believe that they will be influenced by them and that further reforms will be forthcoming. South Africa needs a period of calm to work things out for itself. The Eminent Persons Group, the Community and the Commonwealth have not been helpful in suggesting how reforms should be implemented —reforms which will guarantee the protection of all 14 groups which make up South African society—bearing in mind that every group in South Africa constitutes a minority.

We in the West should continue to make our good offices available for that process to succeed, with the promise of aid if necessary. President Reagan's National Endowment for Democracy for leadership training, education and the strengthening of democratic institutions could also be applicable here. What we must not do is to contribute further to an economic desert with even higher unemployment in South Africa and in neighbouring states, which will serve only to encourage anarchy and civil war. That wouuld accord exactly with the highest expectations of the Kremlin.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his brevity. The first Front Bench spokesman is hoping to catch my eye at 11 o'clock, so further restraint is needed.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I, too, welcome this debate on foreign affairs, although it is difficult to concentrate on a particular part of the world when other hon. Members understandably wish to cover other issues. I welcome the fact that there is now far greater public interest in foreign affairs debates than there has been for many years. I believe that that interest is occasioned partly by the actions of the Government and the opposition of so many people to those actions.

We had a full debate on the problems of southern Africa yesterday, so I shall not repeat those arguments, save to say that the issue of sanctions against South Africa has activated and united more people in this country in the past few months than, tragically, in the 26 years since Sharpeville and the consignment to prison of Nelson Mandela and others. I hope that we shall soon see the release of those people and a genuine democratic majority Government in South Africa, because until then there will be bloodshed, poverty and hunger in South Africa.

I have here a copy of the United Nations report on the adverse consequences for the enjoyment of human rights of political, economic and other forms of assistance given to the racist and colonial regime in South Africa. The report lists the international companies which have been and still are trading with South Africa and making a great deal of money out of it. There are also 42 pages of British firms, listing their military, economic and financial interests in southern Africa. I believe that that is why the House yesterday rejected the opportunity to impose economic sanctions against South Africa, although I believe that the time will come when this country will become party to an economic embargo against South Africa.

I wish today to deal with issues other than South Africa, because the atmosphere surrounding international affairs has changed a great deal in the past few months. When American planes took off from British bases for their bombing raid on Libya, we received a large number of letters from constituents complaining of the danger to this country following the use of those bases and the attack on defenceless people in Tripoli. I quote one typical example. My constituent, Ms. Jane Rollason, writes:

"I write simply to register my horror at Mrs. Thatcher's action on 15 April in allowing Reagan to launch his attack on Tripoli from British bases. Her arrogance in endangering the lives of British people at home and particularly in Libya is quite incredible, and she has surely made a considerable contribution to the escalation of terrorist activity throughout Europe."

She goes on to applaud the response of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and concludes:

"roll on the day when we are no longer led by a Reagan acolyte, should we be fortunate enough to live that long."

That is typical of the view expressed by many people.

There has been much analysis, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), of the motives behind the use of British bases for the attack on Libya. Clearly there was no military need to use British bases, but it was pushed by the United States military high command to prove that those bases could be used and that they could fly F111 aircraft around the coast of Europe to bomb Libya. Aviation Week, which my hon. Friend mentioned, analysed this well and pointed out that the attack on Libya was partly a proving ground for the ability of the F111s to fly to Libya without going over the European mainland, to deliver their bomb loads and to return to this country.

We must remember that the motive behind all this and behind so much of British foreign policy has been a furious hatred, promulgated by the Government through the media, of the Soviet Union and of everything that the Soviet Union does. It is also motivated by a slavish following of everything that the United States does. We do not have an independent foreign policy, but a foreign policy that is essentially directed by the interests of the Government and of the military establishment of the United States.

Not so long ago, when this country did not consider itself to be half at war with the Soviet Union, Britain and the Soviet Union considered that they had many mutual interests and many British soldiers died fighting Nazi-ism, as did many more Soviet soldiers. What I complain about is the way in which we are constantly fed a diet of pro-American propaganda from the Government, through the newspapers, and a diet of anti-Soviet propaganda.

The influence of the United States on our foreign policy leads us into the most extraordinary positions. It has led us into NATO and into supporting United States policy in many places. We supported the raid on Libya solely because of our subservience to the United States. We are supporting the United States' attempt to destroy the democratic and independent Government of the people of Nicaragua for exactly the same reason. We have stood by and allowed the people of Chile to be trodden underfoot because we are dominated by the interests of the United States.

Central America is the classic example of poor countries trying to drag themselves out of the cycle of poverty, debt and deprivation by their own communal activities and by the development of a collectivist economy. Because such an economy is seen as a threat to the interests of United States multinationals, the United States has imposed sanctions against Nicaragua and the British Government have followed suit. There are many other examples in other parts of the world where we have dragged ourselves wrongly into the United States foreign policy domain because of our links with the United States.

More recently there have been huge demonstrations throughout western Europe and throughout this country against the siting of cruise and Trident missiles, the effect that such siting has had on national defence policies and the cost being imposed on European defence budgets. We are members of NATO, which controls about 90 per cent. of our armed forces. It has an enormous bearing on our defence expenditure. When hon. Members talk about democracy, they should remember that half the decisions relating to our defence expenditure are made, not in Whitehall, in the British Cabinet or in the House of Commons, but in the NATO Council of Ministers, which in turn takes its advice from the high command and the generals who have consistently argued for a higher and higher level of national defence spending by NATO members. That threat to democracy concerns me greatly.

When NATO was set up in 1948, the commander of the United States air force who arrived in Britain with the advance guard of the American forces to be stationed here said:

> "Never before in history has one first-class power gone into another first-class power's country without any agreement. We were just told to come over and 'We shall be pleased to have you'."

Since that time the growth of American bases in this country and the effect of those bases on our national life has got worse and worse.

There are now 21 United States bases, 150 F111 aircraft and some 50,000 members of American forces here. Hiroshima could happen dozens of times over with the nuclear weaponry that is based in Britain. That is why I seriously call into question a defence strategy which relies solely on the interests of the United States, which drags us into a military alliance which is not defensive but aggressive, which controls the national budgets of so many countries and which imposes nuclear weapons on every country in western Europe, in almost all of which there has been mammoth opposition to the siting of those weapons. That opposition will continue and grow.

Although the Spanish people undeniably voted to remain in the North Atlantic Alliance in the referendum, they were denied a vote on NATO membership. There was never a referendum on that, as the wording of the ballot papers concerned the nebulous subject of the North Atlantic Alliance rather than NATO membership. I believe that the opposition to NATO membership in Spain would be repeated in many other countries if people were given the opportunity to say so. The long-term future of NATO is in serious doubt. I hope that, in the long run, NATO and other military alliances will be broken up, because they destroy national economic interests and pose the danger of a further world war.

I have mentioned the effect of United States influence on us and its control of our armed forces. Our massive defence expenditure is a direct result of NATO membership. Because we are so tied to United States foreign policy, we are also tied to the United States in all other spheres of international relations. Thinking is centred on Europe or on North America. Because of that, we tend to shut our eyes to what is going on in the rest of the world. We tend to shut our eyes to the growing impoverishment of the rest of the world because of the Atlantic-centric, Eurocentric view. We put our hands in our pockets to give overseas aid, while bleeding the poorest countries of the world dry through debt repayments and low commodity prices.

War on Want was founded by hon. Members and others in 1951 because they recognised the poverty that was occurring in immediately post-colonial countries and the danger of a new form of colonialism through lack of development. It recently published a booklet entitled, "Profits out of Poverty?" in which it describes the debt burden as a percentage of exports in several Latin American countries. Latin American countries are not the only ones with such problems. Argentina's debts amount to $50 billion, and debt repayments represent 80 per cent. of exports. That is the highest, but other countries are in serious difficulties.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

The booklet also describes the involvement of British banks in the debt burden of Latin American and other countries. It mentions the exposure of big British banks to the big debtors. For example, 84 per cent. of the National Westminster bank's notional capital is tied up in debts in Latin America. The same is true for 202 per cent. of the notional capital of Lloyd's bank and for 274 per cent. of the Midland bank's notional capital. All those banks have registered record and growing profits.

Many Third world countries are asked to borrow money against the sale of commodities to finance development. Neither commodity prices nor debt interest payments are in their control, so the loans do not benefit the Third world countries. Rather, by a process of low commodity prices and high interest rates, western European and North American banks have been subsidised by the poorest people in the poorest countries in the world — to the tune of $25 billion a year from Latin America alone.

Many other examples could be quoted. I merely refer to the publication that has recently been issued by the Third World Foundation, which also produces the well-respected "South" magazine, which chronicles the debt burden of sub-Saharan Africa. This is an area that has been debated many times in the House, and many people have correctly and generously given large amounts of their own money and resources to try to overcome the terrible problems of poverty in sub-Saharan Africa.

Frankly, the debt burden is enormous. It has grown from $18·6 billion in 1975 to $88·1 billion in 1984. As a proportion to export earnings, it was 120 per cent. in 1975 and it is now 230·9 per cent. That absolutely crippling burden is being placed on the people of sub-Saharan Africa and similarly on Latin America. It is hardly surprising that there is a political process of opposition to this debt burden from those who demand a moratorium on debt repayments and a limit on debt repayments to no more than 10 per cent. of export earnings.

Because the American Administration realised the danger to their own supporters and banks, the Baker plan was put forward as a solution, but that plan does not provide an adequate solution, because it suggests more lending and a different form of economic development in those countries. The poorest people in the poorest countries of the world are fed up with being told how to run their economies and to reduce public expenditure in order to increase export earnings in order to increase their own poverty to assuage the appetites of the big banks. Unless the British and other Governments face this problem, there will be collapses of major banks and serious problems for the Third world countries.

In December 1985 the International Currency Review produced a report on the problems of commodity prices. It includes an index in which 1980 is taken as 100. For all commodities, the figure in 1970 was 34·8 and by 1985 it had reached 70·1. However, in real terms the price of coffee has fallen from 100 in 1980 to 79·6 now, and sugar has fallen from 100 to 14·8 — a massive reduction in earnings for these key crops and commodities that are produced by these countries.

When Band Aid, Sport Aid, Live Aid and similar campaigns are mounted, many people rightly take part and give money, but they are also calling for a change in an economic system and relationship that automatically impoverishes so much of the rest of the world. That is the campaign that we are mounting.

I hope that in future debates on overseas aid and world poverty we shall look seriously at the problems of commodity prices and impoverishment of the Third world. If we do not, and if we become obsessed with the cost of the militaristic fervour imposed on us by the United States, we shall be turning our backs on the poorest people in the poorest countries and on the prospect of economic regeneration for them and ourselves.

In the future, I look forward to a British foreign policy which is genuinely independent, which is not dominated by the military and financial interests of western Europe and the United States, and which is genuinely part of an international effort to eliminate poverty throughout the world.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I wish to cover three topics, but I shall cut my remarks as much as possible in view of the time. I shall speak first about the position in South Africa; secondly, about the deterioration in Soviet-United States relations and the role of Britain and Europe; and, thirdly, the implications for our aid budget of the debt crisis in Africa.

I hope that the House, if not the press, will forgive me for continuing yesterday's debate, and therefore yesterday's news, on the future of South Africa. As The Daily Telegraph accurately observed, I did not vote against the motion proposed by the Opposition which called for "effective economic measures" compared with the Government's motion calling for "effective measures". I am grateful for the opportunity to explain and, perhaps, convince others of, my position.

As I see it, we believe that the internal policies of another sovereign independent state offend against our belief in natural justice, and deprive the majority of its citizens of the normal human rights of freedom, justice before the law, to be consulted and make representations on policies which effect their everyday life, to own property, and not to be discriminated against on the grounds of race, colour or creed. The black population of South Africa are denied many other matters against which I rail and which deeply offend the Conservative party and the House.

In the past we would have taken up arms against such a state, as we did at the beginning of the century in the Boer war and later against Nazi Germany in the name of freedom and justice, and as the north of the United States did in different circumstances against the south in the American civil war. In many ways the motivations then and now are similar.

No one is suggesting that we overthrow the South African regime by force or even use a United Nations force to do so, although in the past we would have done so and this House would have agreed to do so. Given that that is so and we are not prepared to use outside force, we must use the tools that Wilberforce used in his crusade to end slavery—the tools of argument, persuasion and patience, reinforced by economic forces, many of which are already at work in South Africa, and the moral condemnation of our nation and churches. There is no other course available to us.

We must take up the task of persuading the South African Government and the electorate who support them it is important to remember that they are responsive to a limited white electorate — that it is in their interests to change their policy. Let us be clear that we are asking them to share power with the black majority, so we must analyse the political and economic factors which are most likely to affect that white electorate in influencing that white Government.

There is a great deal of evidence to show that there is a growing willingness within the electorate to consider making progress in that direction. The Eminent Persons Group recognised that when it stated that it believed that public opinion in South Africa, which is reasonably unfettered, is ahead of the Government in that respect. The Nationalist Government also have a Right-wing constituency which forbids and bans any progress in that direction. That probably explains why the Government are working behind public opinion.

If that analysis is correct, we must encourage those in government and opposition to combine together to begin the process of freeing Nelson Mandela and opening a dialogue with all sections of the black community. If we were to adopt mandatory economic sanctions which would impoverish and punish the black community still further, we would encourage the forces of revolution and combine the white electorate against making progress towards a political settlement with the black community.

I agree with and support the Government's view, put forward by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, my hon. Friend the Minister of State and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. My only disagreement is that they must be prepared to consider all options, even those of an economic character, if we are to identify the measures which will reinforce the determination of those in government and in opposition and of the wider electorate in South Africa to open negotiations without preconditions, but on the understanding that violence will be discouraged by both sides.

The identification of such measures must be given urgent and detailed consideration and they must be decided on at the next meeting of the Commonwealth Heads of Government in consultation with the United States and the European Economic Community, with special reference to West Germany, Holland, Japan and the United Nations. Although we must maintain and enforce diplomatic pressure where possible, experience has shown that such pressure has made only limited and too-slow progress. I believe that the most effective form of pressure — as the right hon. Lady the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) and her co-authors of the report accepted by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations in April said — can be exercised by the South African private sector and by those who have invested their money in South Africa.

The lack of confidence in South Africa has already resulted in a dramatic fall in the rand and there is a disinvestment programme. Such action affects the value of property owned by white South Africans and results in a loss of income enjoyed by white people who have a vote and the ability to influence Government policy. We must draw the private sector into Government discussions, led in this country by Sir Leslie Smith, a former chairman of the British Oxygen Company, with the American, German, French and Italian private sectors, to hammer out policies which will have the most effective influence on the South African Government and encourage them to change course.

I hope that the Government will leave no stone unturned, including measures of an economic nature, in their determination to find measures which will encourage and enable, politically, the South African Government to alter their policies so that the South African economy can grow and prosper and thereby make the massive investment in black African housing, health and education which is badly needed to redress the balance which is the heritage of the years of apartheid and racial government.

The Soviet Union's relations with this country and the United States have been well covered during the debate. We should not forget, in our enthusiasm, to take advantage of what I believe is a window of opportunity offered by the accession of Mr. Gorbachev to the secretaryship of the Communist party in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. We must not forget that the Soviet Union has not abandoned its expansionist policies outside the boundaries of the Soviet Union.

Afghanistan has been mentioned. I add to that the commanding position that the Russians have gained in south-east Asia by their support of the Vietnam regime and their domination and use of Cam Ran Bay and Da Nang which are massive installations — built, ironically, by the Americans — and which enable them to threathen, by their expanded navy and air force, the northern parts of Australia and the whole of the south Pacific basin. It is not just a threat. The Russians are operating in the islands of the south Pacific. They are doing the same seduction job that they did in Grenada.

The Russians are responsible for finding the money for Vietnam to occupy Kampuchea and for maintaining the wretched regime in that country. Soviet expansionism can be seen in Ethiopia, Mozambique, Angola, Cuba, Nicaragua and Europe.

If there is to be an easement of tension between the Soviet Union and the West, we must build up trust. The Soviet Union must begin to show that it is willing to enter into such discussions and to reduce tension if we are to make progress on the serious issues of nuclear and conventional disarmament.

Africa's debt problems are residual problems which will affect the world well after the time when the debt problems of the larger countries have been settled or at least a means of living with them has been found. The World Bank estimates that, by 1990, all African countries presently in debt will be much further in debt. One can see no way of solving that problem, except by increasing concessional flows through aid budgets to those countries. The Government will have to deal with the replenishment of the International Development Association and the World Bank in the next two or three months.

I understand your impatience, Mr. Speaker, because I, too, have been sitting listening to this debate for two days. I should like to make this point. It is essential for the Government to recognise the necessity of ensuring that Britain plays its part in expanding the resources — properly focused on economic development — which will enable those countries to begin to pay back what they owe, pay their interest, and produce an economy that will enable them to provide a better standard of living and to avoid starvation.

Without further ceremony, and thanking you, Mr. Speaker, for calling me and the House for listening to me, I shall sit down.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): In the few minutes available to me I should like to talk about South Africa. I am completely opposed to apartheid, but, like most people in this country, I do not think that that implies that I am anti-South African.

Obviously, the situation is complex and time is running out. In fact, after my visit there, I would say that the time has already passed for a peaceful, internally generated solution to the problem facing the South Africans. In short, South Africa needs help. Two countries can offer some help – the United States and the United Kingdom, both of which have large economic and political interests in South Africa – for example militarily and with respect to raw materials. In a way, they have a historic as well as a present responsibility to work towards a peaceful solution.

I should like in the closing minutes of the debate humbly to offer one solution that should be considered seriously by the United States and the United Kingdom. President Reagan and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister should at least get together specifically to talk about the problem facing South Africa. It is not just a South African problem, but a free world one.

President Reagan and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister should call a meeting between themselves and State President Botha at which they should face him with the reality of the threat that faces South Africa and the West, outline their plans and offer incentives for working and co-operating. They will have to offer the stick, which basically is not sanctions – I wholly disapprove of them, for the reasons outlined in the debate – but disinvestment which would disproportionately hit white employment as opposed to black employment.

This should be the plan. A conference should be called by the South African Government and sponsored by the United States and the United Kingdom as the honest brokers. I believe that they are second to none in the world as brokers for peace. That conference, which should comprise the President of the United States and the British Prime Minister, should be chaired by the South African State President. The 15 or more parties who represent the various interest groups in South Africa should be called to the conference. The South African Government should negotiate away all the vestiges of apartheid, save the vote and the constitution. The parts of apartheid that would be destroyed would then have been negotiated with the moderate blacks and moderate leaders from all parties that turned up at the conference. The ANC might resist going to this first conference because it might not renounce violence.

There should then be a pause during which the dissolution of apartheid should be put into legislative form to convince people to create the necessary credibility. A second conference should then be called to discuss South Africa's future constitution. Even the ANC could do nothing other than attend, and would perhaps be forced to eschew violence to qualify to attend. The second conference, in discussing the constitution, would discuss voting. We are not after giving one man, one vote once, but one man, one vote for ever after. We have to design a constitution that will allay the fears inherent in South Africa, and felt by many more than whites, of being swamped by the majority.

A solution might be along the lines of that found by the Swiss many years ago when they were faced with people of three different nations and four different languages, all fighting. The big fear was that when they combined, the German-speaking majority would run the country. Their solution was based on the canton system – keeping power all the way down the ladder at the lowest, canton, level and not at the national level. The national Government of Switzerland have only two powers. One is their control over the currency, and the second is their power to make war or peace on behalf of the country.

In South Africa, there are already in place about 360 magistrates districts, each about the size of the smaller Swiss cantons. A canton solution could work in South Africa if it were well studied, and if people had a wish to make it work. Switzerland is not the same as South Africa, but it has similar problems. All the people in the western world who have interests in South Africa and all the blacks and whites there have as an overriding interest peace, and finding a peaceful solution.

I shall not take any more time from the speech of the Front Bench spokesman for the Opposition, upon which I know that I am encroaching. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and Mr. Reagan will talk over this solution because if it worked, it would bring something valuable to South Africa – a peace that would allay the fears of the minorities and protect them, and would offer one person one vote, and often.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) for curtailing his speech. I know that some hon. Members have had to exercise the self-denying ordinance requested by the Chair, despite the late hour at which the debate is being concluded.

There is no doubt that, across the wide range of subjects that have been discussed in the debate, what dominates world affairs in 1986 is the relationship between the Soviet Union and the United States of America. There have been many changes. In Washington we have had a new unilateralist style of foreign policy, with all the attendant electric shocks to NATO that go along with abandoning SALT 2, the raid on Libya, the deployment of chemical weapons and the gearing up of the strategic defence initiative planning has come in. In the Kremlin, a new leadership is promoting almost every week new initiatives and proposals, ranging from conventional troop cuts to test ban verification, even to the elimination of all nuclear weapons by the end of the century. Even without these new dimensions, the superpower relationship would dominate world events, as it has for the past 30 to 40 years.

The genuine difficulty that faces the non-superpowers in both the West and the East is to know how at a time of almost unique danger, when new breeds of weapons systems could open up vastly more dangerous scenarios, to assist the superpowers to live with each other, to talk to each other and to reach decisions together in this increasingly constricted world.

During the last two years there has been a transformation of our view of world problems. Whatever the ideological divide, which is still very deep, and whatever the potential for escalation and proliferation, which remains staggeringly great, both sides seem to be more willing than they have been for many years to talk to each other and to compete for the command of world opinion rather than to rattle sabres and command military superiority. For that we must be grateful.

Last year's Reagan-Gorbachev summit was an enormous boost to the hope that agreement might be possible. The underlying relationship that was forged there seems to have prevented the worst of the misunderstandings that have characterised superpower relations in the last 15 years. It was good that this afternoon the Foreign Secretary was able to announce that the much-postponed visit of the Soviet Foreign Minister is to take place at an early date.

For many years the superpower dialogue on arms control has been bogged down in the capitals of Europe and we have grown used to inactivity. There were 13 years of mutual and balanced force reduction talks in Vienna, and there have been endless years of talks at the disarmament conference in Geneva. None of them has produced concrete results. Now there appears to be a flicker of hope, as new suggestions are made and as old objections seem to be of less consequence. Slowly, in all the different forums in which these matters are discussed, there seems to be a spluttering into life of one sort or another. However, there is a proliferation problem. Because so many talks are taking place on so many subjects and on so many overlapping areas, the result is that, in such a complex area, fine words and sentiments from the top people take far too long to be translated into detail and to reach the negotiating table.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and the hon. Members for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) and for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) told us this afternoon about their visit to the Soviet Union as members of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. They underlined very clearly the fact that at the top of the negotiating ladder there are clear ideas about the direction in which the superpowers wish to go, but we have yet to see concrete results in terms of rhetoric and those fine intentions at the negotiating table. Indeed, the enthusiasm of Mr. Gorbachev for more and more initiatives has had the effect of confusing both the United States of America and his own negotiators. Both of them seem to be incapable of keeping track of his latest initiatives.

The new Soviet obsession with public relations and its desire, perhaps, to out-act the old actor in the White House tends to devalue the merit of some of the suggestions. For example, it was suggested after Chernobyl that there should be yet another summit. It was Mr. Gorbachev's third summit suggestion this year. The fact that agreement on the main summit meeting had not been reached meant that this suggestion looked like a diversionary gimmick. This impression was reinforced by the suggestion that this particular summit meeting should be held in Hiroshima. Glosses such as these detracted from the sensible points about co-operation on civil nuclear power that were made at the same time.

The shocks that were administered to us by the United States' raid on Libya and by its more recent decision to abondon SALT 2 betray a deep division among the allies and disarray in the United States and in the Administration of that country. As my right hon. Friend so ably said, it is not to be percieved as being anti-American to express a view in Britain that is being openly and in increasing volume expressed in the United States.

There is a crisis in the Atlantic Alliance and it is not neutralist or anti-American to note it and to regret it. The crisis arises partly from the distance from the last war, whose ruinous tragedies bound together the NATO countries after it. Our electorates in the West are now, like myself and many other Members of the House, of the majority of our population who were born after the end of the second world war. There is, whether we like it or not, a declining interest in and consciousness of the seeds of that conflict and the adhesive that was invented in the late 1940s to prevent it happening again.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) made an impassioned speech this evening about the election of Dr. Kurt Waldheim to the presidency of Austria. He made points which deserve answering, not just in the international context where President Waldheim will find himself, and possibly find himself profoundly uncomfortable, but about the British Government providing access to documents which should now be within the public domain but which apparently are being denied to us for reasons that cannot readily be understood. I hope that those Ministers who listened to his speech this evening, a speech of great power, will take on board the points that he made and will come forward with the answers which the House would expect.

I do not necessarily see the election of Dr. Waldheim, in a country which has more than due cause to be grateful for the post-war settlement, as a step into the past or a rejection of world criticism. It is perhaps a reflection of the same trends that we see in the West, of a rejection of the values and standards and memories of the second world war. Although we may regret the decision of the Austrian people, it was a decision taken within a democracy and is therefore one which we in the outside world will have to accept.

There is also a crisis in our Alliance because interests here have changed. The political activist in the West is more interested in world famine than in any possible Soviet invasion; more concerned about Chernobyl than the Krasnoyarsk phased array radar, and far more worked up about famine in Africa, which exists a plane journey away from all the wealth of our countries, than in the size of Russia's tank battalions.

Even in the Federal Republic of Germany a couple of weeks ago a respected opinion poll for a newspaper there showed that there was a greater measured concern in the population over the Chernobyl nuclear accident than there was in 1961 at the building of the Berlin wall.

Opinions, and values are changing, and recently the new American ambassador to Bonn expressed views about the possibility of the Americans going home and the reunification of the continent that would have been heresy had they been expressed only a few years ago.

There is also a crisis in the Alliance because of the behaviour, so often seen as inexplicable, and emotional and reckless, in our western European countries of the major and dominant partner in the Alliance, the United States. Indeed, as has been said by a number of hon. Members in the debate, there is a genuine concern about the way in which the present Administration of the United States conduct their foreign policy, which seems to fail to take into account the sincerely held views of their allies and supporters.

Anti-Americanism is rife in Europe and it is being fuelled by the Reagan administration's often open contempt for the opinion of its all too often—far too often in some cases—loyal allies. That must be a matter of concern for all of us who have had the good fortune to grow up in a Europe mercifully spared the civil wars of almost every other previous generation. Before it is too late, we in western Europe must find new ingredients for the glue that keeps the Alliance together, to ensure that for the next 40 years it will be as successful in holding together our continent and its peoples as it has been for the last 40 years.

It is clear from the debate that superpower relationships dominate not only their own traditional spheres of influence. The waves of tension spread far beyond the areas of the Warsaw pact and the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation. It is outwith these areas that some of the worst dangers to peace exist for all of us. There is no doubt that the raid by the United States on Libya in April did much to fuel anti-Americanism within the NATO countries. The effect of what was seen by the allies of the United States as a provocative, disproportionate and questionable legal military adventure will be considerable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) articulated a view and asked again, with his usual skill, the uncomfortable questions for which he is now famous or notorious. I hope that the Government and Government hon. Members listened to him with great care, and that the Government will be able to provide the answers to his questions.

I was in East Berlin the day after that raid and with Mr. Gorbachev I was attending as an observer at the East German Communist party congress. Despite what the Americans did to Libya, few of the normally predictable reactions manifested themselves at that time. Of course, we had the expected rhetoric, but it was not overplayed.

East Berlin is known as a barometer of world tension. It is often said that if the temperature of the world goes up, Berlin reaches boiling point. The interest that day in East Berlin was less in world war 3 than in the 58-car cavalcade that Mr. Gorbachev used to visit the tourist sites of the city. Whatever the private anger at the Americans, and it must have been profound, the Soviet Union did not over-react, and instead of retaliation for an attack on a Soviet ally, Mr. Gorbachev used his East Berlin speech, delivered only two days after the bombing of Tripoli and Benghazi, to make yet another proposal for arms control, this time on conventional troop reductions.

Some hon. Members make the point that instead of superpower relations being permanently confined to nuclear weapons, even though they are of supreme importance to us all, more progress in establishing the trust and understanding that is required for any long-term agreement between the superpowers might be accomplished by looking at other areas of common interest.

The middle east, with its instability and unpredictability and its potential for spilling over on to the world stage, is a headache for both the Soviet Union and the United States. It is the very instability and unpredictability of President Gaddafi that denied him greater Soviet support after the attack on Tripoli. That still prevents the Soviet Union from signing a defence agreement with the Libyans — an agreement for which there is considerable pressure. We should bear in mind that Mr. Gorbachev has scarcely more affection for the schizophrenic colonel than has Washington.

Both the superpowers have influence and interest in the middle east, and their common interest is to see greater stability in the area. Soviet influence in Syria is not decisive, but its military links give the Soviet Union some edge in influencing opinion. The United States does not pull the strings in Israel's Administration, but without the United States Israel would be very lonely in that part of the world. Both of the superpowers have worries and concerns, and both need to control and minimise them. Both know that no settlement in the middle east is possible without them both being involved, and both know that international security is not possible without a settlement in the middle east. It is, therefore, a tailor-made situation for genuine superpower co-operation, not just for the hell of it or as an experiment, but in their own naked self-interest.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East mentioned the Gulf war, with all the mind boggling casualty figures that have been cited and the constant escalation. That is another area in which talks are necessary and could produce results. Why not a superpower dialogue on other hot spots in the world, so many of which have already been discussed by hon. Members — I think, for example, of South Africa, Central America, Angola, Kampuchea, or Afghanistan — or even on something that the Foreign Secretary mentioned, terrorism? That is a problem for both East and West, and there is a common interest. Or why not a dialogue on keeping the sea lanes open?

I have referred to areas of considerable danger and damage, which pose a much more potent threat to world peace than any possible invasions across the German plains. They could provide a much more fruitful prospect for building confidence between the two great powers. As the Foreign Affairs Committee said in the very important and thoughtful report published a couple of months ago entitled, "UK-Soviet Relations",

> "Perhaps the most constructive response which can be made by the individual countries of the west (and by the United Kingdom in particular) is to take seriously, and at face value, the Soviet leadership's new readiness to discuss issues of common concern and to seek Western cooperation in the resolution of these issues."

Those hon. Members who have just returned from Moscow, and those who, like me, were there earlier this year, would say that that was a very perceptive viewpoint, which could well be adopted by this Government, especially when the Soviet Foreign Minister comes to London in the near future.

Several other questions were raised by hon. Members, and I shall comment on some of them. I know that the House may have a considerable period of reflection on the issues relating to the EC, but the Foreign Secretary chose to raise the issue of Britain's imminent presidency. Just a small elite regularly attend EC debates. I often feel that we should be either certified or given a medal. But we have tried desperately hard during the past few years to get the Government to recognise the importance to both Britain and Europe of the unemployment afflicting this, and many other countries in the Community.

We have regularly failed to obtain any commitment, or even interest, from the Government, but I am glad to say that with only a couple of weeks to go before Britain takes over the presidency of the Community our arguments appear to have borne fruit. Last week, in The Hague, the Foreign Secretary said:

> "Unemployment is a scourge in all our countries. It is our greatest and most urgent challenge and one that can only be met with common policies and common determination."

At this late stage, it is nice to welcome the conversion of the Foreign Secretary and the Government to that view, and to the belief that that is the priority that should be at the forefront of the EC's deliberations, whoever happens to be in the chair.

It is profoundly depressing that we can expect the prescription for Europe to be the same miserable prescription that has been applied to the British economy. More of the same will become a Euro-Thatcherism that is laid on the table for the European Council. If that is what the new frontierless internal market is all about, it is an undistinguished contribution to solving Europe's undoubted and massive problems.

We must hope that in future there is more that the Government can do to rise to the challenge of a budget crisis in Europe and an uncontrollable agriculture policy with all the potential that exists in the 12 nations that make up the Community.

A number of hon. Members, including the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), in a speech that was otherwise entirely undistinguished, referred to an area of alternative diplomacy which is extremely important, especially in the context of the present preoccupation with South Africa. He congratulated the BBC external services in glowing terms, with which I concur. In the BBC external services we have a valued advert for Britain and the way in which we conduct debates. The external services need to be expanded and not contracted. Nowhere and at no time is this better illustrated than here at the present, where there is so much concern on both sides of the House about South Africa.

I note that the hon. and learned Member for Burton has returned to the Chamber. Perhaps that is because he is so unused to hearing any praise from me of any contribution that he has made to a debate in the Chamber. This is an ideal opportunity for the voice of Britain and for British public opinion to be turned on the Republic of South Africa. The broadcasting stations, for geographical and topographical reasons, beam an inadequate signal into South Africa, and now that that country has been sealed off from all opinions other than those officially stated by its Government, this is the ideal opportunity for us to beam our voice into it. I pay tribute to the BBC external services as the instrument and arm of Britain's diplomacy.

Similarly, I pay tribute to the British Council. I declare an interest, as I am vice-chairman of the council. I believe, however, that the work that is done by the council on behalf of Britain is something that we cannot repay in words alone. That work should be expanded and the council should be given resources to enable it to promote Britain as a whole.

This debate and world events in general have been dominated by East-West relations, and that is not surprising. In this context, however, the world is changing as both East and West adjust to the changing circumstances in which they find themselves. There is a genuine debate in the West, and we are right to cherish our right to be self-critical and to have a free voice in declaring opinions. But society is changing in the East and its populations will not for ever be content to be sold an incredible threat of possible western attack, or even to be dragooned by the rattle of Adolf Hitler's bones. There is a new climate in the East. There are demands for consumer goods. There is a desire on the part of the people to have their voice heard if growth is to be achieved. There is a need for prices and production to reflect demand.

Hungary and China tell us that, when people taste the flavour of being listened to, that taste is not easily removed from their palate. There is nothing soft, neutralist or appeasing in recognising the process of change that is taking place in eastern Europe. We can encourage it through dialogue and co-operation, and in the process loosen the chains of ideology and repression that we rightly condemn; or we can challenge the East militarily, with an increasingly suicidal armoury. In the process we would probably drive it back into the past.

Members of the IPU delegation who visited the Soviet Union and who have spoken in the debate seem to have come home with one clear message — that the new leadership means business. And it was the Prime Minister who told us that we can do business with it. Why do we not rise to the challenge and call its bluff? From our position of strength and freedom in our voluntary alliance, we could make the great step forward to secure freedom for the next generation as well as its survival.

11.29 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): This has been a wide-ranging and thought-provoking debate and I would like to thank hon. Members on both sides of the House for the quality of their speeches. I have no time to comment on them all but I shall try to comment on as many as possible. As the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said, many of those who took part in the recent IPU delegation have also spoken in the debate. It has, if anything, been something of a speech fest for them.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) I should like to join those who have thanked him for the part that he played in the delegation — my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris), my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) are all members of the IPU delegation who have spoken in the debate. Clearly they had a stimulating, thought-provoking and worthwhile trip.

I was pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury spoke about his intervention on the question of human rights while he was in Moscow and that was referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson). I propose to return to the important question of human rights, or their absence, in the Soviet Union.

I have thought before that the IPU reaches the parts that other envoys do not reach. That will be particularly true in the days and months ahead since I understand that the IPU is to hold its next annual conference in Buenos Aires. Where more appropriate than a foreign affairs debate to congratulate an English team on beating Paraguay in Mexico and what with the exciting football match next Sunday there will be plenty of opportunities for bilateral contact between us and Argentina in the near future.

Mr. Foulkes: We also shall support England on Sunday.

Mr. Renton: That is a very good tribute from the Scots. I am sorry that Scotland has not also moved on to the next stage of the world cup.

[Mr. Renton]

I should like to deal with a few free-standing matters raised during the debate. I shall deal first with Namibia. I listened carefully to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton). The fact is that we, together with out contact group partners, the United States, Canada, France and Germany, consider that Security Council Resolution 435, which provides for free and fair elections for the people of Namibia, is still the best available basis for the independence of Namibia. It is the only internationally recognised plan for bringing about independence and it has been agreed by the South African Government. We believe that the best hope for progress is to press for implementation of that plan.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West and here I agree with the hon. Member for Hamilton in eloquent words raised the question of President Waldheim. As the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, he has written to my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Lord Privy Seal on this matter. I understand that he has raised a number of questions with the Ministry of Defence. He has apologised for the fact that he was not able to stay for the replies to the debate, but he said that he would read the record. Therefore, through the record I have to say that the Ministry of Defence's search of its records, which he requested, is still continuing. A matter as serious as that which he has raised, inevitably takes a long time to investigate and requires careful scrutiny. Therefore, I cannot comment further, other then to say that the Ministry's search of its records continues, and no doubt it will be in touch with the hon. and learned Gentleman as soon as the search is finished.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), who also apologised for his absence from the end of the debate, mentioned the Western European Union and the potential contribution that it could make to the development of a common European defence policy. As hon. Members on both sides of the House acknowledge, Europe must pull its weight in East-West affairs generally and in the Western defence effort in particular. The WEU helps in that process. The Government took a leading part in the reactivation of the WEU, and we regard it as a significant forum for European political contributions to security. We have endeavoured consistently to ensure that Foreign and Defence Ministers attend WEU meetings and Assembly sessions.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East mentioned the middle east. Anyone who is involved in the problems of the middle east at times reaches a sense of despair – of wondering whether a solution to the conflicts in the area will ever be achieved. But all of us would agree that the interested countries simply cannot walk away from the problems of the middle east. We must try to address the underlying problems, for stagnation in the middle east breeds despair, and that in turn encourages terrorism.

The balanced British approach to the Arab-Israel problem is unchanged. The 1980 Venice declaration remains the basis of our policy – the right of Palestinians to self-determination and of Israelis to security. The United Kingdom and the other EC countries are ready to help, but they cannot be a substitute for a regional initiative. I am glad that the Prime Minister's recent visit to Israel was welcomed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed and by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West. That visit demonstrated our ability to speak frankly to Palestinians and Israelis without causing offence, but it would be wrong –

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): The Minister said that the Prime Minister's visit did not cause offence. Can he explain why the Palestinian leaders who met the Prime Minister in the consulate in Jerusalem made it clear to her that the only organisation that they recognised as their representatives was the Palestine Liberation Organisation? But she still insists that another group might represent the Palestinians. Which other group does she believe could do that?

Mr. Renton: I shall deal with Palestinian representation, but I must tell the hon. Gentleman that from all the records that I have seen it appears that the leading Palestinians who met the Prime Minister at the consul-general's house in Jerusalem believed it to be a satisfactory meeting and a good exchange of views.

We do not expect an early breakthrough in the Arab-Israel process. There are several reasons for that: first, the breakdown of King Hussein's efforts to co-ordinate his negotiating position with the PLO; secondly, the rotation of Government in Israel; and, thirdly, the United States mid-term elections. We shall do our best to continue, through quiet diplomacy, to encourage clear thinking. Yesterday, King Hussein had useful discussions with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

We recognise that Palestinian representation is a key issue. It is unrealistic for Israelis to hope for peace without talking to authentic Palestinian representatives. One makes peace with one's enemies, not with one's friends. It is equally unrealistic for Palestinians to expect to take part in negotiations unless they renounce violence and accept the Israeli right to a secure existence. Against that background we consider that it is up to the Palestinians to choose their own representatives.

During the Prime Minister's visit she focused attention particularly on the occupied territories. When I visited Gaza in December I was extremely depressed by the economic conditions in that part of the territories. There is no doubt that there is an urgent need for improvements in conditions there, but as a prelude to, not a substitution for, peace negotiations. We believe that the Palestinians should be allowed more freedom to run their own affairs, to engage in political activity and to develop the economy of the territories.

The other tragic conflict in the middle east is that between Iran and Iraq. We often tend to forget it because, rather like the Russian occupation of Afghanistan, it has been going on for so long – nearly six years. There is a tendency to overlook the fact that it is the most bloody armed conflict in the world with, we estimate, 500,000 killed so far. There is still stalemate at the front, particularly around the port of Fao that was occupied by the Iranians some months ago. Large numbers of men are being killed and maimed in continuing fighting. As many as 450,000 young Iranians reach draft age each year, thus giving the Iranians an ample supply of young men on which to continue to draw.

We are very concerned at the continuing suffering and the danger that the conflict poses for other states in the region, notably for the states in the northern part of the Gulf. The international community is now directly involved too. Attacks on neutral shipping in the first half of 1986 were more than those for the whole of 1985. This conflict has seen the use of chemical weapons by Iraq, which we unreservedly condemn, together with other members of the Security Council. The use of chemical weapons in the conflict underlines the need for a global ban, to which I shall return.

Efforts must continue to seek a negotiated settlement. But the sad fact is that many mediators have in the past attempted to intervene but have not succeeded. Olof Palme, the representative of the United Nations Secretary-General, whom we shall always remember for the part that he tried to play in the peace process, the Gulf Co-operation Council, the Japanese, the Pakistanis, the Algerians, the Australians, to name only some. In my judgment the prospects remain bleak. Only the United Nations Secretary-General remains active. My right hon. and learned Friend discussed the conflict with him last month. He offers the best hope of progress in mediation between the parties and we support his efforts.

Mr. Dalyell: May I have a comment later or by letter on any factual inaccuracies in my speech, in Malcolm Spaven's chapter in the book "Mad Dogs" by Pluto Press, or in the "World in Action" programme on Colonel Gaddafi? If there is anything that the Foreign Office thinks is factually wrong, may we be told?

Mr. Renton: I do not think that it is appropriate for the Foreign Office to comment on factual inaccuracies in the book to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. I regret that I was out of the Chamber for his speech, but even Ministers have occasionally to eat. I shall read his speech. If I see any factual inaccuracies of considerable importance in it I shall write to him about them.

Mr. Cohen rose

Mr. Renton: No, I must continue because I have many points to make on other subjects.

Anglo-American relations were raised in several speeches and particularly by the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) who, in what I regarded as a bitter and misguided speech, referred to Britain's thraldom to the United States and to the sick culture of the United States. I am sorry that he is not in his seat. He was supported by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) in a sad little speech. They gave a ridiculous portrayal of the United States. I must ask them which country opens its arms to take in refugees from all over the world? Which country still tries to follow the lines of the poem that are engraved on the Statue of Liberty which run:

> "Give me your tired, your poor, Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free."?

Which is the country that has taken so many more refugees from the Thai-Cambodian camps about which we are so worried? It is, of course, the United States, which has so far taken 365,000 Indo-Chinese refugees. France is next, with about one fifth of that number. Which is the country that gives comfort to Jewish refugees? Which is the country that is always opening its doors to those who are leaving the Soviet Union? Again, it is the United States.

I find it absolutely astonishing that Opposition Members, who get so lyrical in their defence of human rights and who write to me so frequently about Irina Ratsushinskaya, whose book of poetry I was sent in translation today—this sad, ill poetess is forbidden to leave the USSR for the moment—turn so much of their venom on the United States without ever looking at the mote in the eye of the USSR.

Mr. Foulkes: Rubbish.

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman has only to listen to the speeches that have been made today to learn how tragically true what I have said is.

Of course the Government have close contact with the United States Administration on a variety of world issues. I am glad that we do. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary saw Secretary Shultz on 22 May. He had useful talks, and they will be continued regularly at a high level. The United States Government listen to our views.

Mr. George Robertson: When?

Mr. Renton: That does not mean that they do what we say all of the time, but should we give up every opportunity to influence them? I can tell the hon. Gentleman when. The Camp David four points on SDI were agreed between the President and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in December 1984. They have gained wide acceptance in the Alliance as fundamental elements in the approach to SDI. It is absurd to say that we follow the United States slavishly. Opposition Members who accuse my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister one moment of being a poodle and the next of being an iron lady, entrust her with a quality of metamorphosis of which even she, with all of her undoubted qualities, is not capable.

The greater part of the debate was taken up with arms control. My hon. Friend the Member for Leominster, in a thoughtful and sensible speech with much of which I agreed, said how important it is that we should work in every way we can to help to maintain the momentum of the talks that have started in Geneva. I entirely agree. We are not party to the Geneva talks between the United States and the Soviets on strategic arms and intermediate forces, but we attach the highest priority to them. We believe, however, that we should never sacrifice our long-term aims for short-term gains. The agreed aim of the talks is to work out effective agreements to prevent the arms race in space and to terminate it on earth, to limit and reduce nuclear arms and to strengthen strategic stability. It is the Americans who have made most of the running to turn those objectives into reality by tabling concrete proposals in Geneva.

It was they who in November proposed a 50 per cent. reduction in nuclear weapons and in February a global elimination of all intermediate nuclear zones. These are radical proposals to achieve deep cuts in nuclear arsenals. If implemented, they would provide a basis for lessening East-West tensions.

But until very recently, these proposals of November and February have been without specific Soviet response. Finally, in the last few days—and my right hon. and learned Friend referred to these proposals—the Russians have come back with a specific counter-proposal strategic weapons to be limited by equal ceilings, 1,600 launchers on each side, nuclear warheads not to exceed 8,000, and separate negotiation on long range intermediate nuclear forces. They have also proposed a commitment to give at least 15 years' notice of withdrawal from the ABM treaty and to restrict work on SDI to laboratory research.

Full details are not yet available to us, and the detail is obviously of fundamental importance. But I agree with the right hon. Member for Leeds, East when he described these proposals as important. They will require very careful study by the United States. I very much hope that they mark a shift away from the former negative Soviet approach and that they will bring closer the prospect of a balanced and fair agreement. Our initial reaction would be that there seems to be an element of flexibility and an opportunity for understanding in the proposals that the Soviets have now tabled.

Much has been said about chemical weapons. This Government are wholly committed to the aim of ridding the world of chemical weapons. We have tabled no fewer than six detailed papers for consideration at the conference on disarmament in Geneva. This is an issue on which NATO is wholly united. But we abandoned chemical weapons in the 1950s and the United States has since 1969 imposed a unilateral moratorium on their manufacture. In other words, there have been 17 years of unilateral restraints.

What matching restraint has there been from the Soviet Union? Its response has been relentlessly to build up stocks of chemical weapons — 300,000 tonnes of nerve agents alone. I submit to the right hon. Member for Leeds, East that that is an eloquent example of the failure of unilateralism, even the leap-frogging type of unilateralism to which he referred.

Mr. George Robertson: So the Government wish to do nothing?

Mr. Renton: We do want to do something.

The Soviet Union says that it wants a ban, so why has a ban not been agreed? The answer is simply verification. The only treaty worth having is one in which all sides have confidence. That means ensuring that there are adequate arrangements to prevent cheating.

Both the right hon. Member for Leeds, East and my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster asked for details about progress on verification. Among the crucial issues remaining to be determined are how to check that civil chemicals are not diverted for chemical weapons purposes, how to check on non-production, and, most important of all, how to agree a stringent challenge inspection regime.

I welcomed the opportunity of discussing these matters today with Mr. Issraelyan, the chief Soviet negotiator at the chemical weapons talks in Geneva. I made it plain to him that we looked to the Soviet Union to show new flexibility in the negotiations if we are to believe that they are genuinely serious about a ban — if, in the words of the Prime Minister that have been frequently quoted, they are to show that Mr. Gorbachev is really a man with whom we can now do business.

Iraq's use of chemical weapons in the Gulf has brought home sharply to all nations how accessible and terrible these weapons are. A comprehensive global ban must be agreed quickly to prevent proliferation. This dreadful genie must be put back in its bottle. Meanwhile the United States has decided to restore a deterrent capability if, and only if, negotiations on a global ban do not succeed between now and late 1987. This binary decision is not escalation, as the right hon. Member for Leeds, East suggested, but an opportunity for negotiation of a total ban. The ball is in the Soviet court. It must decide whether negotiations can succeed. NATO has absolutely no wish to see the United States resume production of chemical weapons if the better option, a negotiated ban, can be achieved. We have a negotiating window now of 18 months. A chemical weapons ban is needed by the West, the East and the whole world.

Three events of possible historic significance have already happened in 1986. The first is Chernobyl, to which the hon. Member for Hamilton referred. It could be as important as Nagasaki or Hiroshima in changing perceptions about the future nuclear world. The second is the American strike on Libyan bases. It is now clear that the effect was to administer a sharp shock to Mr. Gaddafi and to serve notice on other countries which might have considered indulging in state inspired terrorism. Since then the Tokyo and Luxembourg meetings have put together packages of non-military measures to deal with international terrorism. We greatly hope that this will have a growing effect. The third event has been the oil surprise. It is devastating for the Soviets, the Libyans and some friendly states, such as Mexico, but it presents an opportunity for Western and world growth as good as a tax cut, and it must give added impetus to the international discussions on world debt. But none of those events is as significant as the talks on arms control and whether there is progress in those talks.

Mr. Healey: I asked the Minister to answer a specific question which was whether the answer given by the Secretary of State for Defence to questions on the Government's attitude to a comprehensive test ban and which contradicted itself in the same sentence represents a change in the Government's position? Or, are the Government prepared to seek a comprehensive test ban only if the verification problem can be solved?

Mr. Renton: As both my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and I have said in answer to questions on a comprehensive test ban treaty, there has been no change in our position.

The issue of arms control talks will certainly affect us, our children and our grandchildren because it reflects the capacity of human beings to inflict on one another virtually infinite harm. It asks the question whether we collectively have the ability to rein in that capacity. There is no doubt that we in the West, while seeing the propaganda, the shallowness and the public relations value of so many Russian proposals, must test to the full whether there is ground in their proposals on which we can build the future hopes of mankind. Today we have had discussions with ambassador Issraelyan, and shortly my right hon. and learned Friend will have important discussions with Foreign Minister, Mr. Shevardnadze.

Yet, it is strange that while the issue of arms control is of such paramount importance, it is the issue on which our political opponents are at their most perverse. The Social Democrats and Liberals — [Interruption.] Indeed, where are they? They have given new meaning to the phrase dual track: one David going one way, the other David going the other. I listened to the comments of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed on nuclear deterrence, and I have no clearer idea of his policy now than I did previously.

As to the Labour party and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East with his recent lessons in arithmetic, I shall first correct the right hon. Gentleman on the cost of the necessary replacement for Polaris in the 1990s which he said would cost 40 per cent. of the equipment budget. It will cost not 40 per cent. but an average of 3 per cent. of the total defence budget, and 6 per cent. of the equipment budget.

Mr. Healey rose

Mr. Renton: The right hon. Gentleman reminds me of Max Beerbohm's character the happy hypocrite who was, as Max Beerbohm said, rather like Caligula with a dash of Sir John Falstaff. Hypocrisy is a dangerous trait for those who wish to lead political parties, let alone countries.

The message is clear. The Conservative Government, and they alone, will pursue their path of careful negotiation with Moscow as a friend of the United States, and as a member of NATO and the European Community. Whenever it is appropriate, we shall do that independently and in our own right.

It being Twelve o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put, pursuant to order [18 June].

ESTIMATES

Resolved,

That this House agrees with the report [10th June] of the Liaison Committee. [Mr. Sainsbury.]

Scottish Universities (Funding)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. [Mr. Sainsbury.]

12.1 am

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): I welcome the opportunity to speak on behalf of universities in Scotland and students who will not have places in universities as a result of the University Grants Committee's decisions on funding. I take the opportunity to raise, on their behalf, some of the matters causing grave concern. I should like the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, in his response, to tell not only hon. Members but those who attend universities and those responsible for their administration what extra information the UGC used or called on. How did it calculate the resource factor when it decided on the funding of universities, especially those in Scotland?

I welcome the stand taken by the principal of Dundee university, Adam Neville, against the funding cuts by the UGC. In the face of a wholesale attack on universities by the Government, the principal of Dundee has at last spoken out against the Government's policies. He is determined that there will be no redundancies in academic and non-academic staff. He is determined to hold on to all kinds of disciplines. He sees Dundee university as part of the city and part of the region. The university needs their support just as they need the university.

In the local press recently, the principal called for a long-term funding strategy to safeguard the future of universities. He reminded the Government that universities are long-term providers of graduates, research and co-operation with industry. He reminded the Government that to achieve that they need long-term support and enough money to operate and develop.

The UGC has recognised only the obvious areas of research excellence in Dundee — pharmacology, mathematics, biological sciences, biochemistry, anatomy and physiology, clinical medicine, psychology, civil engineering, mechanical engineering, law, and philosophy. Even though some of those were rated as outstanding by international standards, no extra funds are to be provided for research. Worse than that, in the UGC's rush, it has ignored many others. There are departments, research groups within departments and individuals with high national and international reputations who have been completely passed over.

Worse still, the UGC has looked only to the past and not to the future. Research assessments were based on work that had its origins five, 10 or even 15 years ago. The UGC has not recognised new developments, many of which are at Dundee. University research is about change, innovation and development. The UGC, with its blinkered vision — forced on it by the Government — failed to see the obvious. It claimed to have carried out a peer review. Many would suggest that it resembled an "end of the pier" review.

Dundee has a fine record of working with industry. That co-operation has gone on for many years. The traditional strengths are in medicine, science and engineering, but the university is now working on new areas — biotechnology, robotics and computer science. Recently, the university entered into an agreement with a major pharmaceutical company. It has set up two companies of its own to carry out clinical research and produce diagnostic kits. At the local level, there is a range of consultancy and advisory work that is done by departments such as chemistry, physics, geology, civil engineering and psychology. There is tremendous potential at national and local level.

Dundee university also produces graduates. They leave with the benefits of a Scottish university education — four years of study in a broad range of subjects. They are not committed to courses that were selected too early in school. They can find out about new subjects and can change direction. They have a better chance of discovering their true potential. Students may specialise or follow combinations of subjects that are best suited to their future careers. In the arts and social science faculty that flexibility has been fine-tuned to achieve the maximum range from available resources. All come out with a far greater range of skills than when they went in.

The courses developed at Dundee produce those graduates that business and industry need. Derek Hornby, chairman of Rank Xerox (UK) Ltd., made that point at a conference on the role of arts and social science graduates in society held in Dundee last year. He said:

"there was a pressing need in industry for specialized graduates such as electronics engineers, but that industry also needs good honours graduates, regardless of their discipline. These generalists who have flexibility, inquiring minds, and skills at communication have an advantage over specialists whose knowledge rapidly becomes obsolete."

The same message came from Bill Hughes, chairman of Grampian Holdings and the CBI Scotland Education and Training Committee. His advice to the universities was "You educate. We'll train." Fortunately, Dundee university has listened to that advice and its graduates' employment prospects are good. The university is high, and always has been, on the league table of graduate employment. It has listened to what business and industry have to say and has got it right. The UGC does not appear to have listened and has got it wrong.

Dundee university has made a point of being part of the region and the city by developing opportunities for continuing education and part-time degrees. The newly formed Centre for Continuing Education runs its extramural courses for more than 4,000 people. They offer a chance for those who have missed out in their education or who want to learn for the pleasure and fulfilment that comes from study. A recent development is the programme of vocational education aimed at local industry. With support from the Manpower Services Commission and the Scottish Development Agency, several schemes are under way, including one for training in languages with a large local company. There are part-time degrees, such as the master of education, which is a valuable conversion course for local teachers. An innovation is the part-time degree run by the faculty of arts and social sciences. In its first year, there were so many applications that people had to be turned away.

People in Dundee care about education, and the university is trying to make education more accessible. The Government believe, or say they do, in the value of retraining, but the UGC does not seem to have yet got the message or to understand. It is not giving enough support to vocational continuing education and severe cuts look inevitable. The Government and the UGC must accept that continuing education in Scotland depends on home-based study. If courses in Dundee are cut, the students cannot go elsewhere.

All these achievements at Dundee have been made despite a cut in funding since 1980 of more than 15 per cent. In 1983, the Prime Minister promised to hold university funding at a steady level in real terms after 1984-85. The university is now being told to cut its expenditure by a further 20 per cent. — so much for the Prime Minister's promises.

What has Dundee university done to deserve this? What has it done wrong? No one is saying. But it is certain that, if action is not taken immediately, all these achievements will be threatened. What is to be lost? What achievement do the Government and the UGC want Dundee to throw away? Is it the initiatives with the local industries? What advantage to Dundee can there be if these are cut? Is it the quality of teaching? This is bound to suffer if there are further losses in academic and non-academic staff.

The Secretary of State recently received a letter from the dean of students at Dundee university that said:

"Secondly, academics in Arts and Social Sciences are most unwilling to see their interests divided, by Government and U.G.C. policy, from those of their colleagues in the Sciences. As a recent delegation from the Standing Conference of Arts and Social Sciences in Universities explained some months ago to your predecessor, Sir Keith Joseph, there are many Arts-based academics who are already working to make broader higher education opportunities available to those who can profit by them . . . The irony of the situation is that efforts to make the curriculum more flexible while at the same time maintaining high standards of excellence, which Sir Keith on that occasion wholeheartedly professed to support, are precisely what the U.G.C.'s present strategies in redistributing resources are bringing to a halt."

How can teaching be improved if there is less money to be spent on books, services and equipment? How will a reduction in the number of students at Dundee benefit industry and business, which are calling out for more of these graduates? Do the UGC and the Government expect Dundee university to throw away its record on graduate employment? Fewer courses on offer will obviously reduce the opportunities for graduates. This will hurt Dundee because over half the Scottish students at the university are local, coming from the area around Dundee, Perth and Angus. Far more Scottish students go to their home university than do students in England. They do this for good reasons. They leave school at an earlier stage, which reduces the burdens on parents supporting their children for a four-year degree. Does the UGC want Dundee to throw away its new innovations in research and damage its solid base?

What about the effects on the local economy? The university is the second largest employer in the region with a budget for expenditure of £26 million. Every £100,000 that is cut from the university results in an estimated loss of £140,000 from the local economy. With the deficit expected to reach about £1·6 million next year, this means a loss to the region of Tayside of about £2·2 million — hardly the little economy that the Prime Minister seems to think it will be. It could be described as a catastrophe.

Most of the money spent by the university goes into the region and helps the people there. Universities are about people, the people who work and study in them and those who live alongside them and share the benefits. The principal of Dundee got it right when he said that Scotland needs universities in smaller cities such as Dundee. Small universities, by their very nature, must be somewhat more expensive per student than large ones. To cover a discipline one needs a library, computers and expensive equipment, and one cannot have half of each for a small university. He has explained this to the UGC, but it does not seem to have listened, or it has not been allowed to listen.

The trouble with the UGC is that its members are the old-fashioned academics who talk about the role of the universities in the economy, but, in real practical terms, this means the local economy, a point that they do not understand. Many in the university system believe that the further away one is from London, Oxford and Cambridge, the more likely it is that the UGC decides to cut one's budget even further. It would be interesting to hear what the Minister has to say about that.

The Government and the UGC have bungled the job. They have not listened to those who know best — the business men, the industrialists, the students, the universities and the local communities. They do not seem to know about the special needs of Scottish universities within the framework of the Scottish education system. They are part of a system that sees as part of its strength the capacity to teach across a broad reach of subjects. Children in school are not forced to specialise too early, and they get a chance to select their subject during the two introductory years of a four-year degree. The system is more efficient because time is not wasted upon teaching students in wrong courses. It is also a system that can respond immediately to change.

An essential feature of the Scottish system is the four-year degree. It is not just a question of an extra year at university. The whole structure of secondary education is different from that in England. It is geared to the four-year university degree. Students enter universities in Scotland one year earlier than they do in England. Any attempt to change the four-year degree must be seen as an attack on the whole system of education. This is not a special case argument. It is an argument for a completely different system that cannot be funded along the same lines as the English system.

We shall all be worse off in the long run if there are fewer people in the work force with the advanced qualifications that are needed to maintain an efficient economy and a competitive industry. Already the proportion of the British population with a degree is only half the figure for Japan or America. When he spoke last week to university teachers at their rally, my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) said that the Labour party is committed to adequate and consistent funding of higher education, to a proper career structure for all those who work in higher education, and to access for all those who can profit by it and who want to pursue higher education. If the UGC proposals for Dundee university were to be accepted, it would take us back to the failed, elitist structures of yesterday that demonstrably have failed the majority of our young people.

12.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): "Wholly a blessed time when jargon might abate and here and there some genuine speech begin." I quote, of course, Thomas Carlyle, an illustrious countryman of the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross). I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is as devoted to him as I am.

I respect the hon. Gentleman's committment to his constituency and to Scottish concerns that has led him to initiate this debate, but it is rather a shame that he does not seem to have recognised another essential truth propagated by Thomas Carlyle, to the effect that there is a noble conservatism, as well as an ignoble one.

I am very much aware of the position that universities and other institutions of higher education occupy in their local communities. That applies not only in Scotland but to universities in any part of the United Kingdom. This contribution to employment, as well as the contribution to the educational life of the area in question, is one of the major reasons why the funding of universities is of concern to many local communities.

Nevertheless, I cannot accept the main burden of the hon. Gentleman's argument, and in reply I should like to make a series of points. The hon. Gentleman made no acknowledgement whatsoever in his speech of the statement by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) on 20 May. The Government have already made it clear that in order to maintain the policy of selectivity and rationalisation in universities on which the UGC is embarked they are prepared to consider the possibility of extra cash for the universities for the 1987-88 and subsequent financial years, provided that in discussion with the UGC and the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals it is possible to reach agreement on a programme of work that will maintain and develop the policy of selectivity and rationalisation, better management, including in particular better financial management, and a drive to improve the quality of teaching, including the development of provision for the training and appraisal of academic staff. This is a serious proposal. I hope very much that the universities will take it seriously. The Department is already engaged in discussions with the UGC and the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals.

The hon. Gentleman, like so many Opposition Members, seeks to perpetuate a myth about the contraction of higher education. It is very tiresome for grown-up people to have to go over the same ground so often, but I am afraid that we shall have to cover it yet again. Since 1979, Conservative Governments presided over a massive expansion in higher education. In Great Britain as a whole there are 128,000 more full-time and part-time students now than there were in 1979, including nearly 80,000 more full-time students. In Scotland the number of students in full-time higher education has risen from under 69,000 in 1979-80 to around 79,000 in the current academic year, which is an increase of about 15 per cent.

The proportion of young people who enter higher education in Scotland is traditionally higher than for the rest of the United Kingdom. Despite the increase in the size of the 17 and 18-year-old population, the proportion of that population entering higher education has grown over the period from 17 per cent. in 1979 to 19 per cent. in 1984-85, and is projected to continue to rise. So we have achieved an increasing proportion entering higher education out of a much greater total population.

To suggest that there is any systematic prejudice against Scotland — I feared that the hon. Gentleman might suggest it and unfortunately my fears were well founded — in the allocation of grant by the UGC is simply nonsense. The UGC has this year for the first time moved to a much greater openness in its allocation of grant and to a much more systematic and publicly articulated methodology. Provision for teaching in all subjects has been made on the basis of a common allocation per student in each subject for every university. So there is no possibility of prejudice there. Provision for research has been calculated on the basis of four main factors, three quantitative and one qualitative.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden) rose——

Mr. Walden: I want to continue, as I do not have much time.

They are, first, the numbers of academic staff and of research students; secondly, income from the research councils and from medical and other research charities; thirdly, research contract income from industry and from Government Departments; and, fourthly, the UGC's evaluation of the quality of research in each departmental cost centre, having regard to universities' own research statements, and to the views of the research councils and other bodies and individuals. These judgments were reached by the subject sub-committees of the UGC, so that over 120 academics and others were involved.

This obviously represents a much wider cross-section of the academic community than the main committee of the UGC. I would like to stress that powerful representation from Scotland was present on those committees.

Historically, the Scottish universities have been relatively generously funded compared with the rest of the United Kingdom. The move to a fairer distribution of grant based on a common unit of funding per student in each subject has therefore been the main reason for the funding changes in the majority of Scottish universities. Two universities——

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. Walden: I am sorry. I have only a matter of minutes.

Two universities gained from this, but five lost. Four Scottish universities also lost because of the judgment that was made of the quality of their research, but so did many other universities in different parts of the United Kingdom.

It is important to recognise that the allocations that have been made by the UGC are not set in concrete. I want to stress that strongly. If a university gets more from the research councils or from industry, it will automatically get more from the UGC by the operation of the sophisticated formula that has been put in place. So there is every incentive to universities to build upon their strengths and to try to improve their relative position. Later, I shall mention the particular strengths of Dundee.

I have recently visited two universities in Scotland, Aberdeen and St. Andrew's, and I look forward to visiting as many more as I can. In that and other ways I have become aware of the many links between Scottish universities and industry. The growth of high technology industry is one of the signs of the changing structure of the Scottish economy. As elsewhere in the United Kingdom, some traditional industries such as shipbuilding and steel are declining in importance, largely due to worldwide changes in demand, but there are also exciting developments in, for example, high technology such as electronics and biotechnology, and in the service sector. I was particularly glad to note that the applied mathematics and biochemistry sectors in Dundee university were rated as outstanding nationally. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not show more pride in that.

The Government recognise that some areas are particularly affected by the decline of traditional manufacturing industry, and our regional policy will continue to make an important contribution. Since May 1979 offers of regional selective assistance made in Scotland have totalled £368·7 million, the projects creating or safeguarding nearly 140,000 jobs. In 1984-85 alone, expenditure on regional development grant is estimated to have been £109 million.

The hon. Gentleman will be familiar, from his own knowledge of Dundee, with the scope of Government support. Apart from regional assistance, Dundee's development area status gives it access to European Community loans at favourable rates. Maximum support is available from Government and European Community sources for local initiatives such as the Tayside enterprise zone and the Dundee project. I understand that one of the zone sites is a technology park which provides Dundee with the opportunity to become a major centre for high technology industry. All of this is positive and encouraging.

As I began by saying, the Government are prepared to consider the provision of additional resources for the universities generally, from which the universities in Scotland can expect to benefit, but it is necessary to emphasise the continued need to restrain the growth in public expenditure in the interest of the economy as a whole. If we want universities in Scotland to continue to be as outstanding in international terms as they are, we have to continue to generate the wealth to pay for those universities.

Universities do not pay for themselves but are paid for out of the pockets of the taxpayers in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and the taxpayers in my constituency. We can fund our universities more generously only if we are a wealthier nation. Wealth is created not by the Government, but by individuals and firms throughout the country.

Under our economic policies the rate of inflation has now come down to 2·8 per cent. in the year to May 1986. In that connection I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that a decade or so ago the inflation rate for our universities was about 30 per cent. Let us keep some sense of proportion by looking back at the sort of policies that the hon. Gentleman's party pursued. Those policies caused the rate of inflation for university costs to reach the astronomical and rather absurd figure of 30 per cent.

Wage inflation is now running at 7·5 per cent. By contrast, some of our major European competitors, and in particular West Germany, have succeeded in achieving negative inflation and falling wage costs per unit of output. I mention all this because it is important background information in this debate, as it would be in any debate on public expenditure.

The UGC's policies of selectivity and rationalisation are brave and courageous and are to be applauded, but I understand that they may have caused disappointment in some departments. I say some departments because I must not brand universities in any part of Britain by judging them by specific departmemts. The judgment of one's peers can often seem harsh. Some universities may have been trying to do too much on a limited base and it is important in such cases to build on the strengths that have been identified by the UGC. This is one such area, and I am convinced that in the longer term this whole new exercise of selectivity will be a major gain for the entire university system. In the long-term interests of the health of the system it can only be a plus to be reminded publicly of where one's strengths and weaknesses lie.

As is frequently the case with the Opposition, the hon. Gentleman fails to recognise that there is an essential interconnection between the economy as a whole and higher education. Frankly, I was mildly shocked, or I would have been had I not become so hardened to this even in so short a time, by the hon. Gentleman's reference to the recent labour rally at which higher education was discussed. He knows as well as I do of the rather embarrassing recent exchange between the Opposition spokesman on education and the spokesman on economic affairs. One pulled the rug from under the feet of the other as fast as the other was dishing out Mickey Mouse money to universities.

It was wrong for the hon. Gentleman consistently to ignore in his speech the implications for the economy of the funding of universities, just as it was wrong for him to ignore the important statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East, the former Secretary of State for Education and Science. My right hon. Friend said clearly to the House only a few weeks ago that he was perfectly well aware of the strains that were developing in some universities, and that provided some understanding could be reached about efficiency, selectivity and improvement in teaching in those universities, the Government would give sympathetic consideration to the possibility of finding further funding for the universities in the United Kingdom. That also means in Scotland.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Expenditure

1. Mr. Cash asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has of the scope for increasing value for money in public spending programmes.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): Improvements worth hundreds of millions of pounds a year have already been made, but there is still substantial scope for achieving more.

Mr. Cash: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the Audit Commission that about £1 billion worth of savings could be obtained in terms of increased value in public services by applying the Audit Commission's criteria? Will he congratulate the Mid-Staffordshire health authority, which, by applying new management techniques, has managed to save this year and for ensuing years more than £100,000 in revenue as a result of its techniques to improve the quality of public services in its area?

Mr. MacGregor: I confirm my hon. Friend's comments about the Audit Commission. It has identified possible savings of more than £1 billion a year since its studies in 1983, but my hon. Friend will know that that is in relation to local authority services. There is still substantial scope for better value for money and improvements in local authority spending through all the techniques that the Commission has suggested and which we are applying in central Government. The same principle applies in the Health Service and my hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the techniques that can be used at district and health authority level and throughout the Health Service. The same applies in central Government as a whole.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that public sector bureaucracies have a sponge-like capacity to absorb taxpayers' money, and that increases in funding are all too rarely matched by equivalent improvements in the quality of services delivered? Will he therefore undertake that if, in the coming weeks and months, any suggestions are made to him that there is a need for real increases in funding in particular Departments, he will ask searching questions to see whether the administrative systems in those Departments are as streamlined as they might be?

Mr. MacGregor: I assure my hon. Friend that I attach great importance to this, which is shown by the fact that in the last public expenditure White Paper there were more than 1,200 output measures and performance indicators. I intend to apply the same priority in the forthcoming public expenditure round. I hope my hon. Friend will recognise the considerable advances that we have already made. For example, in the machinery of government alone, by the rigorous application of various techniques, we are now producing savings of about £750 million a year.

Mr. Penhaligon: Will the Minister tell the House what persuades him not to invest money in the prevention of tax evasion when all the studies suggest that money invested in that way would recoup far more than is presently recouped?

Mr. MacGregor: I am glad to assure the hon. Gentleman that we have increased the resources to deal with tax evasion.

Tax Revenue

2. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of reductions in the tax rates on the buoyancy of tax revenues since 1979.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): A precise estimate cannot be made but certainly the reduction in taxes increases motivation and encourages enterprise. Tax cuts will lead to a healthier, more competitive economy, higher incomes and more resources to improve public services.

Mr. Forsyth: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the proportion of tax revenue that comes from the highest paid has increased as a result of the reduction in high marginal rates of tax? Is this not entirely in line with the American experience, which shows that a cut in taxes increases revenue?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is right. The proportion of income tax revenue paid by the top 10 per cent. has risen from 34 per cent. in 1978-79 to 37½ per cent. in 1986-87.

Mr. Carter-Jones: In looking at the figures, has the Minister considered the public's attitude to increased public expenditure on health and education in preference to tax cuts? Has he any observations to make on that?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman knows that it is the Government's objective to have a good Health Service and a good education service. We also believe that tax cuts are long overdue and are necessary to improve our economic performance.

Inflation

3. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he assesses to be the main factors currently influencing the level of inflation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The economic policy of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. MacKay: I thank my right hon. Friend for that excellent reply. Does he agree that the people who feel most vulnerable when there is a high inflation are pensioners? Does he further agree that there are certain factors in inflation figures which affect pensioners more than other parts of the community? Can he say whether those factors in commodity prices are going up faster than other items in the inflation figures?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right in saying that those who are most affected in the community by high inflation are the elderly, pensioners and others on fixed incomes. That is why the greatest social service that a Government can perform is to bring inflation down and work towards stable prices. As for the slightly different consumption patterns of the elderly and the average member of the population, my hon. Friend may be aware that there is a pensioner price index, which addresses itself to that. In fact, during the period when we have been in office the pensioner price index has risen by less than the retail prices index as a whole.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: What on earth has the Government's economic policy got to do with plummeting oil prices and other commodity prices?

Mr. Lawson: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Government's success in getting inflation down long predated the fall in the oil price.

Mr. Hickmet: Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who say that we can have a little more public expenditure and a little more inflation are in fact advocating a dangerous course? Does he further agree that there is no guarantee that more public expenditure would lead to more employment or, indeed, increased services, and that if it were the job of the Government to employ people we would all be living in eastern Europe, with dreary standards of living and dreary services?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is making a point that is well understood by all those who have responsibility for the conduct of economic policy, not only in this country, but throughout the Western world. Indeed, in all the European countries, where, sadly, unemployment is too high, if there were a simple answer of bringing down unemployment by increasing public expenditure, that would have been introduced long ago. If the policies of right hon. Members in the Labour party were introduced, and there were an increase in public expenditure of £24 billion, the result would be sharply higher inflation and sharply higher unemployment.

Mr. Hattersley: Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer prepared to test the validity of his claim about the effect of his Government's policies on inflation by publishing in the Official Report the calculations made by the Central Statistical Office of the reasons why inflation has fallen over the past year?

Mr. Lawson: The Central Statistical Office merely reports what has occurred. It is not engaged in economic analysis.

Inflation

5. Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the economy to achieve a negative rate of inflation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: The Government's objective is stable prices.

Mr. Proctor: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the negative rate of inflation in West Germany, one of our major international industrial competitors. Will he give a commitment that the rate of inflation in this country will remain in low single figures? Does he agree that only if that inflation rate remains in low single figures for a considerable period will the real benefits of low inflation bear fruit?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend points to the fact that in Germany inflation is currently slightly less than zero. It is a negative figure. I think that that is likely to be a temporary phenomenon. The plain fact is that throughout the world the same sort of economic policies have been pursued. Therefore, it is not that surprising that inflation has come down worldwide. Our inflation has come down even faster than in other countries. It is now under 3 per cent. for the first time in over 18 years. I am confident that it will stay low as long as these policies remain in force.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirm that there is no merit whatsoever in negative inflation, commonly known as deflation?

Mr. Lawson: Yes, indeed. If the right hon. Gentleman had been paying attention, as I am sure he was, to my answer, he would have heard me say that the Government's objective is stable prices, not falling prices.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Notwithstanding my right hon. Friend's answers to the last two questions, is it not the case that one of the pressures in the pipeline to increase inflation is the excessive level of wage settlements? Will my right hon. Friend take every opportunity to hammer home to the Confederation of British Industry and others that their spinelessness in the face of excessive wage demands will affect their own competitiveness and is likely to cause worse inflation and more unemployment?

Mr. Lawson: It is certainly a major cause of the present high level of unemployment. Inflation is now down to 2·8 per cent. at the most recent count, and if the tax reductions in the Budget are taken into account, the best approximation that we have of the growth in the cost of living over the past year is less than 1 per cent. Yet average earnings, according to officially recorded figures, have gone up by about 7½ per cent. This is inevitably damaging to Britain's competitiveness in world markets, damaging to orders, damaging to the amount of business that can be done by British firms, and therefore damaging to jobs. It is management's responsibility to take a far firmer grip on their costs, especially their pay costs, than they have been doing hitherto.

Mr. Bell: What does the Chancellor of the Exchequer say to newspapers such as The Economist which say that the inflation rate will go up between 4 and 5 per cent. next year as a consequence of the oil price reductions working through the economy?

Mr. Lawson: We shall publish a forecast at the normal time and in the normal way, and I think it will be found that the track record of forecasts published by the Treasury is rather better than that of forecasts published outside bodies, including The Economist. The plain fact is that inflation is now under 3 per cent. Although at the moment it is flattered to some extent by the mortgage rate element in the index, even if one takes that out inflation is still around 3·1 per cent.

Mr. Higgins: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many members of the public do not understand the wide scope of the retail prices index, as it covers things such as electricity and gas prices, rates and so on? Will he publish a clear explanation to the public showing exactly what the RPI represents and the fact that it is based on real surveys of expenditure?

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend is correct in saying that it is based on those factors. Sometimes there are people who find it difficult to believe that inflation is as low as it is when they consider one particular price which is only a small proportion of total consumer expenditure. The responsibility for the RPI and its publication lies not with me but with my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, and I shall draw his attention to what my right hon. Friend has suggested.

Unemployment Costs

7. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to the Exchequer of unemployment in the north-west region.

Mr. MacGregor: A regional breakdown of unemployment and supplementary benefit paid to the unemployed would be available only at disproportionate cost. It is not possible to estimate the tax revenue forgone.

Mr. Lloyd: I thank the Minister for his comprehensive answer, because one of the bones of contention is that this Government, who have no interest in regional affairs, do not even know what the true cost of unemployment in the north-west is. The social costs are massively higher than even the direct economic costs to the Treasury. If the Government are sincere about unemployment, what practical steps are being taken that will lead to a reduction in unemployment, and when will that begin to take place?

Mr. MacGregor: All the Government's economic policies are designed to produce a more competitive economy which helps with the creation of real permanent jobs. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, at a time of a rising labour force, the success of this is measured by the fact that nearly 1 million net new jobs have been created in the economy as a whole since 1983. He will be interested to know that in that figure there are 82,000 jobs in the north-west. In addition, he will be aware that the north-west has received a substantial and fair proportion of the specific employment measures that have been introduced by the Government and added to in the last Budget. That represents a total expenditure of £3 billion this year, compared with £300 million in 1979 when the Government took office.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in my constituency, which is in the north-west, unemployment is at half the national average? One reason for this is that firms are rushing out of Manchester, because of the lunatic policies of the local authorities there, into Cheshire, where the Conservative-controlled local authorities have much more sensible policies, producing lower rate burdens?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. All those who urge unnecessary higher spending in local authorities should be aware of the consequences of that for firms which find their costs increased by much higher rates.

Mr. Parry: Is not the real cost in regions such as Merseyside, the north-west and the north-east, the mass unemployment, the human misery, the marriage break-ups, the nervous breakdowns and the number of young people committing suicide because of long-term unemployment? Is this not the real, terrible cost of mass unemployment in our regions?

Mr. MacGregor: That is precisely why we have increased substantially the amount of money spent on employment and training measures during our period of office. The hon. Gentleman must know that if public spending rises to the level advocated by his Front Bench that will create much greater unemployment in firms which are doing well in our economy.

Mr. Churchill: As a Manchester Member, may I say that it is a matter of considerable satisfaction that more than 80,000 new jobs have been created in the north-west since the 1983 general election? If that rate of job creation is projected into the months ahead, at what point does my right hon. Friend foresee it overtaking the rate at which new people come into the labour force, thereby bringing a net reduction in the number of unemployed?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend has fairly drawn attention to the considerable increase in the labour force in recent years. In fact, there was an increase of more than 560,000 in the last year for which figures are available. That demographic factor is now beginning to change and it will be a helpful factor in dealing with unemployment.

Mr. Eastham: May I draw the Minister's attention to the Employment Select Committee's investigation into long-term unemployment, in which it points out that some people have been unemployed for three years? Is it not time that the Government seriously considered all those facts, with a view to taking positive action to alleviate the unemployment problems of these people?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman will know that the Government gave a detailed response to the first report of the Employment Select Committee, which has led to the Committee revising its proposals considerably in a downward direction. The restart programme, which is now going nationwide, is designed especially to help the long-term unemployed, and we are undertaking many other measures. It is crucial to know at what point extra public expenditure on these measures becomes counter-productive, not only because they do not produce real benefit in terms of extra places, but because they are a cost on existing employers.

Mr. Favell: Is it not becoming increasingly clear that the more a town hall spends, the less there is to encourage new enterprises into an area? In my constituency of Stockport, which to the uninitiated is probably indistinguishable from Manchester, it takes half as many men to empty a dustbin as it does in Manchester, and unemployment is now less than 10 per cent, which is far less than the regional average and, indeed, is less than the national average.

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, of which I hope everyone in the north-west will take note.

Mr. Hattersley: Will the Chief Secretary simply give one straight answer to one straight question? How many jobs have been lost, net, in the British economy since the Government were elected seven years ago?

Mr. MacGregor: There was a considerable reduction in jobs in the period 1979 to 1981. It was a good deal less than 1 million — about 700,000. A large part of that was in the period 1979 to 1981, when we were coping not only with a worldwide recession but with the considerable overmanning that took place under the Labour Government. Since 1983 that trend has gone substantially the other way, and there are now nearly 1 million net new jobs.

Public Expenditure

10. Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to review the Government's policy on the level of public spending on the Health Service, education and housing; and if he will make a statement.

11. Mr. Weetch asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to review Government policy over the level of public spending on health, education and housing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The level of all public spending programmes will be reviewed as usual in this year's public expenditure survey.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister aware that all the evidence shows that most people consider that the first priority should be more public spending on health, education and housing? They are right, of course. Do the outrageous remarks on council housing by the Minister for Information Technology represent Government policy, or were they just remarks of a Minister who wants to show himself to be a stupid clown?

Mr. MacGregor: I think that what people want are realistic and prudent public spending programmes, with the right priorities and value for every pound that is spent, and that is what the Government have been delivering. In two of the main areas that were picked out by the hon. Gentleman — education and health — he knows that expenditure per pupil on education has risen substantially in real terms under this Government, whereas it fell by 2 per cent. in real terms under the last Labour Government. Equally, we have devoted particular priority to health, where expenditure in real terms is up by 24 per cent.

Mr. Weetch: Is the Minister aware that the infrastructure in these three sectors is in a very poor state in various parts of the country? May I underline the fact that it is a better policy option to have significant expenditure in these three sectors than to reduce the standard rate of income tax to 25p?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman knows that in housing, for example, where he has particularly in mind the infrastructure, because of the very substantial and welcome switch to the provision of housing in the private sector, and through owner-occupation, we have cut down the amount of money that is involved in new council house building. The renovation programme has been increased substantially, in real terms, under this Government, which was a necessary and sensible priority. The hon. Gentleman will know that there are many people throughout the country who, rightly, strongly believe that the present level of direct taxation on people of average and below average incomes is still too high.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the prime objectives of the Conservative Government in 1979 was to cut both taxation and public expenditure? May I draw his attention to the answer that he gave to me only a few days ago, which proves that public expenditure, in real terms, increased by 11 per cent. in 1984-85, and is forecast to be 8 per cent. above the 1979 level in 1985-86? Is this not proof that the Government have not succeeded in cutting public expenditure? May we have an assurance that they will do so in future?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that my hon. Friend will accept that, rather like steering an oil tanker, it takes a considerable time, once one has tried to change direction, for the results to show through. I am sure he will welcome the fact that, as a proportion of our gross national product, public expenditure is now at the 1978-79 level and is planned to come back almost to the levels of the 1960s.

Mr. McCrindle: Taking a slightly different point of view from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), will my right hon. Friend accept that many of us welcome indications that desirable increases in the level of spending on health, housing and education may now be becoming progressively acceptable to the Government? Will he also accept that those who take that view in no way wish the Government to turn their back on tax cuts, but merely seek a desirable balance, in the belief that that is the wish of the majority of the population?

Mr. MacGregor: I believe that a desirable balance is what this Government have been achieving. We have managed to achieve reductions in direct taxation and to obtain higher real spending in the priority areas which we have chosen, which accord with those of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister try to keep in step with the Prime Minister? She has observed that in recent years Britain has moved toward private affluence and public squalor, illustrated by the litter-strewn conditions of most parts of Britain.

Mr. MacGregor: When the Prime Minister drew attention to the fact that there was too much litter around she was drawing attention to a phenomenon that has been common in Britain for many years. Many people share her view about the desirability of cleaning up areas to which she drew attention.

Mr. Galley: In view of my right hon. Friend's comments about balance, he may be able to accept that there are some sound arguments for very modest and carefully targeted increases in expenditure on hospitals, education and housing improvements. I say modest and carefully targeted. If he is able to accommodate any small increases in this year's public expenditure review, what will he do to ensure value for money and prevent additional resources going down the plughole of waste and rising pay, and ensure that they are used to provide better patient care, better educational standards and better housing stock?

Mr. MacGregor: In earlier exchanges I outlined my priorities for getting better value for money for every £1 spent. That applies just as much to the Health Service as elsewhere. This year, as a result of value-for-money drives, we expect to devote about £150 million of extra funds to patient care. I can assure my hon. Friend that value for money will continue to be an important part of my attitude towards public expenditure. He also spoke about the danger to public expenditure of excess pay, meaning that that could lead to reductions in service or reductions in capital programmes. That is a message that we shall constantly have to drive home. If too much of the planned public spending total goes away in excess pay, less money is available for other services.

Mr. Terry Davis: Is the Chief Secretary aware that his answers will bring no comfort to all the people who, while they are waiting for operations, see hospital wards being closed, and that they will being no comfort to teachers, parents, students and everyone else anxious about education? They will bring no comfort to all the people who are desperately trying to find somewhere to live, or are living in totally unsuitable accommodation. Will he now admit once and for all that it is possible to spend more money in ways that will not only improve those essential services for the benefit of the community as a whole, but will provide some jobs for some of the people who are unemployed?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman ought to be aware that, because of the priorities we have given to things like this, the waiting lists are down considerably compared to what they were when we came to power. The number of patients being treated is up considerably, by about 19 per cent. Considerable extra effort is going into the Health Service and the same applies to education. The hon. Gentleman drew attention to students. There are now 80,000 more students in higher education than there were seven years ago.

Mr. Dorrell: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that for the large majority of our people provision for health and education comes exclusively from the public sector? We on the Government side want to see health provision and education improved for all the people, and is it not a necessary consequence of that that we want to see efficient public expenditure improved in those areas?

Mr. MacGregor: I should have thought it was clear that the drive that we are making, especially in the Health Service, to get greater efficiency in public expenditure is being taken very much with that in mind.

Mr. Kennedy: When the Minister is reviewing the Government's public expenditure on the Health Service, will he take the opportunity this year to do something about the fraudulent mechanics by which the rate of inflation that is applied internally in the Health Service is not the rate of inflation that the Government use as a means of calculating the real level of their expenditure on the Health Service? The Government use RPI, but everyone knows that the internal Health Service inflation costs are significantly higher than that.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman may not recall the period in the 1970s when public expenditure was getting out of control. One reason for that was that it was always planned in volume terms. Planning in cash terms and using the GDP deflator as an indicator is an important ingredient of proper public expenditure control.

Contingency Reserve

12. Sir David Price asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in his review of public expenditure, he will consider the establishment of uncommitted contingency reserves in the major spending Departments which would be available to those Departments to meet unforeseen demands arising during the financial year in question; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): The purpose of the Reserve is to meet unforeseen demands arising during the year, for all spending Departments.

Sir David Price: Given my hon. Friend's defence of contingency reserves as a whole, why cannot the large spenders, who cannot be assumed to be more accurate than the Treasury, be allowed a contingency reserve, which is what one does in every large company, down to the smallest standards of budgets?

Mr. Brooke: As it is impossible to foresee on which programmes unforeseen demands on the Reserve will arise in the course of the year, the Reserve has to be central and not split among Departments. Specific departmental reserves would be unnecessary and inefficient.

Mr. Soames: If my hon. Friend were to permit such a contingency reserve at the Ministry of Defence, will he stipulate that not one penny of that money should go to that sink of profligacy, the Procurement Executive, whose incompetence and mismanagement have led to an appalling waste of money on Nimrod and the torpedo programme?

Mr. Brooke: As, on behalf of my right hon. Friend, I have no intention of assigning such a contingency reserve to an individual Department, the question is hypothetical.

Exchange Rate

13. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for producing greater stability in the exchange rate.

Mr. Lawson: Since the Plaza agreement last year there has been a much greater readiness among the major powers to engage in concerted intervention as the need arises.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Chancellor aware that a consistently voiced frustration in British industry concerns both the problems of exporting into Europe, because of the capriciousness of the exchange rates within Europe, and the difficulties in developing a united European ability to compete against the Americans, again because the exchange rate within Europe is subject to fluctuations? When will he fix the point at which it is feasible and beneficial to join the European monetary system?

Mr. Lawson: I agree that fluctuations in the exchange rate, despite the ability to secure forward cover in most cases, can be irksome for British exporters. I am also glad to say that British exporters have been increasing their share of world markets over the past five years, for the first time in a long time. However, if British exporters took a firmer grip on their pay costs, as I said earlier, their success in export markets would be even greater than it has been.

Mr. Forman: I do not wish to repeat familiar Conservative arguments in favour of joining the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS at an early date, but does my right hon. Friend agree that, in any case, stability in interests rates and exchange rates would be greatly helped if there were further convergence in our national inflation rates and if every effort were bent to that end?

Mr. Lawson: I agree with my hon. Friend, and there is now a much greater convergence of inflation rates, not least because we have succeeded in getting our inflation rate down so dramatically. As for the EMS, even if we were to join it — there are undoubtedly arguments for doing so — that would not affect fluctuations against the dollar, and it is the dollar that has been far and away the most volatile of the major currencies.

Mr. Latham: As the exchange rate has been so stable recently, and as inflation is under 3 per cent., what is preventing a further fall in the general level of interest rates, which would do so much good to help the Government's counter-inflation policy?

Mr. Lawson: I know that my hon. Friend will welcome the fact that, in the three months since the Budget, interest rates have already fallen by 2½ per cent.

Public Expenditure

14. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has further plans to reduce public expenditure.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Mr. Hamilton: As the Minister has been at pains in the course of that answer to talk about the great successes of the Health Service financial provision, how does he explain the report in the Daily Telegraph today that the Secretary of State for Social Services is putting in for a £1·7 billion increase in the Health Service provision? Is that designed to build on success, or to cover up failure?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Member will know that it is a regular feature at this time of year for commentators to speculate and to throw out all sorts of guess figures into the air in the hope that one will eventually come down. I shall not comment on speculation in the press.

Mr. Leigh: What would be the effect on the unemployment trap if failure to curb public spending prevented my right hon. Friend from making significant tax cuts for the lower paid? Does this question not underline the need to achieve real value for money in the public service and not to pretend to the people that merely pouring increasing amounts of taxpayers' money into the bottomless pit of public spending will solve our problems?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is right. He is also right to concentrate on value for money. One of the messages that we have to get over to many who comment in the media, and also to the public at large, is that we cannot achieve better services solely by throwing more money at the problems. Better value for money and concentration on greater efficiency can do just as much. That is why in the road programme, for example, we are getting 20 per cent. more roads for every pound spent than in 1979.

Mr. Madden: What does the Chief Secretary say to people like the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who earlier this week told us that his constituents would rather do without tax cuts if the price of tax cuts meant that less money would be spent on the National Health Service? Does the Chief Secretary think that the right hon. Gentleman is misreporting the views of his constituents, or does he think that those constituents are misguided?

Mr. MacGregor: I have already indicated that we have not reduced expenditure on the Health Service — quite the reverse. There has been a substantial increase in expenditure on the Health Service. Under the RAWP formula, introduced by a Labour Government, there is a provision to switch some resources from areas of high resource to areas that have been under-resourced under that formula over the years. That formula is now under review. It is one of the factors that is important. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very difficult to hear questions against the background of chat.

Dr. McDonald: Does the Chief Secretary agree with the Leader of the House, the Home Secretary and the Minister for Information Technology that priority should be given to public spending rather than to tax cuts?

Mr. MacGregor: I should have thought that on the Government side of the House we were all agreed that reducing the burden of taxation is an important priority. Clearly none of us would ever contemplate moving to the ridiculous levels of higher public spending that the hon. Lady and her colleagues advocate.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that because of political pressure from the public the reality is that it is impossible to reduce public expenditure and that we can pay for the many programmes that we wish for only by having genuine economic growth?

Mr. MacGregor: It is through genuine economic growth, which we have been achieving since 1981, that we can increase in real terms our public spending programmes in many areas under our existing plans and at the same time keep public expenditure level in real terms and reducing as a proportion of GDP.

Economic Recovery

16. Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the criteria by which he judges signs of economic recovery.

Mr. Lawson: Since the trough of the recession in the first half of 1981 total output has risen by 13 per cent., investment by over 21 per cent. and manufacturing productivity by over 25 per cent.

Mr. Knox: When does my right hon. Friend think that his economic policies will be so successful that unemployment will start to fall?

Mr. Lawson: As my hon. Friend will be aware, the problem of unemployment is intimately connected with the excessive level of pay increases in relation to productivity. If unit labour costs continue to rise at their present rate, far faster than in the countries of our major overseas competitors, it makes it difficult to get unemployment down, despite the fact that we have succeeded in generating nearly 1 million new jobs since the last general election — a fact to which I would have hoped that my hon. Friend would pay due tribute.

Mr. Pike: Will the Chancellor accept that while he may claim that output and productivity in manufacturing industry has increased since the depth of the trough of the recession, it is still below the figure for 1979? Surely the Government will not be able to claim credit until we are making more manufactured goods than we were in 1979, and until we have considerably reduced the present unacceptable level of unemployment.

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong. Manufacturing productivity is substantially higher today than it was in 1979. What is more, the rise in manufacturing productivity under the Government has been substantially greater than it was under the Labour Government.

Personal Equity Plans

17. Mr. Wood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the proposed personal equity plans.

Mr. Norman Lamont: A large number have welcomed the scheme.

Mr. Wood: Many of us welcome the moves that the Government have made to encourage small private investment. However, there have been comments from some investment funds that they would like to see personal equity plans geared to them as well as to direct investment. What are the Government's views on those representations?

Mr. Lamont: Obviously we shall consider the representations carefully. As I am sure my hon. Friend knows, we have said that for unit and investment trusts some investment will be permitted under the scheme. The precise limit is being looked at.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 June.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I also attended a memorial meeting for the late Lord Shinwell. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Boyes: Has the Prime Minister noted carefully that yesterday the United States House of Representatives supported the imposition of the strictest possible sanctions against the evil and repugnant apartheid regime in South Africa, and that that reflects the worldwide revulsion over what is happening in South Africa? Is it not shameful that the only two leaders sending signals of support to the evil regime in South Africa are President Reagan and herself?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is not correct. The European Council of Heads of Government will meet in Europe next week and will decide what further measures to take.

Mr. Jim Spicer: My right hon. Friend knows that her Government have rigorously enforced the mandatory sanctions on the sale of arms to South Africa. Can she assure the House that every other country has done so in exactly the same way and at the same level?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. We have rigorously enforced mandatory sanctions on arms to South Africa. Nevertheless, South Africa does not seem to be short of certain things, which seems to confirm what my hon. Friend has said. That shows the difficulties of a course of mandatory economic sanctions.

Mr. Kinnock: The right hon. Lady says repeatedly that she wants negotiations and the suspension of violence in South Africa, which we would all like. The South African Government's response to her attitude is to deride negotiations, to undertake armed attacks on Botswana, Zimbabwe, Zambia and Angola, and to impose totalitarian controls on the press and public of the Republic of South Africa. Faced with those realities, is not the Prime Minister's vetoing of sanctions not so much caution or concern as supine appeasement of the apartheid regime? P. W. Botha is making use of the right hon. Lady. When will she stop that?

The Prime Minister: The question is whether adding economic sanctions, with the severe unemployment it would bring to South Africa — adding poverty and unemployment to an already difficult situation — the unemployment it would bring here, and the damage it would do to our shipping, would help the position in South Africa. I doubt very much whether it would. I think that it would aggravate it. It would mean that negotiations would not be brought about. I am still concerned that negotiations should be brought about. Like the right hon. Gentleman, I have totally condemned the raids. I believe that they were responsible for stopping the success of the Eminent Persons Group.

Mr. Kinnock: If the right hon. Lady is concerned about employment, here or in South Africa, she had better calculate the effect of what the Eminent Persons Group called the "descent into further violence". Sanctions may cost jobs, but the collapse that will come without effective pressure on the South African Government will cost a great many more jobs both here and in South Africa. Will not the right hon. Lady accept that her present attitude amounts to doing nothing? Will she remind herself that all that is required for the triumph of evil is that the good people do nothing?

The Prime Minister: Many of us think that it is quite possible imposing strong mandatory economic sanctions on South Africa would add to the violence, and not detract from it, and would end all possibility of negotiations between the Government and the black people of South Africa, which is still our objective. The right hon. Gentleman speaks as though this Government had done nothing. I do not think that he will find another industrialised Western country that has done more—an embargo on exports of arms, refusal to co-operate in the military sphere, recall of military attachés, discouraging scientific events, except where those contribute to the ending of apartheid, cessation of oil exports to South Africa, prohibition of all new collaboration in the nuclear sector, cessation of exports of sensitive equipment to the police, banning all new Government loans, a commitment to take unilateral action on the banning of imports of Krugerrands action that was taken end of Government funding for trade missions and banning the import of all gold coins from South Africa. Would the right hon. Gentleman like to name a Western industrialised country that has done more?

Mr. Kinnock: Mr. Speaker — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I will answer. There is no other country in the world that ha: a greater and closer relationship or a greater and closer responsibility than this country. A few months ago the Prime Minister was describing all that as a "teeny little bit." Will the right hon. Lady now do the effective thing and ban new investment in South Africa?

The Prime Minister: Tell me a Western industrialised country that has done more. The right hon. Gentleman cannot.

Dr. Hampson: Does my right hon. Friend recall that, when she was Secretary of State for Education and Science, in her White Paper "Education: A Framework for Expansion" she urged the need for more part-time students? Is that not now very much the essence of our industrial future, in that we need more people to update their qualifications and retrain? Is there any need to wait for a loans scheme to give those people an incentive, because currently they pay both their maintenance costs and their fees?

The Prime Minister: Retraining, and therefore perhaps returning to university or to other advanced education colleges for further training, will be an important part of our future. Frequently, training takes place through industry itself or through industry sponsoring the requisite courses. I think that that is one of the best ways.

Q2. Mr. Haynes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Haynes: Do the Prime Minister and her Government represent the people of this nation? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I should like the right hon. Lady to answer, bearing in mind that a recent opinion poll found that more than 50 per cent. of the people wanted her to take action against South Africa by way of sanctions. If the answer is no to sanctions, is it because of the financial interests of Conservative Back Benchers in their investments in South Africa? We want to know about that.

The Prime Minister: Yes, the Government do represent the people of this country. If we do not dash into full economic sanctions, as the Opposition would wish, it is because we agree with the reason that the Labour Government gave in the United Nations when they voted against full mandatory economic sanctions. At that time they said:

"because we do not agree that the far-reaching economic measures which the resolution calls for would produce the changes in South Africa which we would all like to see."—[Official Report, 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 9.]

We would endorse that sentiment.

Mr. Spencer: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the inner city initiative in Highfields in my constituency, which is much welcomed by the people who live there, will press ahead notwithstanding the childish hostility of Leicester city council?

The Prime Minister: We believe that the inner cities initiative was widely welcomed. I assure my hon. and learned Friend that we shall press ahead with it in the city he represents.

Dr. Owen: Since Canada, Holland and the Scandinavian countries have all done more than this country against South Africa, and since, if the Prime Minister is not careful, the United States Senate will pass a modified Bill following the lead of the House of Representatives and the Prime Minister will again, as last summer, have to follow in the wake of President Reagan, would it not be better for her to adopt a more conciliatory approach and put forward constructive proposals which she could support and which other countries ought to be forced to support as well?

The Prime Minister: I deliberatly said major "Western industrialised country". No other has done more. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he, too, is against trade sanctions and has made his position clear in the articles he has written.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a typical headmaster and board of governors in my constituency would have discretion over a mere £4,000 out of their total budget? Will she have talks with our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to see whether a system can be instituted that would more fairly reflect the number of pupils in the school and give responsibility locally to the headmaster and the board of governors?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. That is a possible reform of education expenditure. My right hon. Friend is prepared to consider any reform that will make the money spent on education more effective and produce better results for the pupils.

Q3. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brown: Will the Prime Minister take particular note of the early-day motion tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), because he expresses fears about the operation of the Torness power station, remembering that Lothian and the Borders fire board has also criticised safety measures at that station? Will she join the Edinburgh Evening News and the people of east Scotland in opposing the commissioning of that station—or have the lessons of Chernobyl been forgotten in this country?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is perfectly well aware, the commissioning of the station will depend upon its passing the very rigorous tests of the nuclear inspectorate, which are very rigorous indeed. As the hon. Gentleman knows, our safety record in the nuclear industry is excellent. It is not long ago since some hon. Members in Scotland were preferring the AGR kind of reactor and extolling its virtues over others.

Mr. Porter: Will my right hon. Friend take note of the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the Liberal party, who I understand is on a nuclear-freeze bus today——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not the Prime Minister's responsibility.

Mr. Porter: Will my right hon. Friend also take note of the presence of the leader of the Social Democratic ——

Mr. Speaker: Get it in order please.

Q4. Mr. Redmond asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Redmond: Will the Prime Minister explain to the House her dual standards on South Africa?

The Prime Minister: I have said that we totally and utterly condemn the system of apartheid and that we condemn the raids, but, like the Labour party when it was in power, we do not agree that the far-reaching economic measures that mandatory overall sanctions would call for would produce the changes in South Africa that we would all like to see. In the end, we shall have to come to negotiations between the Government of South Africa and the black people of South Africa. That is our purpose and we shall strain every sinew to that end.

Mr. Churchill: While condemning the inhuman system of apartheid, will my right hon. Friend make it clear that it cannot be any part of our policy to take steps that would encourage a process leading to bloody revolution in South Africa, but, that on the contrary, it is our policy to redouble our efforts to encourage peaceful evolution there?

The Prime Minister: That is precisely our policy, but the extent of economic sanctions being called for in some parts of the House would add poverty and unemployment to violence and that would increase the violence and make matters a great deal worse, not only for the people of South Africa, but for the front-line states and other countries beyond those in Africa.

Q5. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hamilton: To get back to the home front, will the Prime Minister reflect for a moment on the plight of thousands of young people who have completed their youth training scheme and now find themselves on the scrap heap? Is she aware that most of those people, particularly in my constituency, have now lost faith in her and in her Government? For God's sake, will she reconsider the position and adopt an attitude that will change her policy, get these young people back to work and give them hope for the future?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, many, many young people on the youth training scheme benefit from it, go on to jobs and find it easier to get jobs because they have taken the youth training scheme. He will also be aware that the number of jobs in Scotland has increased by 50,000 since 1983 and that there have been 15,000 new companies since 1979. That is going the right way to get new jobs for young people and for those who have been on the unemployment register for some time.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my right hon. Friend, as First Lord of the Treasury, take personally a close look at the financing of the first year of the GCSE, which involves an investment in schools which is not proportionate to the number of children taking the examination? Thereafter it will be, but in the first year an expenditure is needed for which no provision has yet been made and without which the future prospects of the first year's intake of those taking the GCSE will be sacrificed.

The Prime Minister: It is inevitable that we have different arrangements for the first year, because it takes some years to work up to the time when that examination is taken, which, I think, first comes in 1988. However, I shall look at the particular point my hon. Friend raises.

Mr. Adley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed that the first 13 questions on the Order Paper to the Prime Minister today are all from Labour Members. From inquiries that I have made, with great discretion, I understand that the Labour party, and, indeed, the Liberal party, are operating some sort of cabal, which would never be considered by Conservative Members. Will you please ensure that if bunches of questions are put in by one hon. Member on behalf of others, they are given a particularly good shuffle?

Mr. Speaker: Order. As the hon. Gentleman has raised that question, he perhaps should know that only 30 Conservative Members put in questions to the Prime Minister today. The more Members who go in for the ballot the better chance of success.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In order that we can be absolutely clear as to why it is that only 30 Tory Members managed to get their questions down today, you should reflect on the fact that it is Royal Ascot week and it is Gold Cup day today.

Business of the House

3.34 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Another Labour question. May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 23 JUNE—Opposition Day (11th Allotted Day) (2nd part). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate entitled "The privatisation of the water authorities". The debate will arise on a motion in the names of the leaders of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties.

Second Reading of the Rate Support Grants Bill.

Motion on the Lord Chancellor's Salary Order

Motions on the Representation of the People Regulations, the Representation of the People (Scotland) Regulations and the Representation of the People (Northern Ireland) Regulations.

TUESDAY 24 JUNE—Estimates Day (2nd Allotted Day). There will be a debate on Estimates relating to special employment measures and the long-term unemployed and the Manpower Services Commission corporate plan 1986-1990. Afterwards there will be a debate on estimates relating to the Department of the Environment and the Property Services Agency. Details of the Estimates concerned will be given in the Official Report.

Remaining stages of the Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill [Lords] and the Land Registration Bill [Lords]

WEDNESDAY 25 JUNE—Opposition Day (17th Allotted Day), until about seven o'clock there will be a debate entitled "The withdrawal of mortgage interest payment protection for the unemployed". Afterwards there will be a debate entitled "Higher and continuing education". Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

Motion relating to the Firearms (Variation of Fees) Order.

THURSDAY 26 JUNE AND FRIDAY 27 JUNE—Completion of the Committee stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

MONDAY 30 JUNE—Debate on a motion to approve the statement on the Defence Estimates 1986 (Cmnd. 9673) (1st Day).

[Estimates to be debated on Tuesday 24 June 1986:

1. Class VII, vote 3 (Department of Employment: Administration) so far as it concerns special employment measures and the long-term unemployed, and the Manpower Services Commission's corporate plan, 1986-90; and

2. Class IX (Department of the Environment: Housing); class X (Department of the Environment: Other Environmental Services); class XX, vote 18 ("Civil Accommodation, the Property Services Agency of the Department of the Environment"); and that debate on the Estimates. class VII be concluded not later than three hours after its commencement.]

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. May I first tell him that it is completely unsatisfactory that the Government put the Second Reading of the Rate Support Grants Bill on after 7 pm on Monday? That Bill is yet another attempt by the Government to interfere with the judicial process. Will the Leader of the House at least see that it is taken as first business on another day of the week?

This week's attempt by the Secretary of State for Defence to slip through the announcement about the delay in privatising the royal ordnance factories was, to say the least, clumsy. Since the Secretary of State yesterday gave a thoroughly unsatisfactory answer to the private notice question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), will the Leader of the House now ensure that we have a full-scale debate in Government time so that the House can fully probe the policy, or lack of policy, which is doing so much damage to confidence and to the future of the ROFs?

I see that the Government are now in such a complete muddle with their business that progress on the remaining stages of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill is to be taken on Friday as well as on Thursday. That is really not satisfactory for legislation that has such serious constitutional implications for this country's relations with the Community; will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that Third Reading will be taken separately, so that hon. Members on both sides of the House can fully contest the dangerous provisions of the Bill, which will result in a loss of powers by this Parliament if that legislation is ever enacted?

My colleagues and I decided on a debate on higher education in Opposition time before we knew of the Government's latest foolish decision again to consider introducing student loans. In view of the interest in, and anxiety about, this matter among today's parents and pupils, will the Government give us some of their time so that we can have a more extended debate on that issue?

Finally, last week the Leader of the House conceded a restitution of private Members' time after the truth had come out about the shoddy manoeuvres which led to the loss of business on 6 June. When will that time be reinstated?

Mr. Biffen: I shall respond to the right hon. Gentleman's questions in order. I understand the importance that he and, I believe, the House attach to the Second Reading of the Rate Support Grants Bill. However, provided that the Ten o'clock rule is suspended, we may be able to make progress in that context instead of making it the first order of business elsewhere.

I was in my place yesterday and heard the reply that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence gave to the private notice question on the royal ordnance factories. I must say that I thought that it was a very persuasive and convincing reply. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman seems interested in the possibility of a further debate on that matter. I can say only that perhaps that is the sort of issue that could profitably be considered through the usual channels.

I again acknowledge the constitutional importance of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. I am happy to confirm that Third Reading will be taken separately from the debates planned for Thursday and Friday of next week.

We shall of course look at the possibility of extending the scope and time of the debate on education, but that will have to be considered through the usual channels. However, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will feel that he has shown great prescience in choosing that topic, which has been given added authority by the announcement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. I thus hope that the right hon.

Gentleman does not feel too discomfited by it. I am sure that, as the debate proceeds, we will welcome that as a prelude to a general election.

Finally, the right hon. Gentleman made a point about the restoration of private Members' time. That is something that we will reasonably consider through the usual channels.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the grave concern from both sides of the House about certain aspects of the defence procurement programme? While I acknowledge that there will be an important debate on the Defence Estimates, will he try to arrange a special day for the House to debate some of the unearthed scandals that lie in that Department?

Mr. Biffen: I heard my hon. Friend's most formidable contribution during Treasury questions earlier this afternoon. That leads me to believe that he is capable of delivering a well-guided missile in the debate on the Defence Estimates. I advise him to take his chance in that debate and I am sure that his contribution will be regarded with much interest.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Why has there not been a statement this afternoon on the publication of the recommendations of the Widdicombe inquiry? In view of the anxiety on both sides of the House, will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate on the future of the telecommunications industry, taking into account the merger bid by GEC and Plessey?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. The Liberal party and its associates have a debate next week and could have chosen a number of topics. However, I will not take the small-minded point of political argument and suggest that they have been unwise in their choice. We all understand their difficulties and we try to be charitable on a Thursday afternoon.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's point about the Widdicombe report, he would be the first to understand that a constant balancing act is involved to decide what matters shall be the subject of oral statements in the House, as that has a detrimental consequence for other subjects in which hon. Members wish to participate in the prime time of the week. I note his interest in the matter but I cannot offer any prospect of an oral statement on that subject.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Many of my Conservative colleagues noticed with much interest the announcement made an hour or two ago by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that she is setting up another eminent persons group from within the Cabinet to ensure that the next Government are a Conservative Government and to look ahead to the general election. Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House use his influence to arrange for that small group to send for papers and people —and for those of us who will not be in the House after the next election but whose experience in the past might help to get common sense into these discussions in the search for votes.

Mr. Biffen: As my hon. Friend has said, a most formidable election-winning combination was announced earlier this afternoon. I understand that he would wish the team to have its skills and experience augmented by departing friends. I will certainly look into that matter.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Has the Leader of the House seen the 12 early-day motions that I tabled this week? They are early-day motions 956 to 960 and 966 to 972.

[That this House condemns the arrests of 3,000 youths and workers, including key trade union leaders, in South Africa under the State of Emergency declared on 12th June; believes that this attack, the worst on the unions in 20 years, constitutes an attempt by the Botha Government to set the clock back by halting the development, in particular of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) which led a strike of 1½ million workers on May Day and played a key rôle in organising an even bigger stoppage on 16th June in support of the demands of black youth for non-racial education, and to end the ban on the Congress of South African Students, for democratic rights, and to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the Soweto massacre in 1976; recognises that the state of emergency, and the failure of Her Majesty's Goverment to take any concrete action to oppose the Botha Government's repression, shows that British, South African and international big business are at one in their desire to crush the movement of workers and youth in South Africa, so as to protect capitalism and the profits derived from the apartheid cheap-labour system; and supports the working class movement imposing its own sanctions, through industrial action, to suspend trade with South Africa until the state of emergency is lifted and all detainees are released.]

[That this House condemns the state crackdown of the South African state of emergency of 12th June, including the biggest assault on the democratic trade unions in that country for 20 years, as the bankrupt response of the apartheid regime to the call by the COSATU, the youth organisations, and the United Democratic Front, for a one-day national general strike to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the Soweto massacre; and calls for the release of: J. Vilane, Vice-President, Metal and Allied Workers' Union (MAWU), W. Mchunu, Northern Natal Branch Secretary, (MAWU), J. [That this House congratulates the millions of black workers who on 16th June participated in the biggest national strike in South Africa's history; condemns the state crackdown on 12th June as the most serious assault on the democratic trade unions for 20 years; and calls for the immediate release of key members of the Council of Unions of South Africa, (membership 150,000) including: Prioshaw Camay, general secretary, James Mdaweni, president, Mahlomola Skosana, assistant general secretary, Dale Tifflin, head of women's unit, Joyce Sebe, regional organiser, and all other detainees.]

[That this House condemns the state of emergency declared on 12th June in South Africa and the arrest of 3,000 youths and workers including key trade union leaders; and calls for the release of D. [That this House condemns the arrest of 3,000 youths and workers, under the 12th June state of emergency, where the entire national and regional leadership of the Congress of South African Trade Unions is either in the hands of the notorious security police or in hiding from them; and calls for the immediate release of: H. Marawu (TGW organiser, Cape Town); Paul Nkuna (Regional Chairman, National Union of Mineworkers, Transvaal); J. Phatae (NUM organiser, Orange Free State); V. Motsamai (shop steward, South African Chemical Workers' Union), K. Dau (National Union of Textile Workers), A. Naythi (shop steward, National Union of Textile Workers, Harrismith), Elisabeth Erasmus (textile worker) and all other detainees.]

[That this House condemns the arrests, on Sunday 15th June in South Africa, of: Soloman Mauna (MAWU shop steward, Bosch, Pretoria), Abnas Tilane (MAWU shop steward, Bosch, Pretoria), Mike Mabuyakhulu (MAWU, Northern Natal), Blakey Mtshali (MAWU organiser) and Joseph Miya (MAWU shop steward) as part of the attempts of the Botha Government to behead the leadership of the democratic South Africa trades union; and calls for their immediate release, together with all other 3,000 detainees arrested under the state of emergency.]

[That this House condemns the raids by the South African Security police, operating under the 12th June state of emergency, on the morning of 17th June on the headquarters of the Congress of South African Trades Unions in Johannesburg, and its offices in Port Elizabeth, Jermiston, Durban and Pinetown and on the headquarters of the National Union of Mineworkers in Johannesburgh; and calls for the immediate release of all those detained.]

These early-day motions detail the 88 key trade union leaders — so far confirmed from sources within and without South Africa—to be arrested over the weekend through raids on the headquarters of the trade union federations and the NUM on Tuesday morning. What further statements will come from the Government in response to these attacks? Will those statements contain an explanation of why the Prime Minister is prepared to become an international pariah in her support for apartheid and explain that that has nothing to do with the so-called threat to the 120,000 jobs in Britain when she has sacked 2 million in the past two years, but everything to do with the £12,000 million worth of investments from British companies – many of the directors of which sit on the Conservative Benches – which get their profits from the cheap-labour apartheid system?

Mr. Biffen: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be too dismissive of the consequences for employment in this country of future actions in the South African context. In answer to his specific question, he will appreciate that there was a debate on South Africa this week. In those circumstances the best thing that I can do is to refer his points to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Would not another way of dealing with the real concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) about defence spending be not only in the debate next Monday, but if we debated the reports of the Public Accounts Committee and the Treasury minutes in response to them? May I say that those debates are long overdue?

Mr. Biffen: I take the point that my hon. Friend makes. I hope to announce arrangements in the reasonably near future for a debate of the Public Accounts Committee reports.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): Will the Leader of the House explain on what authority the Prime Minister, when addressing the House, speaks on behalf of the enslaved people of South Africa? Having been told, as we were by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, that the Government were in close contact with the African National Congress, would it not be better if the Prime Minister endeavoured to speak on its behalf rather than on behalf of its enemies?

Mr. Biffen: The language chosen by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the policy implications are wholly laudable and understandable. In this difficult position, it is perfectly honourable for hon. Members, in the prosecution of British national policy, to explain that it is also in the interests of those whom they seek to aid in South Africa.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Will my right hon. Friend initiate, through the usual channels, an urgent discussion on hon. Members' interests and how they affect the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill? I am sure that he will agree that it is vital that that Select Committee should consist of hon. Members who are above all suspicion or criticism of bias.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that an unhappy situation may be about to arise as a result of the proposed inclusion in the membership of the Committee of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape)? I gave the hon. Gentleman notice that I was going to raise this question. I should like to say at the outset that no criticism of the hon. Gentleman arises. A point of principle is at stake. The Leader of the House may not be aware that the hon. Gentleman has properly declared his interests, which are that he is a member of the National Union of Railwaymen, and is sponsored by that union. It has great interests of its own, which are affected by the Bill. Secondly, he is the joint chairman of the all-party Channel tunnel group, which has been funded and provided with travel services by the Eurotunnel consortium. Those facts have been properly registered.

My question is this. Will my right hon. Friend have discussions to see, on a point of principle, whether any hon. Member so closely linked with the Eurotunnel consortium should sit on a Select Committee that will hear petitions or points on amendments sought to the Bill, which are likely to be the opposite of the interests of the Eurotunnel consortium?

Mr. Biffen: I have no wish to play down the scope and omniscience of wisdom of the usual channels, but, frankly, I do not believe that the question that has been raised is appropriate for them. I have no doubt that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) will act in this matter as he has acted in all parliamentary matters, with total propriety. If there are any questions about the membership of those Committees, they should be directed to the Chair.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, I note what the Leader of the House said in response to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, that there would be further time for the Third Reading of the Bill, but in view of the constitutional importance of the measure, which undoubtedly will lead to the further dimunition of the powers of this Parliament and to the enhancement of the powers of the European institutions, does he really think that it is right for that Bill to be pushed through to completion of all its stages other than Third Reading in a single day plus a Friday at the end of next week?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in the one-day debate earlier this week, only one group of amendments was taken, on a matter which, although of some importance, was by no means the heart of the matter raised by the Bill? Is he further aware that the other amendments, of which there are at least another seven groups, raised matters of the utmost importance to the economic, social and constitutional position of this country and, indeed, of successive Governments in it? Will the Leader of the House think again about the time available for the Committee stage of that most important Bill?

Mr. Biffen: Of course I do not deny, in any sense, the significance of the Bill. Although the size of the Bill is modest, its implications are wide-ranging. It will be a doubtful day when the House accepts that, somehow or other, Friday is a second-class day in our affairs.

Mr. Shore: It is shorter.

Mr. Biffen: It is a day which is recognised as being available for Government business, and I suggest we see what progress we make.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): May I say, in reply to the point raised by the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken), of which he was kind enough to notify me before this exchange, that I am co-chairman of the organisation to which he referred. I have no personal knowledge of any funds being paid by any member of the Eurotunnel consortium to the all-party Channel tunnel group. I have never made a secret of the fact that I am a member of the NUR. I have made a number of statements, inside and outside the House, in favour of the Eurotunnel scheme.

I have taken advice from the Private Bill Office on the matter. Surely it is the responsibility of the Committee to study the Bill and to take note of the representations made by petitioners but not to debate the principles of the scheme? The hon. Member for Thanet, South has acted properly in this matter, but I find it unpleasant that the campaign which is being waged by the ferry companies should be waged in this personalised way to imply that, because of my oft-expressed views, I am in some way prejudiced against their somewhat partial views.

Mr. Biffen: I have already said that I do not think that this is a matter appropriate for the usual channels, but I have taken note of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Has my right hon. Friend noted that, at the meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee in Edinburgh on 30 June, the Opposition have chosen to debate devolution? Does he find it strange that the Opposition have not found a day out of their time on the Floor of the House to debate the subject? Does my right hon. Friend think that if the Opposition did use a day at Westminster to debate devolution, it would show that the party was split from top to bottom.

Mr. Biffen: It is not for me to offer any fraternal guidance to the Opposition Front Bench about what it chooses to debate and where. I think I speak for everyone on this side of the House when I say that we should love the Labour party to come to the Chamber and announce a reinforced commitment to devolution both for Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is the Leader of the House aware that, on Tuesday, the Minister of State, Department of Transport, announced a most important decision: that the Dornoch firth rail bridge would not be constructed? At the time, the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram), said that he had nothing to add. Since then, he and his colleagues at the Scottish Office, in a frantic effort at press briefing, have issued contradictory statements on whether or not the Government have sought, or are willing to seek, aid for this project from the European Community.

As the statements are contradictory and have been published in a leading Scottish newspaper, will the Leader of the House invite the Secretary of State for Scotland to come to the House to make plain the Government's view of the project's eligibility for aid from the European Community and state whether or not they are prepared to take a longer-term strategic view of the importance of this project for Scotland?

Mr. Biffen: We all understand that this has been a rather fragile week for social democracy. I believe that the hon. Gentleman is being a little unfair — more than a little; being downright unfair — to my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Scottish Office. As I understand it, British Rail has to take an initiatory position on this deal before it can go to the financing authorities to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I will, of course, refer his points to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): When may we have a debate on the duties and responsibilities of civil servants and the need for them to be politically impartial? Is my right hon. Friend aware that a leading civil servant in the Department of Health and Social Security office in Leicester, Tony Church, is a public member of Militant. He is campaigning strongly to get Militant members elected to the Civil and Public Services Association who oppose the views of Alistair Graham. Does my right Friend agree that that is a strange situation? Surely civil servants owe a loyalty to the Crown? How can political office bearers, who do not believe in the Crown or in democracy, be allowed to stand?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has pursued this point with great skill, not only this afternoon but on previous occasions. I like to think that there can be few civil servants in Leicester who do not realise the full significance of the election before them.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Does the Leader of the House recall that, some weeks ago, the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), accused the producers of the BBC "Panorama" programme on ionising regulations called "How Safe is Safe?" of being wrong in every critical respect, and in so doing implicated me in those accusations? Some weeks later the Minister published what he called a briefing to every hon. Member. Since then I have published a point-by-point rebuttal of his briefing which is supported by three globally eminent experts in these affairs, and have sent a copy to the Minister, asking him if he will agree to give it a similar circulation to that of his briefing. Obviously, I would understand if he were unwilling to contribute to his own embarrassment by such action.

Will the Leader of the House undertake to prevail on the Minister to come to the House and make a statement, so that we may question him on these matters and ask him whether he now understands them more readily? Or is the Leader of the House prepared to perpetuate the ministerial obfuscation of these matters?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that that charge could never be brought against my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave). The most profitable way to proceed is probably to see what happens from the mutual correspondence that is taking place, and in the light of that, perhaps, to consider any other action.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Although none of the four Opposition Leeds Members have been present this afternoon, does my right hon. Friend accept that there is grave concern in Leeds about the potential decisions on the royal ordnance factory, and that there is a case for having a debate, so that the appropriate Ministers can come to the House to answer the charge that the bureaucracies of both the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry have, in a sense, conspired to change the decision of the House about how the ROFs could be privatised? Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be a sad day in a city such as Leeds if another tank company could buy a loss-making operation cheaply only to close it? That does no good for jobs in the city or for competitive bidding in the defence industries.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is a fair parliamentarian, and I know that he would be anxious that I should point out that yesterday, when the private notice question was considered in the House——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) was missing.

Dr. Hampson: I was present. I had the first question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Biffen: A number of Leeds Members were present. The points of far greater substance raised by my hon. Friend could be appropriate to the debate on the motion to approve the statement on the Defence Estimates — obviously, subject to the judgment of the Chair. I hope that my hon. Friend will have an opportunity to make his points then.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the Leader of the House consider the claim of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) about adherence to the Crown? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the grave constitutional issues mentioned in relation to the European business for Thursday and Friday raise that point? Is it not the case that the solemn statement on European union at Stuttgart in 1983 is contained in the articles of the Single European Act? Since the European Communities (Amendment) Bill seeks to endorse that treaty, is it not a fact that, if it becomes an Act of Parliament, the British Parliament and the Crown will be subservient to the terms of the said solemn treaty? Will the Leader of the House reflect on that and give greater time for this important Bill?

Mr. Biffen: Nobody doubts the significance of the debates that will take place on Thursday and Friday, and I must point out that those two days provide a reasonable amount of time for the consideration of the issues involved.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Will the Government find time to debate the report published yesterday by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary, Sir Lawrence Byford, in which he blames much of the violence in today's society on a lack of discipline in the home and at school, together with video porn, violence and sadism and television advertising?

Mr. Biffen: I shall most certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to that point.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the report of the Select Committee on Employment, published this week, which makes far-reaching recommendations for the alleviation of long-term unemployment? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this all-party Committee, which has a Conservative majority, made these recommendations after careful consideration and that it is absolutely disgraceful that the Government should turn them down without proper consideration? Is it not time that we had a debate on long-term unemployment, not least because it is growing? In parts of my constituency, unemployment is as high as nearly 40 per cent.

Mr. Biffen: On reflection, the hon. and learned Gentleman may well judge that the Government's reaction was prudent, measured and wholly justified.

Mr. Janner: No, I do not.

Mr. Biffen: I did not expect the hon. and learned Gentleman completely to agree first time round, but I draw his attention to the opportunity that he will have to make a speech about unemployment during the Estimates Day debate on 24 June. If he comes to the House and listens to the Government spokesman, I hope that at the end of his speech he will be convinced.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Leader of the House ask the Minister with responsibility for sport to send a message to the English football supporters in Mexico asking them to show good behaviour and sportsmanship in the game against Argentina next Sunday? Will he also ask him to send a message of good luck to the English team in its bid to win the World Cup?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that there will be unanimity on this high point of political, social, economic and cultural judgment that the House is expressing this afternoon, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising it.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): As the Government are still committed to the reduction of public expenditure, especially to the reduction of benefits for students, pensioners and the working class in general, will the Leader of the House ensure that the appropriate Minister is brought to the House to explain why Andrew and Sarah cannot pay for their royal wedding, because this issue is being discussed up and down the country?

Mr. Biffen: As I understand it, public expenditure is rising. Since, therefore, the hon. Gentleman is so misconceived about the premise, I think that I am disembarrassed from making any comments upon his conclusion.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): First, may I correct the incorrect allegation that was made by the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) a few moments ago, when he said that no other Member of Parliament for Leeds had been in the House this afternoon. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) was not only here but asked Question 13. We have to assume that the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West was not here then — as, indeed, it has to be noted, he is not here now.

I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the fact that 150 hon. Members have signed early-day motion 837, which stands in my name.

[That this House notes the justifiable sense of frustration and anger expressed at the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters' Conference in Bournemouth at the Post Office's use of coercion to force through an inequitable pay award for 1985 for sub-postmasters; calls on the Post Office to recognise that sub-postmasters are the only sector of the Post Office who invest their own money, frequently their life's savings, in order to ensure that the Post Office serves its customers effectively; believes that the Post Office's policy has weakened the tenuous economic viability of many sub-post offices and endangered the network; recognises that sub-postmasters have given loyal and exceptional service to the Post Office and the public, which should be recognised and not taken advantage of; and calls on the Post Office to understand the damage it is doing, to mend its ways and to deal with sub-postmasters more on the basis of co-operation and the force of argument, rather than confrontation and the arguments of force in relation to this crucial component of community life.]

Also, hon. Members from all parties have signed early-day motion, 926, which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam).

[That this House, recognising the valuable role played in the community by sub-postmasters, calls on the Post Office to revise its policy towards sub-postmasters and through co-operation and support so improve their pay and conditions that the economic viability of the sub-post office network will be assured for the future.]

[Mr. Paddy Ashdown]

They express concern about the attitude of the Post Office to the sub-post office network and about the damage that is being done to that essential network. Will the Leader of the House take account of this considerable number of hon. Members from all parties who have expressed their concern and, if at all possible, provide time for a debate on the matter before the summer recess?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman touches upon a point that arouses very deep feelings, particularly in the rural constituencies. I cannot give the undertaking that he seeks, but I shall certainly consider the matter further.

Channel Tunnel (Select Committee)

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I seek your guidance on a point that has arisen out of the exchanges on business questions? I understood my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to say that he did not feel it was a matter for him whether or not there should be any discussion about the fact that an hon. Member who had been co-chairman of a committee funded by a business interest should now be a member of a Select Committee that is listening to petitions which relate to that business interest. I think that my point was clear enough from the exchanges.

I was somewhat surprised by the reply of my right hon. Friend, because his office had guided me earlier by saying that this was likely to be a matter for him rather than a matter for you. However, as I received that reply from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, may I turn to you, Mr. Speaker, and ask this question? Clearly a genuine point of principle about Members' interests and how they should affect membership of Select Committees arises in this instance. To whom may I turn to obtain some kind of ruling in as neutral and friendly a way as possible?

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the House occasionally comes to my rescue, and I very nearly came to his rescue earlier. Since the hon. Gentleman has now raised that point with me, I can tell him that the House has entrusted the nomination of this Committee to the Committee of Selection, and I have no power to interfere. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the rule about the declaration of interests applies in Select Committees as it does in the House.

British Gas

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a completely separate point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask whether you have received a request from the Secretary of State for Energy about making a statement to the House on British Gas? If not, as I assume is the case, may I draw your attention to the penultimate page of the Official Report for 18 June? It contains an 80-line written answer from the Secretary of State for Energy dealing with issues such as the debt and equity position of British Gas and the debt element in its balance sheet, the future of the gas levy when British Gas has been privatised, the price regulatory formula that will be the only defence for the consumer against this private monopoly, and its intentions regarding the holding of shares by British Gas employees. I am sure that you will agree that all these matters merit discussion and questions in the House.

As for the price formula, the Secretary of State said that it was only after careful examination that he had arrived at this particular regulatory formula. As we were unable to debate these matters during proceedings on the Bill, it seems appropriate that, at the very least, we should have an opportunity to question the Secretary of State, now that he has made up his mind. If the Secretary of State has not said that he wishes to make a statement to the House, may I, through you, Mr. Speaker, ask the Leader of the House to ensure that a statement is made as quickly as possible about British Gas?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): We could look at that matter through the usual channels.

BILL PRESENTED

British Council and Commonwealth Institute Superannuation

Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, supported by Mr. Timothy Raison, Mr. Peter Brooke, Mrs. Lynda Chalker and Mr. Tim Eggar, presented a Bill to enable schemes to be made under section 1 of the Superannuation Act 1972 in respect of persons who are serving or have previously served in employment with the British Council or the Commonwealth Institute: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. [Bill 186.]

Northern Ireland Assembly (Dissolution)

4.6 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland Assembly (Dissolution) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

That the draft Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 4th June, be approved.

I understand that it will be for the convenience of the House, Mr. Speaker, if we discuss these two orders together.

Mr. Speaker: Will it be for the convenience of the House to discuss these orders together?

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State appeared to be moving the approval of both orders. I take it that the position is that the two orders may be debated together but that a separate Question will have to be put in due course in regard to the second order.

Mr. Speaker: That is entirely correct, but is it the wish of the House that these two orders be debated together?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. King: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. I confirm my understanding of the point that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) has made.

The draft Northern Ireland Assembly (Dissolution) Order 1986 relates to the dissolution of the existing Assembly. I emphasise "the existing Assembly". This Assembly would in any case reach the end of its normal life on 20 October. I made a statement to the House last week in which I set out our decision on this matter and our proposal to bring forward this order today. In that statement I sought to make clear the background to our decision.

The Assembly effectively has two central functions. The first is to consider and report on how a devolved Northern Ireland Administration could be formed. The second is a scrutiny role in relation to the Northern Ireland departments. For the reasons that we rehearsed last week, it has not been possible to achieve the first of those functions. In respect of the second — the scrutiny function, which started well and which was proving to be a valuable instrument in the administration of the Province — it is interesting to note that, in the case of the recommendations from the various Scrutiny Committees that we established to monitor the work of Northern Ireland departments, the latest information I have is that 75 per cent. of the Committee recommendations have been accepted in respect of draft orders and comments on them.

Unfortunately, that useful work was suspended by the decision of the Members themselves in December and was then formally abandoned in March. The Assembly was charged with two central functions but for some months it has been discharging neither. As long ago as last December I warned that if the Assembly did not discharge its proper functions it would put its continuance at risk. I have since reinforced that warning and did so twice in May. As there was no change in the situation, I subsequently invited the leaders of the main Unionist parties to come and discuss the position of the present Assembly. As the House knows, they refused to do even that.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Is it not the case that all those admirable functions that were performed by Committees of the Northern Ireland Assembly could well be performed by appropriate Committees of this House?

Mr. King: The advantage was that the functions were being performed by people with a more intimate and closer knowledge of circumstances in Northern Ireland. I respect the great knowledge of the Province and the history of the whole of Ireland that my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) has, but I should be very surprised if he were to maintain, or if anyone were to pretend, that hon. Members of this House who do not represent Northern Ireland constituencies could claim to do the detailed scrutiny work as effectively as those whose homes are in the Province.

The leaders of the main Unionist parties were not even prepared to discuss the position with us. I hope that the House will accept that I gave the Unionist leaders in the Assembly every opportunity to resume their proper functions so that the Assembly would be able to continue. I regret to say that it is because of their failure to discharge their proper functions, and obviously because, not least, some quite serious questions could be asked about the application of public funds to a body set up to carry out certain functions under an Act of Parliament when those funds are not being used for that purpose, that the present action is being taken.

I should like to make it clear that the disgraceful and childish antics in which some Members of the Assembly, and especially the members of the DUP, indulged more recently of occupying a telephone exchange and requiring eviction by the Royal Ulster Constabulary did not enter into my considerations. I was concerned solely to see that the Assembly discharged the functions for which it was set up.

If this order were not made, automatically there would be fresh elections to the Assembly after the dissolution on 20 October. The order does not abolish the legal basis for the Assembly. It simply abolishes the present Assembly which, allowing for the normal recess that it might have taken, would have had only about another month or six weeks of normal sitting days.

The order dissolves the present Assembly and leaves open the date of elections to a new Assembly. It is important to make that point because of some of the exaggerated comments by some spokesmen in the Northern Ireland parties. I noted the comments of the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) who complained that all platforms were denied to him. I have described the hon. Member by his proper title. He is a Member of this House, and as such he has access to the most important forum in the United Kingdom. He makes little use of it, and so he cannot say that he is denied the opportunity of expressing in a democratic forum comments on behalf of the people that he represents.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): In the event of the Assembly being reassembled for whatever reasons, and assuming that that came after round-table talks, would the Assembly have to operate as is presently conceived in the legislation, or could the legislation be amended according to what came out of those talks?

Mr. King: I shall say something shortly about how I see the future of the Assembly and the way forward.

I should like to deal with the allegation that somehow the Government are trying to suppress free speech or free comment or democratic expression. When I look at the situation that has developed in the local councils in Northern Ireland, at the situation in the Assembly and at the empty Benches in this House, I note that it is not decisions of the Government that have brought any of those circumstances about. They were brought about by the decisions of people in the Assembly or in the councils or by those who were elected to this Parliament. I regret their refusal to discuss the problems with Ministers. They loudly complain about people's refusal to listen, while at the same time they refuse to talk or to take any part in discussions. The inconsistency of that position will be apparent to all hon. Members.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I recognise that there is a great difference between the situations in Scotland and Northern Ireland, but does the Minister recognise that they seem to have one thing in common? I refer to the Government's attitude to the governing of Scotland and Northern Ireland. The wishes of the representatives of the majority of people in Northern Ireland about the arrangements that are made are not given effect in this House. They wish to have more discussed here. Similarly, the representatives of the majority in Scotland wish to have devolved government and the Government are setting their face against that. Does the Minister not see anything curious about this? Why is he so unresponsive to the views of the majority of elected Members from Scotland and Northern Ireland about the way their countries should be governed?

Mr. King: I cannot deny that I see many things that are curious in both situations. I shall come to the point raised by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) because I want to talk about alternative approaches in different parts of the United Kingdom. The issue that the hon. Gentleman has raised is important.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh) rose——

Mr. King: I should like to complete the point and then I shall give way.

We look forward to the creation of a new Assembly on an acceptable basis, but the charge that the Government sought to bring about the dissolution, or that we have been unreasonable or not willing to talk, simply cannot be sustained. I hope that it is now understood in Northern Ireland that I am more than ready to listen to people's points of view and to talk to anybody who wishes to have discussions about a constructive way forward. I shall say more about that later.

If the dissolution of the Assembly is approved by the House, and that decision is confirmed by the Privy Council, there will then be a period during which I shall be anxious to see that as far as possible we can maintain effective methods of consultation. One of the arrangements that operated in the Assembly was that draft instruments or draft orders were issued for consultation and the Assembly was invited to give its views. I propose to continue the practice of sending to the party leaders in Northern Ireland and to interested hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies in the House any such documents that come forward so that they can continue to be informed about matters. We shall, of course, be willing to receive any of their comments.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Is the Secretary of State aware that before 1982, when the practice that he has just described prevailed, there were frequent consultations between Northern Ireland Members and Ministers? Those often resulted in substantial and desirable modifications of the orders that were eventually brought before the House. There is no reason why that procedure should not be fruitful.

Mr. King: I am grateful to the right hon. Member for South Down for his remarks and I hope that he speaks for others as well as for himself.

Mr. Mallon: I wanted to intervene earlier to ask the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) whether he was enunciating his party's policy when he spoke about majority rule.

Mr. King: It will be a fascinating argument when it starts. I am sure that both the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland will enjoy it.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Could my right hon. Friend address himself to the question that was raised by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), the spokesman for the SDP? Does my right hon. Friend recall the year 1978, when he and I voted in favour of the proposition that, before Scotland and Wales were governed differently from the way in which they had been governed before, there should be a referendum in both countries to test whether that which was acceptable to the House was acceptable to a majority in Scotland and in Wales? Why, if he and I were correct to insist on a referendum then, are we not correct to ask for a referendum in Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend knows the answer before I give it. It is that Northern Ireland is not being governed differently from the way in which it was governed before. I know that my hon. Friend is referring to the Anglo-Irish agreement, and the government of the Province is no different after that agreement. He will recall, as he knows it word for word and I would not presume to tell him anything about it, that the agreement brings no change in the sovereignty of the House and the Government's responsibility for Northern Ireland. That is the essential difference between this case and that about which he was talking.

It was suggested that we should simply not have the Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order at all, and merely allow the order to lapse, and that its non-renewal was a possible course to take. I put that on record, because I know that it is a matter in which many hon. Members have taken a close interest. I leave aside for the moment the political background and implications of such a decision. I hope that it is understood, now that discussions have taken place, that, quite apart from the political considerations, the technical problems would make it impossible simply not to renew the order. That would lead to major problems for the House and to major gaps in the executive authority and powers in the Province, which would severely hamper administration.

Successive Secretaries of State have come to the House seeking the renewal of the order, and each has said that he hoped that this would not have to be repeated much more often. The basis on which we might forgo renewal does not exist, and, on both the technical and practical considerations, it is necessary to invite the House to renew the direct rule powers contained in the order.

The background both to the decision about the dissolution of the Assembly and that about the interim period extension order shows that this is an appropriate time to take stock of the situation in the Province, and for the Government to make clear their views on the best way forward. There has been more intensive debate in the Province in recent months. One of the consequences flowing from the Anglo-Irish agreement is that it has stimulated a more intensive debate in the Province about what the right way forward should be, and, particularly in Unionist circles, a reconsideration of the position and objectives. It is clear that there is no going back, and that this is the best way forward.

I move on to the approaches to the situation in Northern Ireland that are being debated, my impressions of them and the Government's view on them. The approaches are integration, devolution and even independence, all of which have had their advocates in this debate. I shall deal first with integration. The Government do not support, and would not be prepared to suggest, integration as a policy for Northern Ireland. To suggest that there is no difference between Northern Ireland and other parts of the United Kingdom is to ignore completely the background of different histories, traditions, community attitudes and political parties. These differences have evolved over centuries, and cannot simply be discussed as minor variations that can be cast aside in a uniform Westminster package. There are fundamental objections, without even adding to them the massive problems of reconciliation of legislation and the whole issue of local councils and how they can operate in ways that protect their electors from discrimination.

The slogan used now to advocate integration is "equal citizenship". The implication is that different treatment of legislation implies less citizenship. Yet we know — and this is the point to which the hon. Member for Sutherland and Caithness referred — that there are differences in the way in which we handle Scottish and Welsh matters, while all remaining equal citizens under the Crown. Total integration is unacceptable, not only to the Government but to the House, and the vast majority of people in the Province, both Unionist and Nationalist. They wish to see more control over their own affairs exercised within the Province. I make it clear that integration is simply not on.

In saying that, I repeat what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said which was that the Government are certainly willing to look at ways in which Northern Ireland business is handled in the House and to see whether there are ways in which this could be improved. I recognise that there are points to be discussed over the ways in which legislation and other matters are treated. I confirm that we are ready to consider any constructive suggestion. However, I add that this willingness to look at reasonable changes in our present practices should not mislead anyone to believe that this could somehow lead to the state of integration that some hon. Members expound.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): My hon. Friend is right to say that this matter has been discussed in great detail. Will he make clear the Government's position? Is he saying that the acknowledged differences between the various dependent parts of the United Kingdom – that is, the differences between the English and the Welsh, and the English and the Scottish – are differences of degree, but that the differences between the English and the Welsh and the Northern Irish are differences of kind? If he is drawing that distinction, I am afraid that I do not understand it.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend knows that there are differences, whether of degree or of kind – whatever word he chooses, we would need to debate at substantial length. I would not want to mislead my hon. Friend because I am not fully seized of his point. There are different practices, traditions and realities in Northern Ireland. We recognise the differences between the communities and their aspirations, and the different legislation in Norther Ireland. I leave aside one of the key differences – that the major political parties representing in the House every other part of the United Kingdom do not operate within Northern Ireland, as my hon. Friend knows.

Because of the debate that has taken place, I thought it was my responsibility to the House to make clear the Government's position. It would be wrong if encouragement were given to the view that the Government might be prepared to entertain certain alternatives. I hope hon. Members will accept that I have been willing to listen to any points that they wished to make and not to reject them from a doctrinaire point of view. I have been willing to consider ways in which we could help reconcile some of the problems and attitudes. In my statement I have sought to set out what I believe to be possible, but also what I believe is not possible and where I think there is scope to proceed.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): I am sorry that my right hon. Friend has come out so strongly against the possibility of integration. That is his business and he is free to do it. May I correct him on one point? He said that the political parties in this country have not operated in the Province. The Unionist party in the North of Ireland was closely and integrally affiliated with the Conservative party until he and some of his predecessors brought about the present stress.

Mr. King: There is something in what my right hon. Friend says, but he also knows that the background of the traditions and political loyalties in the Province is not the same as the basis of political loyalties in the rest of the United Kingdom. He will accept equally the validity of that point.

Sir John Farr (Harborough) rose——

Mr. King: I do not want to take up too much time because we have other orders to debate. My hon. Friend will accept that I have given way on several occasions.

I want to set out the way in which the Government wish to proceed. The Government want to see devolved government in the Province on a basis that commands widespread acceptance. We want a basis on which elected people from the Province can again have a real say in its administration. [Interruption.] I heard the groan from my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery), but history is not encouraging. That is an easy and obvious point to make. If my right hon. Friend were plugged into the debate that is taking place in Northern Ireland he would know that recent events have concentrated people's minds in a different way on the best way forward.

In the debate on the Anglo-Irish agreement I recall the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) saying that if he had known that he would have to face the Anglo-Irish agreement he would have considered seriously sitting down with the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) to see whether they could reach agreement, as residents representing constituencies in Northern Ireland. Many such remarks have encouraged me to believe that more and more people realise the importance of making a real effort this time to find agreement.

We now need to start talking, not necessarily in a great formal gathering or in an official meeting. We must start the process of understanding better each other's point of view. Sooner or later there must be talks, and the sooner the better. I may have the wrong impression, but I think that at last people in the Province appreciate that I am prepared to listen to constructive arguments, that my door is genuinely open and that, as somebody who believes both in the value of Northern Ireland remaining part of the United Kingdom and in the clear rights of the majority in that respect, as well as in the rights of the minority to equal and fair treatment in the Province as part of the United Kingdom, my concern is to see the present log jam broken and a new start made. Nobody who cares about Northern Ireland can want the present sterile and pointless campaign to continue because its main casualty is the good name of Northern Ireland and the interests of all its people.

Sir John Farr: I was anxious that my right hon. Friend should give way. He is on a very important point and he has stressed how anxious he is to hear differing views. Can he tell the House what opinion he tapped, or what sources of information in Northern Ireland he approached, to enable him to come to the conclusive view that he has put, as representing the Government's view? No doubt it is the result of the local soundings that he has taken. Can he elaborate on that point because it is important that we should know from which sources he has been getting this advice?

Mr. King: I have talked to a wide range of people, some of whom might not wish to be identified because of the intimidation that undoubtedly exists in many quarters in Northern Ireland. Many brave people who care about the future of the Province wish to ensure that their views are known and that their best hopes are understood by the Government. I have talked also to Church leaders and to many others. I have sought to talk to as wide a range as I can of Unionists and Nationalists across the Province as a whole. It is against that background that I have formed my views.

I do not wish to be discourteous in not always giving way. This is the beginning of the debate and no doubt hon. Members will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be interested to hear their views. I am sorry that I did not give way earlier to my hon. Friend.

In finding the way forward there must be a start to talks. My pledge is that I am ready now to enter into talks in whatever form is convenient, without pre-conditions and, if desired, outside any involvement with the Anglo-Irish agreement. I make that offer now. There must be talks. They must start sooner or later, but in whatever form I set no pre-conditions on them. That must be the way to start. I hope that at last others can respond to see whether we can find a basis on which a happier future for the Province can be laid.

4.38 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): I begin by agreeing with the right hon. Gentleman that the Assembly in its recent phase was simply a channel for the abuse of public funds that would have been better spent in the interests of the people of Northern Ireland. Perhaps I go further than he does. Last week when I said that he was pronouncing the obsequies on the Assembly he took me to task. He said, as he reminded us today, that the proposal was merely to dissolve the Assembly, so that if at any future time it was required it could be brought out of store. So we are not pronouncing the obsequies; we are attending a farewell party.

If there comes a time when all the parties decide that they want to discuss the exercise of power in Northern Ireland by the people of Northern Ireland, I suspect that it may be better to provide a different instrument, if only to avoid casting a cloud over the proceedings by reminding them of former unhappy times — those through which we are now passing.

For the moment, another institution is laid to rest and, with it, the hopes which were once invested in it. It would be remiss of us to let this occasion pass without paying tribute to those who tried to make it work. Let us record a tribute to the Speaker of the Assembly, the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder), and his staff. It was not neglect on their part which led to the present circumstances. They tried, and they deserve better. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there remain as memorials to the Assembly some thoughtful, well-researched and locally based reports which, in better times, will serve as guides to policy. They demonstrate that politicians who disagree profoundly about many issues may find a basis for co-operation on the practical questions which affect the welfare of their constituents.

Where then is there left to go, bearing in mind that it would have been better if we were not starting from here? Let us begin with what we already have. The Government are inviting the House to renew the arrangements for the interim period. Whatever our respective preferred solutions, we are probably agreed that, for the moment, there is no alternative to continuing direct rule — certainly, some kind of direct rule and, as of now, the 1974 Act. Unhappily, we are also probably agreed that the only argument to be urged in its favour is that there is no agreement on an alternative.

No one who was asked to design a method of government for a free people would have come up with the first schedule to the Northern Ireland Act 1974. Decisions which are of vital concern to the people of Northern Ireland are taken by a Government—I do not mean just the present Government; any Government—in London who do not depend for their support on the electors of Northern Ireland, whose candidates have not sought election there, and who have little to gain from satisfying the electors and little to fear from their displeasure. It is the negation of representative government. I believe that we are all agreed on that.

If those inevitable dire consequences are magnified by the Government's business managers seeking to legislate for whole areas of activity by bringing on unamendable orders at impossible hours of the night, it is small wonder that the anxieties and hopes of the people of Northern Ireland are not reflected in the instruments which issue from the Westminster Parliament.

I am pleased that the right hon. Gentleman stated his willingness to discuss the problems of legislation in the House. The official Opposition are willing to participate in those discussions. Indeed, we have suggested them for a long time. We believe that they could do something to improve the decisions which, in Northern Ireland, vitally affect the quality of everyday life.

I believe that the time has come to hold those discussions. I hope that they will be attended by all the parties represented in the House. Any party could attend without renouncing its position on any other issue. Attendance would not entail any concession or treachery to any cherished opinion. It would not even entail a commitment to future discussions. If we found that we enjoyed the experience of talking together, it might become a habit, and that would be another option.

If any party declined to commit itself, even to the adventure of talks about parliamentary procedure, and chose to absent itself from those discussions, I do not believe that that should constitute a veto over their being held, nor on implementing any agreement to which they might lead. Abstentionism is the right of those who choose to practise it. It is not a denial of the rights of other people. That is something which could be done. It could begin now. I recognise that that is a limited proposal. If we are agreed about the need, for the moment, to make the best of direct rule, I believe that we are also agreed that that is only the first step in a long journey.

The problem about the way forward is not a shortage of ideas for constitutional innovations. The debate is not about constitutional devices. The issue is not whether one constitutional arrangement is better than another. People from two traditions have been brought, by history, into a position where they inhabit one territory. There is no geographical boundary line which could separate them. There is no re-partition which would leave the two peoples on opposite sides of the line. Their home is a home which they are compelled to share. The only question is whether they can live together in peace or whether they are condemned for ever to regard each other as enemies. That is not a constitutional question.

There is no shortage of constitutional devices by which two groups, inhabiting a single territory, can jointly take decisions on how to administer their affairs. Those making virtually any proposal in that context can point to an instance in the history and geography of mankind where it has already been tried and has worked. Whatever is lacking, it is not constitutional ingenuity. The question is not whether some different constitutional plant could grow and flourish. The question is, what is it about the soil which causes every plant to wither?

Like the Secretary of State, my visits to Northern Ireland are not always confined to the corridors of power. I go to places which would surprise you, Mr. Deputy Speaker — [Interruption.] I promise that I shall not elaborate. Sometimes I meet not just politicians and community leaders but those who would describe themselves as ordinary people. All the people I meet tell me that their greatest yearning is to live in peace. They do not want to have to look over their shoulders every time they go to an unfamiliar part of town. They do not want to have to bite their nails every time their children come home a few minutes late. Yet, collectively, they seem to be condemned to perpetual confrontation. If there is to be peace, it cannot be imposed by people from London or Dublin. It is a search which can be conducted only by the people of Northern Ireland. It cannot be achieved by asking who will win and who will lose. It will not represent anyone's ideal solution. Peace has a price, and it is a price to which everyone must contribute. Nothing is more idle than wanting to live in a peaceful world while we continue, individually, to be quarrelsome.

I believe that there are some ways in which this House can help in the quest for peace. There are ways in which the Republic can help. We could begin by asking whether it is possible to create a climate more conducive to consensus. What is the reason why, in Northern Ireland, one issue seems to drive all the other questions off the agenda—questions which most of us would see as more pressing? It is not that the questions which are the subject of political debate elsewhere do not arise in Northern Ireland. It is not that the economy is so flourishing that it does not require attention. It is not that the public services and the community amenities are operating so successfully that people are free to look for other things to argue about. The reverse is the case.

People who have been denied jobs, or whose jobs are so badly paid that they cannot give their families a decent life, may be tempted to look for scapegoats on which to vent their frustration. If there are not enough jobs to go round, they see their neighbours as rivals. It is harder to be generous on a falling market. I believe that we can demonstrate the advantages of co-operation in economic matters. That is why I call continually on the Secretary of State to tell us whether the Intergovernmental Conference is discussing those questions, and when he will be able to point to some results.

When the Anglo-Irish agreement was concluded, the Opposition said that it should be given a chance, because we believed that it could be the framework for discussion between the British Government and the Government of the Republic, that it could lead to action which would benefit all the people of Northern Ireland and would manifestly be seen to benefit them.

We do not believe that it is possible to argue that the Republic has no interest in what happens in Northern Ireland, and that what people do on one side of the border is of no concern to the other side. That is not true. It is not possible to argue that people who share a tradition have no legitimate interests in common with people of that tradition a few miles down the road. If people inhabiting the same island have nothing to say to one another but recrimination, everyone will suffer. If they seek actively to promote enmity between two parts of the island, they are bequeathing to their children a chilling legacy.

Of course, it takes two to agree. Of course, something depends on the Republic demonstrating that the fears expressed in such dramatic terms in certain quarters are illusory. It is not for me to tell the Republic how to conduct its affairs, but I have my views as to where its best interests will lie over the next few weeks.

What better vehicle could there be than the Anglo-Irish agreement for demonstrating how much the two parts of the island have in common? I confess that there was a moment when I allowed myself to hope that the two Governments would together find a way of saving the Northern Ireland gas industry. A great opportunity was missed. I was pleased that we were told in the joint statement by the Intergovernmental Conference earlier this week that those involved had discussed the importance of the main road between Belfast and Dublin and had agreed to explore the best way of improving the road link between Newry and Dundalk.

There is a need for public investment in roads and in infrastructure. Perhaps the public funds that have been saved by the dissolution which is taking place today could be devoted, in some measure at least, to that purpose. There are people eating out their hearts on the dole who could be working to meet the needs about which, apparently, the conference talked. They are people who live on the same island, whose needs are common needs. The enemies are want, squalor and idleness. All those people are fighting in that battle on the same side, as allies.

If, whenever we ask the Secretary of State what has been achieved by the agreement, he speaks only of security, that would be a mistake. [Interruption.] I see that he and his colleagues agree. It is not that security is not important but that, as we were reminded this week, by its very nature, one cannot tell people what has been decided or what has emerged from the discussion. If, within the measurable future, the Government cannot demonstrate some benefit to the people of Northern Ireland from the Anglo-Irish agreement, they will reap the worst of both worlds. They will have encountered the aggravation, the misrepresentation and all the imagined conspiracies and will not have reassured those who set their hopes on the agreement.

This is a short debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I know that a number of hon. Members hope to catch your eye so I shall make just two final points. One contribution which we who live outside Northern Ireland can make is to practise a self-denying ordinance. We can decide that, if we cannot impose peace, we at least will not do anything to increase the bitterness. If we cannot build bridges, we will not destroy them. If we cannot heal the wounds, we will not deepen them.

Critics of the Government have complained of the insensitivity of giving the Government of the Republic even a consultative role in Northern Ireland, because that might upset the susceptibilities of the Unionist people. I agree that the absence of consultation when that was done was less than sensitive. I hope that those same hon. Members will appreciate that a proposal for complete integration, treating Northern Ireland as though it were geographically situated between the Humber and the Wash, might offend the susceptibilities of the Nationalist people and even, I suspect, at least half the Unionist people.

The Secretary of State has spoken of the historical and cultural difficulties that might defeat an attempt to devise ways of integrating Northern Ireland into the administration of the United Kingdom. It has never been treated simply as part of the United Kingdom. For virtually all its existence its people have not actually sought that.

Assuming that it were feasible, that the people of Great Britain were to agree to the proposal and the House were totally persuaded, is it to be done only with the consent of the Nationalist people and the Unionist people, or would it be a solution which the people who live in Great Britain were seeking to impose on the people of Northern Ireland? Our debates may not always appear to be achieving a great deal. It would be tragic if they contributed to the divisions, bitterness and recriminations.

There is a message which could go out from the House, one on which we could perhaps all agree. Northern Ireland has had a bad press in Great Britain, especially in the past few months. Many people on this side of the water have lost patience with what has appeared as the intransigence of people in Northern Ireland—

Mr. Mallon: All the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Archer: The hon. Gentleman has asked a relevant question. I was deliberately trying not to be provocative. He knows what my answer would be to his question but, if he insists on an answer, it is that the Unionist people have had a bad press on this side of the water.

Mr. Mallon: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for clarifying the position. I was not encouraging him to make an anti-Unionist remark. I was trying to encourage him to ensure that he stated that all the people of the north of Ireland are not against agreement, peace or a constructive way forward. That must be clearly understood, especially in relation to the way in which other political parties in the north of Ireland are claiming the term "the people of Northern Ireland".

Mr. Archer: The hon. Gentleman is right. I accept all that he has said and, in another context, I might actually have put that argument. He will see in a moment why I put it in the way I did. The hon. Gentleman is right—the Unionist people of Northern Ireland have had a bad press.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): The leaders have had a bad press.

Mr. Archer: I have met Unionist people in Northern Ireland who thought that they were not well served by their spokesmen.

It is perhaps ironic that some of the very virtues in the character of the Unionist people have contributed to that image — their passionate commitment to what they believe, their refusal to take the easy way out and their loyalty to their traditions, but much is going on in Northern Ireland of which Northern Ireland can be proud. There are people whose passionate commitment is to building a peaceful community. There are people demonstrating the success of integrated education. There are people holding dialogues across the divide in situations which make greater demands on their courage than anything we say makes on ours.

It is easy for us to debate these issues. Those people are carrying on the debate where it might easily have been silenced. They receive little recognition or encouragement. I believe that they will find a larger place in the history books of the future than they find in the news media of today. They are dismissed as visionaries but, if we are short on anything in Northern Ireland, it is vision. I hope that the House will do all it can to encourage those who seek to keep that hope alive. One day it may be justified.

4.57 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): The Secretary of State has announced to the House in the form of the first of two orders which we are considering that there is to be no continuation in the foreseeable future of a Northern Ireland Assembly which was set up by the Northern Ireland Act 1982. That is a decision which came as a shock and even a surprise to hardly anyone in the Province. The extent to which it is accepted that that was a foregone conclusion might surprise even the right hon. Gentleman.

In the Stormont Chamber yesterday afternoon, the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) sitting opposite my right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) said across the Dispatch Boxes, "The right hon. Gentleman and I will never sit again in a Northern Ireland Assembly." It is not surprising that this conclusion in 1986 should be foregone when we remember that all the Unionist parties in Northern Ireland opposed the 1982 legislaton. The present Speaker of the Assembly was among those who voted with the rest of us against it. Those who were most intimately concerned with Northern Ireland warned and foresaw that the outcome of that endeavour would be frustration.

There were two reasons for that, which can usefully be kept distinct. The first was that that Act created an Assembly which was given neither power nor responsibility, but over which was dangled the bait that it might perhaps have instalments of both if it could discover the undiscoverable, achieve the unachievable and if it could devise a constitutional way in which those who were elected to serve opposite political objectives could maintain that they had achieved, were achieving, or were contributing to the achievement of that which they had represented to their respective electors.

There was an essential falsity and impracticability in the basis upon which the Northern Ireland Act 1982 was constructed. The Assembly was set an impossible task. It was not impossible because of ill will, but inherently impossible in the circumstances which existed then and which exist still.

Mr. Hume indicated assent.

Mr. Powell: I am glad to have the assent of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), who never concealed his view on this matter, however much he was mistakenly abused for stating it.

There was a deeper reason why the Act, over which a veil is now being drawn, was foredoomed to failure and that is—and I shall use a word which I will instantly qualify—the devolutionary context in which it was seen. I qualify that expression all the more because this afternoon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, in two vivid and remarkable passages in his speech, has taken the old, rather boring, antithesis between integration and devolution and given to both of them an interpretation which I believe is enlightening and useful. He has contrasted with the concept of integration the fact that British rights are available to British citizens under different forms of government, if we examine them, and under different parliamentary regimes in the different parts of the United Kingdom. Therefore, in a way he has liberated us from many of the more grotesque implications of a term which has been used more as a term of aggression than enlightenment in Northern Ireland debates. In referring to devolution—I shall return to this later—he referred to devolved administration in the Province, thus making one of the vital distinctions in this subject, the distinction between legislative and administrative devolution.

It is important to understand the background to the attachment to the aim of devolution which all

[Mr. Powell]

Governments have professed since 1969 — since 1972 when they destroyed one devolved administrative structure in order to attempt to replace it with another, right up to 1985 when they wrote that aspiration into the terms of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

We know the reasons why, at the beginning of the section of the story—that is, in 1919 when some of us would say that what was mistakenly called the Northern Ireland state was created — it was regarded by the Government of the day as impossible that those who had not voted themselves out of the United Kingdom at the 1918 election should remain an integral part of the United Kingdom. Since we are dealing with a period in which the records are open, there need be no dispute or debate about what the motivation was. There was one very clear and definite reason why the people of Northern Ireland were told that they would have to have home rule whether they liked it or not, the acceptance of which Sir James Craig described as the "ultimate sacrifice" which they were called upon to make.

I shall not trouble the House with many quotations, but I think that it is worth putting on record one or two from the Cabinet meetings of December 1919 when the form of the Government of Ireland Act 1920 was being decided by the Lloyd George coalition. The minutes of the Cabinet stated that "a united Ireland with a single parliament" was

"the ultimate aim of the Government's policy."

The Cabinet said that the Bill had to be

"a measure which paved the way for a single Irish parliament".

A week later the Cabinet said that the Bill should be framed bearing in mind that its "ultimate aim" should be the unity of Ireland.

From 1920, the insistence of the mother country upon home rule in that part of the United Kingdom was motivated by its determination that the interests and political purposes of the United Kingdom required that sooner or later, in some way or other, there should be an all-Ireland state. That is the framework and the background against which, quite inevitably and understandably, the profession of a determination to secure devolution in Northern Ireland was bound to be viewed in the Province.

Like its predecessors, this constitutional experiment has come to its predicted fate. As the House proceeds to approve the draft order, as I am sure it will, there is one practical point I should like to put to the Secretary of State. Very shortly we are going to put an end to the life of the Assembly. He did not announce the precise date and I appreciate that that may depend upon the convenience of the sovereign in relation to the holding of the necessary Privy Council. However, he can ensure that when the date is fixed it is such as to enable there to be courteous, reasonable and understanding treatment of those who, for a number of years, have given their services to this institution. There have been some unpleasant rumours of less than courteous and considerate treatment being intended.

Mr. Tom King indicated assent.

Mr. Powell: I am glad to have the Secretary of State's assent, and I am sure that he will see that that does not happen. I know that it could not possibly be his intention.

With that behind us, we ask, "What next?" Part of that debate is laid before the House in terms of the Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order, but the whole of the debate is not summed up within the confines of that order. Last week, in answering questions after his statement, the Secretary of State recognised candidly that there was a certain absurdity in a form of government in which, between the Secretary of State and his Department and district councils which were little more than parish councils, there was no administrative machinery with any democratic input from the people who were governed. The right hon. Gentleman is quite right and he is right in saying that there cannot be British rights for British citizens, in the connotation which he gave to that phrase unless there is in Northern Ireland, as there is in the rest of Great Britain, representative local government in the sense of representative administration. —[Interruption.] I am not such a pessimist as the hon. Member for Foyle.

Mr. Hume: I would advise the right hon. Gentleman that he has a very short memory. Those hon. Members who argued for integration and for giving power to local authorities in Northern Ireland on the same basis as on this island also have short memories. It is precisely because of serious abuse of those powers by local authorities in Northern Ireland that we find outselves in our present position. The parish councils to which the right hon. Gentleman referred have shown no sign that they have changed their attitudes in any way. I certainly would not want to be a member of the minority community in Northern Ireland in one of the council districts if they had substantial power over planning, housing, education or any other serious matter.

Mr. Powell: My experience and observation are not in line with that of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hume: I only live there.

Mr. Powell: Well, I have three district councils wholly or partly in my constituency. In one there is a large majority and in another a small majority which is anti-Unionist and in the third there is a Unionist majority. Within the scope of their administration those councils behave as effectively and their officials administer as effectively as in the corresponding bodies in Britain. I see no impracticability if the anxieties persist which the hon. Member for Foyle has expressed, in a Secretary of State for Northern Ireland being given powers of intervention and regulation which exceed those — though they are considerable and have recently been increased — which are held by central Government in Britain.

I make two suggestions to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the context of the glaring gap which he rightly identified. First, he should move gradually and not in bold leaps. We have a structure, to which the hon. Member for Foyle has not been entirely fair, on which it is possible to build, having due regard to the circumstances and to the past, which has been mentioned, and to the anxieties. If we do that we shall be encouraged to go further. If rolling devolution was a failure we might well find that rolling local government was a practical success.

In that context I ask the Secretary of State not to be dismissive—I know he did not intend to be—of what was said last week by his hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson). A great deal can be said for an outside mind or minds being brought to bear upon the structure of local government in Northern Ireland. After all, there is widespread respect for the architect of what we now in retrospect see to have been the ill-fated reorganisation, or destruction, of local government which occurred in the last year or two of the Stormont Administration. The Secretary of State could well derive assistance, in presentation and in substance, by seeking outside advice, clearly respectable and valued advice, upon the directions in which local government could be developed in the Province. That is one of the directions in which we must work.

Another direction in which we must work is more directly connected with the second order which is before the House. When a previous attempt at what lay behind the purposes of the Northern Ireland Act 1982 collapsed in 1974 it was natural – I make no complaint of the Government of the day for having done so – that the 1973 legislation – what I might call the Sunningdale power-sharing legislation – was put into cold storage for the time being. A system of administration, which, as the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said, no one would willingly invent or commend, was installed on a year's purchase while people reassembled their notions after the collapse at the beginning of 1974.

In 1986 neither the Secretary of State and the House nor the political parties in Northern Ireland seriously believe that in the foreseeable future there is the prospect of either the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973 or the Northern Ireland Act 1982 producing the basis of a devolved administration in the Province. Yet nevertheless, year after year, for fear of admitting what everyone knows and what everyone privately, and often publicly, admits, we continue to re-enact a system of government which is intolerable in a part of the United Kingdom and which is deeply resented by a large part of the people of Northern Ireland. It is resented not only by the Unionists, but they live in the part of the United Kingdom where the laws are made – this is the most sensitive impact of a Government upon the citizen – by the Secretary of State in a form which is neither satisfactorily debatable nor amendable.

We must find a way in which the making of the laws in Northern Ireland can be brought into an acceptable accord with the ways in which the laws are made for the rest of the United Kingdom. It may well be that the models of Wales and Scotland will be an example of the way in which the different circumstances in Northern Ireland, which the Secretary of State mentioned, can be taken into account. His analysis of that provided the agenda for considerable reflection, discussion and work upon that theme.

For the time being I do not dispute that, lacking foundation, or at any rate the foundation being cluttered by the legislative wreckage of 1973 and 1982, it is unavoidable that the Secretary of State should bring the order forward. I hope that it will be the last full year that the regime runs. I hope that in the following 12 months a way will be found, which will be honourable and acceptable to all in Northern Ireland, whereby the legislation which is imposed upon the citizens of Northern Ireland is enacted in a manner which is felt to be as fair and as democratic as the manner in which legislation is enacted for Wales, Scotland or the rest of Great Britain.

Both the contributions of the Secretary of State and of the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West have taken us further in this debate than we have yet been in the years since 1972—and, I am tempted to say, since 1969. To some extent, I have taken a leaf out of the book of the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West in putting considerable emphasis on getting things in the immediate future into a tolerable condition, so far as we can do so without incurring dangerous symbolic implications and impacts upon the more distant future.

In this debate we are essentially considering how we carry on and what work we shall do together in the next 12 months. There is material for that in the two speeches which we have heard from the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West and the Secretary of State this afternoon.

5.17 pm

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): For people who have experienced a debate such as this in the Chamber before, there must be a sense of deja vu. This must be the 12th or 13th year that this sort of debate has taken place.

Mr. Hume: The 14th.

Mr. Mallon: It is my first experience. For that reason I want to make three points.

First, I am sad that once again an initiative in Northern Irish terms has failed. I say that as one who opposed the setting up of the Assembly and its continuance and considered its ending with some satisfaction. I am sad because I witnessed the initiative and was part of it in 1974. I was also part of it in 1976, the period to which the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) also referred. I see the same initiative again in 1986. I ask myself essentially the same question as the right hon. Member for South Down asked himself from an entirely different perspective: is the approach to this problem the right approach or is it hanging on to an approach that has failed and may even continue to fail? That is the key question that must be at the back of all our minds at present.

I disagree fundamentally with the right hon. Member for South Down. He made a very pertinent and erudite speech but he missed a point, which is the one certainty in the entire position in Northern Ireland, which we ought never to miss. It is that if we could persuade every Nationalist living in the north of Ireland to leave or to go to the shores of Lough Neagh one morning and jump in, the problem would be over. The problem would then have redefined itself in terms which would allow for an accommodation, either within an integrated British sense or within an integrated Irish sense. On the other hand, if we could encourage all Unionists to go to the shores of Belfast Lough on a designated morning and jump in at the same time, the problem would again be over.

Neither of those two things will happen. Nationalists will not leave Northern Ireland, nor will Unionists. We are left with the one certainty that whatever way we try to grapple with the problem, from whatever dimension we approach it, we arrive at one constant point, and that is that we have two sets of people living in a small part of a small island who must accommodate each other within the smallness of their political lives or, if they will not live together, die apart. That is the reality which is not catered for by the theses which the right hon. Member for South Down has so eloquently postulated.

[Mr. Mallon]

Irrespective of one's theory and the dimension from which one looks, and irrespective of the ideological standpoint one begins at, that is the crunch reality and the one with which we must all deal, whether we favour, as I do, unequivocally, the creation of Irish unity, whether we favour integration or see devolution as perhaps a halfway stage to either, or perhaps as a way of partially washing our hands of the problem.

If that is the reality, we must not shirk it. From whatever ideological point we start, we are being irresponsible if we do not look at that reality and see how we can cope with it. People must ask themselves this question: if there was integration of the type advocated by the right hon. Member for South Down, and the various pieces of machinery whereby legislation could be vetted and judged here, would that of itself be a contribution towards allowing the two sections of people to live together in the way that they must?

That would take one thing from them — their own constructive element in building that part of their lives. We would be catering for a situation which, I must confess, I find to some extent condescending and humbuggish — that if we hand down to the people of the north of Ireland that which is properly examined here it would be satisfying to the people of Northern Ireland. Anybody who knows anything about both sections of the community there would know clearly that that would not satisfy them because it would remove from them the one great dynamic —the means to create their own future in a way that is uniquely Northern Irish. The Secretary of State has been giving his views on the north of Ireland in relation to this island, but the one thing that we can say with some certainty is that it is uniquely different.

Let me make a further point on using the council structure as the basis for an administrative structure in the north of Ireland. I have belonged to a district council since the creation of the present local government structure in 1973. It is not in the constituency of the right hon. Member for South Down. In those 14 years, not only have I not had access to power within that council—power to do things or to prevent things being done — I have not been successful once in 14 years in being elected to a sub-committee of that council. The work of sub-committees ranges from placing children's playgrounds on housing estates, collecting bins to sometimes assuming responsibility for burying the dead. That gives a fairly accurate assessment of how local government is still working in a very partial way.

Let there be no doubt about it. We are are not talking of parish councils. That is a folksy type of idiom and is inaccurate. I speak as a parish councillor. That terminology would be resisted in political terms by the political representatives of the Nationalist community because not only have we seen what happened in the past but we are seeing what is happening to this very day. Look at Craigavon, Armagh and Ballymena. Look all round the councils of the north of Ireland. Anybody who would even toy with the notion of making those the basis of an administrative structure would be very foolish indeed.

There is a spurious argument, which has been expressed many times, that the Assembly, the wind-up of which we are now discussing, should not be wound up because it gives a platform to those people who are using it. My party and its leader regarded the Assembly from the word go as something which could not succeed because, as the right hon. Member for South Down pointed out, it had not the power of decision. It could not decide on anything whatever. Again, he missed the basic point that that type of political condescension does not attract people in Northern Ireland. We said then it was a white elephant and it was. Subsequently, I said that not only was it a white elephant but it had become a rogue elephant as it charged its way into the telephone exchange and blasted itself out of existence. I could even stretch that analogy further and say that it became "Buzby babes" overnight as it put itself out of business.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Might the hon. Gentleman and his party consider going back into the Assembly if a fresh order created new elections to that Assembly, if the conditons were right?

Mr. Mallon: My party, as its leader has said consistently, is prepared to enter into discussions to reach agreement about what will take place in the north of Ireland and, having reached that agreement, then to go from a position of strength to the electorate to seek a mandate, and then to go into any Administration with the strength of that mandate behind us. In that way we could tackle problems which are almost insurmountable and which would require the weight of that mandate to enable them to be tackled. That is our position and will be our position.

There has been much discussion of the Anglo-Irish accord. I do not want to go into the details or workings of it, or even the non-workings of it, but it has done one thing which is crucial to the resolution of our problems —it has posed two choices. It has posed the question to Unionism and to sections within the Unionist community: "Can you live with the concept of equality and justice for all people in the north of Ireland?" Until that key question is answered positively, there will not be a proper solution. Devolution will fail in those circumstances, integration will fail in those circumstances, and every other approach will fail until, within the machinery set up by both Governments, the Unionist community at large can say that it can live with the principle of equality for all and with the principle of justice for all.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: The hon. Gentleman appears to have forgotten the warning that he gave at the beginning of his speech. The question is not simply whether we can live with equality and justice, but in what state we are to live in equality and justice with all the other members of that state.

Mr. Mallon: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman clearly the basis on which the community that I represent wishes to live within that state. There is only one basis and that is as equals under a proper system of justice—nothing else. If we have to continue to live within the north of Ireland, if the creation of Irish unity, which I want to see happen, will not happen, as I accept, next week, next year, or perhaps even the year after, I want to live as an equal with a proper system of justice. That is the challenge which has been thrown down to the Unionist community in Northern Ireland. It has not yet been answered and, until it is, none of the attempts being made will come to fruition.

If those twin aims of the Anglo-Irish accord are realised, if the British Government have the courage and the will to carry through the much needed changes that will realise those aims, and if the Irish Government also have the will to face the challenges of those twin aims of equality and justice, Northern Ireland as we know it will be changed. Unionism as we know it will become an anachronism. Nationalism, as it has always been defined, will become almost an anachronism as well. The political faces of both communities will be changed. The events of the next six months will prove whether that challenge can be met by the communities of Northern Ireland, the political parties in the United Kingdom, or the Government of the Republic.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that the Assembly is not dead. I suppose that it is in a coma. He reminded me of certain companies in California which advertise the facility for popping one's loved ones into a refrigerator and bringing them out again at a later date.

However, in this debate we are burying not the Assembly but the policy which has been pursued by successive Secretaries of State since the abolition of Stormont. As I understand it, that policy rested on devolution based on power sharing and an Irish dimension. It has been pursued energetically, consistently and in an undeterred way by five Secretaries of State. I do not know whether they were the right men for that job. The political climate of Northern Ireland is very different from the Machiavellian gentility of the usual channels here, or from the passive broad acres of East Anglia. I do not know whether it was a good idea for three ex-Chief Whips and two East Anglian country gentlemen to do the job, but I am not sure that anybody could have done it, because there is a basic inconsistency in the formula of devolved power sharing and a foreign dimension. There are few examples of successful power sharing. The Lebanon was often cited as one of the best. I played some part in designing a power-sharing constitution for Cyprus. However, the ruins of both are apparent to all.

The introduction of the Irish dimension was bound to be fatal simply because it meant that the Irish Minister would be supporting the minority community, while the Secretary of State, as was his duty, had to take note of the interests of all of the Province. He could not be the supporter of the majority, and so the concept was an unequal one from the beginning. That policy has been tried and has failed miserably. Sunningdale failed because the Irish dimension was too much for the majority to swallow. The Assembly failed because the SDLP found that the Irish dimension was not enough, and Hillsborough has been too much for the majority.

It is time to recognise that this concept cannot work because it is strange to the Unionists, it is not conciliatory to the Nationalists, and, meanwhile, the IRA continues to go about its deadly business.

The Secretary of State said that he still stood by the policy because it is logical. Maybe it is, but Ireland is not known as the home of logic. The policy has clearly failed and the speeches that we have heard from distinguished right hon. and hon. Members representing the Province show that they are completely unreconciled to that basic concept. Nothing is more dangerous in politics than to be tied to the practice of what is obviously a dead policy. After 15 years we need a new approach, but for the moment it must continue to be direct rule.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State discussed the decision to suspend the Assembly, and talked about local government being at present no more than parish committees. Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State could follow the advice of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and move gently towards something else. Improved arrangements for the transaction of Northern Ireland business could perhaps be pursued here, in the Palace of Westminster. The block presented by the Hillsborough arrangements still remains and I urge my right hon. Friend to put it on the back burner, and to try to limit it for the time being to trans-border security.

The issues at stake are complex and I am sure that the Minister will understand my view that they are by no means limited to Northern Ireland. It is almost 100 years to the day since Joseph Chamberlain and Hartington broke up the Liberal Government in order to stop Gladstone's onward career towards home rule. They realised that such a course would lead to the break up of the kingdom. As a result of that remarkable Cabinet crisis, an alliance of the Liberal Unionists and Conservatives was formed. It stood the country in good stead in the years that followed. Hon. Members on this side of the House, in believing that their policies were right, and that the policies of the Opposition would have been disastrous, were often able to continue with their work, thanks to the support of the Unionist party.

It is not necessary to do much crystal gazing if one looks at the public opinion polls, but my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and her colleagues might need to have the support of the Northern Ireland Unionists, not just to carry out policies relating to Northern Ireland, but to carry out those policies relating to national security, defence and the economy which we believe are vital to the future of the United Kingdom. British statesmanship requires that we give the highest priority to ending the estrangement between our party and the Ulster Unionists.

5.37 pm

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Hon. Members are always glad to listen to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I had hoped that he would bring with him today his colleagues in the Ulster Unionist party. This is a new situation, and as such perhaps it could have been the occasion on which the Ulster Unionist party as a whole recognised that the Union must be defended in the Parliament of the Union.

Perhaps it is less surprising that those hon. Members are not present because this debate follows hard upon yet another meeting of the hated Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference. Dr. Garret FitzGerald is a humane statesman and must therefore share the concern of Her Majesty's Government at events in the Province since the Anglo-Irish agreement was concluded at Hillsborough. If Her Majesty's Government wish to resume contact with the Ulster Unionists, and if the Irish Government wish to contribute to a better relationship between the north and south, and between the Republic and the United Kingdom, dealings between the sovereign Governments of these islands should be conducted not within the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference but within the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council. The latter was there previously and could equally well perform the functions intended by the two Governments, including discussion of the Belfast to Dublin road to which the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) attaches importance.

The Secretary of State was looking forward to yet another Assembly. I do not, unless it is perhaps a regional council. The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West said that the Assembly was a waste of money, yet he voted for it while I did not. I have looked up the relevant information and it took 98 hours and 14 minutes of parliamentary time for the Northern Ireland Assembly Bill to become an Act. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) drew a telling comparison with the other Assemblies that were once proposed for other parts of the United Kingdom. He said that a referendum was required by the House before such Assemblies could become effective.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): My hon. Friend will no doubt remember better than I that at the time of the Sunningdale agreement the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland made a clear statement that nothing would be undertaken without the clear approval of the majority of the inhabitants of Northern Ireland. What happened to that democratic commitment in the context of the Anglo-Irish agreement 13 years later?

Sir John Biggs-Davison: No doubt a reply to that question will come from the Treasury Bench before the debate is concluded.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State courteously gave way to me when I intervened about the work of scrutiny carried out by the Assembly. My right hon. Friend said that it was far better for that task to be carried out in Northern Ireland because more local people could then be involved. But if that is so, the same argument must apply to Scottish and Welsh legislation. However, I do not think that my right hon. Friend wants to set up Assemblies in Wales or Scotland.

When I was taught the principles of war, I was told never to reinforce failure. However, the Government seem to have reversed that maxim in relation to their Northern Ireland policy. The devolved government that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State still seeks cannot be achieved in a form that is acceptable across the community, or to the House. When will the Northern Ireland Office understand that no term can be put to terrorism, and that Northern Ireland can never settle down, when will it understand that Unionist Ulster cannot be brought to applaud and assist the development of the "unique relationship" with the Irish Republic without fear of betrayal, when Ministers and mandarins continue to deceive themselves and impose their short-lived experiments and—as the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West said—constitutional devices?

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State apologised for the renewal of what we call direct rule. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) made stringent criticisms of the way that it operates. But public opinion polls show that direct rule is the second choice of most people in Northern Ireland. Perhaps a general agreement on second best is better than no agreement at all. Moreover, direct rule made democratic through local government equals integration.

We have always honoured Airey Neave in this House. But perhaps it would be better to honour him by considering the policy that he put forward than by merely paying tribute to him in words. I shall not be found guilty of the bad taste of citing any Conservative and Unionist party manifesto in this connection, but I should like to quote just a few of Airey Neave's words. They were prescient, because they anticipated the new Ireland forum and what followed it. He was addressing Conservatives in Maldon, Essex, in May 1978, and he said:

> "Recent attempts to seduce the whole community of Ulster into a Federal Ireland, and similar unpractical dreams, are doomed . . . We believe nonetheless that both sections of the community would benefit from restoring to Ulster an upper tier of local government".

We have heard all the arguments about the undesirability of enlarging local government in Northern Ireland. The Catholic dustbins of Lisburn have entered into the mythology of nationalist grievance. But we expect Ministers, especially powerful Ministers such as the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, to bash bigotry, just as we expect Ministers in other Departments to act against political discrimination and local government mismanagement — of which there is plenty in some of Great Britain's big cities. But we know why the Government will not enlarge local government: the SDLP does not want it. Incidentally, there is no SDLP Member in the Chamber.

We are told that we must get rid of the Unionist veto on progress in Northern Ireland. But there seems to be more of a Nationalist veto than a Unionist veto. Why does the SDLP object to enlarging local government? Plenty of SDLP councillors would welcome an enlargement of their functions. Many of them are doing a good job for their people and for the community as a whole, and would like to do more. Indeed, I pay tribute to many Nationalist-dominated authorities which have treated Unionists in a spirit of co-operation. But the SDLP objects, because integration — to use the short word — arrests any slide into the south. I accept that the SDLP wants devolved government, but on its terms.

Northern Nationalism is a legitimate opinion to hold, which we should respect. I certainly do. That Nationalist opinion could be allowed expression through further border polls or, preferably, by the question put in the plebiscite of 1972 being added to ballot papers in elections in Northern Ireland, so that there can be continuing consultation with the people of Northern Ireland. If the SDLP or any other Nationalist party could convert their countrymen in the Province to a united Ireland, we would not stand in the way of that.

There are many Irish Nationalists in cities on this side of the water, and they have learnt to live as a respected part of the British family. They are a minority in Great Britain, but a larger minority in Northern Ireland. What is so distressing about every futile political initiative is that its message is, "There you are. You are separate communities. Stay in the ghettoes." Every political initiative, including the Anglo-Irish agreement, has institutionalised the sectarian divide. Many Catholics want the Union. However, at elections they are almost compelled to choose between parties whose aspect is tribal.

We must establish equal rights, equal citizenship, and full administrative devolution under the sovereignty and protection of Parliament. It follows — I think that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are on common ground here — that the people of Northern Ireland should exert their proper influence at the centre of power, here at Westminster, through the party system of the United Kingdom, and through political parties or alliances that correspond with those in Great Britain. That is the way forward, and no one has shown me any other.

5.49 pm

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) has made an attractive case but, as he will anticipate, I shall not go down his road. As a supporter of the initiative taken by the Secretary of State's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior), I am saddened by the demise of the Assembly. However, it was right that that decision was taken.

There is no doubt that after its inception the Assembly did some useful work. I have many of the documents still on my book shelves which show that the Assembly carried out useful work on social security and agriculture in Northern Ireland. I also take the opportunity to pay my respect to the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder) who, as Speaker, fulfilled his role in the Assembly with some distinction.

In recent months the magnificent facilities at Stormont have been abused. The Alliance withdrew and Stormont became a venue for weekly attacks on the Government at a not inconsiderable cost to United Kingdom taxpayers. It will now go down in history as yet another lost opportunity. However, the only realistic way forward for the Province must be through a devolved administration with the respective parties acting in partnership and possessing sufficient powers to make and implement important decisions. The siren voices — we have heard them already today and there will be more — calling from the Government Back Benches for total integration may satisfy a few hard liners but will do nothing to reduce tension. Furthermore, they will do nothing in the long run to help revitalise the economy of Northern Ireland. I know that that view is shared by many Unionists.

Northern Ireland is not unique in that respect. In my view, the restructuring of the whole of the economy of the United Kingdom is almost entirely dependent on the return of meaningful power and decision making to the regions, cities and counties of our country. I attended a meeting at lunchtime today with the development commission, which carries out great work in rural areas. The commission is not responsible to any elected authority. I wish that that similarity could be more widely understood in the Province. I recognise the role played by the Local Enterprise Development Unit and the Northern Ireland Development Board among others, but I believe that they should both be responsible to an elected authority.

Once again, the British Government must go back to the drawing board. Unless some willingness to make concessions and to co-operate is forthcoming from the various party leaders, no new initiative is likely, and Ulster will be the poorer for that. It is surely not beyond the wit of the leaders of society, and especially politicians, to get together and agree on a structure that gives both communities a fair share of responsibility in the daily running of the Province. Failure to make such concession can only mean continuing violence and death and leaves the local population with no hope for the future. What is more, 53·5 million people living in the rest of Britain will eventually and inevitably seriously question why they should continue to fund such a high proportion of the Northern Ireland budget when local leaders refuse even to sit down and talk to each other or to Her Majesty's Ministers.

We want to know how much longer we must wait before the political leaders in Northern Ireland put the future well- being of their country first. That is the future not only of Northern Ireland but of Great Britain, too. When will they accept the challenge to establish a power-sharing Administration which will, coincidentally, immediately lessen the influence of the Anglo-Irish Conference?

Watching the Harland and Wolff workers marching with their banners this week must make those being laid off in our shipyards in the north-east and elsewhere ask why they should continue to support that yard. I have enormous respect for John Parker and his work force. Moreover, the yard is probably the best fitted out in Europe and I only wish that it was refitting the QE2, but I also sometimes wonder why I should continue to back that yard from the alliance Benches. Apart from a few well publicised incidents, when things have gone seriously wrong — obviously Bloody Sunday was one — successive British Ministers have, since 1969, tried their level best to correct the mistakes of the past. On the whole, I believe that we have succeeded and deserve credit, not eternal criticism, for so doing. We just do not deserve the abuse that continues to pour forth from the lips of some of those who purport to be political leaders and, incidentally, Christians.

Housing provision has improved beyond recognition in the nine years that I have been visiting Northern Ireland. Londonderry has a new city centre which won an award last week. There is a new £23 million bridge nearby. Large new bungalows and substantial modern houses occupy attractive sites on farms over a wide area of the Province. Even in Belfast, many excellent homes have been built and renovated. Two weeks ago I visited two firms which have climbed out of receivership with the aid of the Northern Ireland Development Board—Tyrone Glass and Belleek China.

Such success might be hard to believe when listening to Northern Ireland politicians. They continue ad nauseam to abuse those in authority. One even had the gall to try the Prime Minister for treason in the centre of Belfast and sentenced her to the electric chair. A new generation has grown up in that atmosphere, soured by the appalling actions of the Provisional IRA and INLA and the weekly propaganda from both sides. What was it that so soured Patrick Magee, now serving a life sentence, that he chose to try to blow to smithereens the leaders of the country where he grew up? How did he come to hate us to such an extent when he spent much of his youth in the pleasant city of Norwich? I suggest that when he returned to Belfast he became infected with all the sentiment, bigotry and propaganda that still prevail instead of being able to recognise the desperate need for changed attitudes.

The stupidity of Anglo-Irish relations is that, whether we like it or not, we are all widely inter-related. Many second generation Irish sit in this House and even the Lord Chancellor has referred to his Irish antecedents recently. Irish men and women serve in the House and many of us have Irish ancestry in our blood. I have three Irish grandchildren myself. That is what makes the call "Brits out" so stupid. The message that I believe should go out to the Province from this House is, firstly, that the Anglo-Irish agreement is here to stay, and it will not be watered down. Secondly, despite our equable temperament in this land, the time may be approaching when we may feel constrained to say "Work together or go it alone."

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Now tell us about Polaris.

Mr. Ross: That is the type of comment that I would expect from the right hon. Gentleman.

Finally, I would like to pay a special tribute to the RUC. Despite all that it has suffered, I found on my recent visit that morale was high and its determination to see the summer through was evident, despite the likely provocation. Mr. Wright has a serious point when he calls for local politicians to put their act together and stop leaving the RUC to pick up the pieces and do all the dirty work. Mr. Wright echoes my sentiments entirely. I wish the RUC and the Chief Constable well in the tasks that lie ahead. They hold a tremendous responsibility this summer. If they succeed, as I believe that they will, there is just a chance that saner counsels will prevail. In the meantime, I wish that all citizens in Northern Ireland and those outside the Province would sit down, read and inwardly digest the words of the Northern Ireland accord.

5.58 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I had hoped that the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland this afternoon would have shown that there had been some narrowing of the gulf that I believe exists between the six Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office and the majority of the people in Northern Ireland. It is with deep regret that I have to say that I believe that my right hon. Friend's speech gave no sign of a greater understanding by those who sit on the Treasury Bench of the true feeling of the people of Northern Ireland.

In answer to an intervention, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that his justification for the failure to have a referendum in Northern Ireland along the lines of the referendums held in Scotland and Wales was that, whereas the Scotland Act 1978 and the Wales Act 1978 proposed that Scotland and Wales should be governed differently from the way that they had been governed previously, the Anglo-Irish agreement meant that there was no change in the way that Northern Ireland was governed.

I have to say to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that neither the Government of the Irish Republic nor the overwhelming majority of the people of Northern Ireland agree with him when he says that there has been no change in the way in which Northern Ireland is governed. My right hon. Friend affirms, as he is entitled to do, his earlier argument that no analogy is perfect, but I put this analogy to him. If the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany were to lay claim to the French département of Lorraine, and if there were an agreement between the Government of the French Republic and the Government of the German Federal Republic that henceforth the Government of Germany would be able to put forward views and proposals in regard to Lorraine, and that the French Government would reach agreement on the proposals put forward by Germany for the government of Lorraine, does my right hon. Friend really believe that, in those circumstances, the people of Lorraine would say, "We are governed in the same way under the new arrangement as we were in the past."?

Mr. Tom King: My hon. Friend made the interesting comment that, effectively, there was a change in government, and that that was the view of the significant majority, and also of the Irish Government. Will he give me the quotation to which he referred, in which the Irish Government state that there is now a change of the system of government in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Gow: Yes, the Prime Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Irish Republic are both on record as having said in the Dail and elsewhere that the system of government in Northern Ireland was different after 15 November from the system before then. I shall happily give my right hon. Friend exact quotations from both the Irish Prime Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs. Indeed, one of the tragedies of the Anglo-Irish agreement is that there has been a different interpretation upon the agreement by my right hon. Friend and by Ministers in the Irish Government.

It is not only the assertion by my right hon. Friend that there has been no change in the system of Government for Northern Ireland — a view that is not shared by the overwhelming majority of the people of Northern Ireland — which reveals the gulf between the Treasury Bench and the people of Northern Ireland. I was much concerned when my right hon. Friend said that he was prepared to enter into discussions — I think that he genuinely meant this — with anybody in Northern Ireland without preconditions. But this afternoon my right hon. Friend spelt out one precondition that was most unwelcome to some of my hon. Friends, as it was to me. That precondition was that the Government have excluded, without further discussions, the possibility of what my right hon. Friend described as "total integration." Those words have never fallen from my lips. I have never used the words "total integration".

It was noticeable that, in the most recent two questions that I asked my right hon. Friend, he answered a question that I had not asked. For the sake of accuracy, I have the Official Report here. On 5 June, I asked:

"is my right hon. Friend aware that there is a growing body of opinion in the Province which believes that the best way forward now is through integration, which would offer proper safeguards for the minority in Northern Ireland?"

My right hon. Friend replied, not to the question that I had put to him:

"some concept of total integration would raise difficult issues."—[Official Report, 5 June 1986; Vol. 98, c. 1073.]

I did not use the words "total integration". They were the words of my right hon. Friend. A week later, on 12 June, I put this question to my right hon. Friend:

"Would he acknowledge that, even if that"— that is, devolution—

"is the preferred solution of the Government today, he will not exclude from his consideration the fact that we should govern Northern Ireland in the way in which we govern other parts of this kingdom?"

My right hon. Friend replied:

"Obviously we would seek to govern Northern Ireland as fairly, equally and impartially as we seek to govern every part of the United Kingdom. However, to suggest that that involves total harmonisation of every structure of government flies in the face of experience and practice of the present situation."

[Official Report, 12 June 1986; Vol. 99, c.508.]

When I remind my right hon. Friend of the two questions that I asked, one on 5 June and the other on 12 June, I think that he will confirm that I have never suggested "total integration" and that I have never suggested what he described as "total harmonisation". I have never put forward such a suggestion. I want to spell out, in language that all of us can understand, what I mean by integration, or the alternative description of the same thing—administrative devolution. I should like my right hon. Friend to pay particular attention to what I say, as I know he will, because I want to give way to him at the end of this part of my speech.

I want to ask my right hon. Friend whether he is excluding from his consideration and from discussions with the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland, and from discussions with others, the possible solution that I am about to describe. That which I am about to describe is nothing new to my right hon. Friend. He was a member of the shadow Cabinet when the 1979 general election manifesto was being drafted. I have to assume that he aquiesced in, if he did not actually support, that which appeared in the manifesto:

"In the absence of devolved government, we will seek to establish one or more elected regional councils".

That is an exact quotation. Of course, the policy that was set out in that manifesto was abandoned following the assassination of our late right hon. Friend, the then Member for Abingdon, Airey Neave. My right hon. Friend is unwise to exclude from his consideration the very policy that was advocated by a person for whom everybody in the House had, and for whose memory all have, the greatest respect, yet it is precisely that which my right hon. Friend seems to be doing.

What do I mean by integration? Again, I quote from what my right hon. Friend said on 12 June, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne):

"At present very little lies between Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office and councils, most of which sadly are not meeting, and which have little more power than parish councils."

[Official Report, 12 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 510.]

Let us start at the bottom. I would give to the 26 district councils, which my right hon. Friend is right to say have little more power than parish councils, modest additional powers. That is my first suggestion.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Which powers?

Mr. Gow: I said "modest additional powers".

Ms. Short: Which powers?

Mr. Gow: We have been asked not to make too long a speech. I said "modest additional powers" for the 26 district councils, which my right hon. Friend rightly described on 12 June as having powers that at present are analogous to those of parish councils. So I say "modest additional powers".

That is my first suggestion. My second proposal is that there should be a regional council similar to a regional council in Scotland and analogous to a county council in England. The powers of such a regional or county council would not need to be identical to the powers of a regional council in Scotland or a county council in England.

My third suggestion is that legislation for Northern Ireland should be dealt with in this place and another place in the same way as we now deal with legislation for Scotland and for Wales.

Ms. Clare Short: It is different for Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Gow: Absolutely. That is why my right hon. Friend's use of the words "total harmonisation" is inappropriate, because we deal with Scotland and Wales differently.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): My hon. Friend speaks about the methods of legislation in Northern Ireland as compared with Wales and Scotland, but does he bear in mind the fact that we sometimes legislate by primary legislation through public statute, and sometimes by way of Grand Committee, sometimes on the Floor of the House and sometimes in Committee? Can my hon. Friend be more precise about the sort of analogy that he would like to pursue between the way in which we legislate in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales?

Mr. Stephen Ross rose

Mr. Gow: I give way to the spokesman for the Liberal party.

Mr. Ross: What form of electoral system would the hon. Gentleman use to elect the county councils?

Mr. Gow: I shall deal with that straight away. It is not surprising that the solitary representative of the Liberal party, unaccompanied by his colleagues from the alliance, refers to his passion for proportional representation. It is to our deep regret that the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) is not seeking election next time. He will not be surprised to hear that I am strongly opposed to the system of proportional representation, whether in England, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland. I belong to that school of thought which believes in majority rule under just law.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), and I believe it is timely to remind my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench that we deal with Scottish legislation differently from English and Welsh legislation. For example, the separate Housing (Amendment) (Scotland) Act 1981 conferred the right to buy on Scottish people which had material differences from the Housing Act 1980 which was passed through the House by my predecessor.

Is my right hon. Friend excluding from his consideration the possibility of giving modest additional powers to the 26 district councils? Is he excluding from his consideration the specific policy concerning regional and county councils, on which he and I fought and won the 1979 general election? Is he excluding the possibility of getting rid of legislation by Order in Council for Northern Ireland? If my right hon. Friend is excluding that possibility, because, as Secretary of State, he does not think it is the best way to govern the Province, and if he is excluding from his consideration the wishes of the people of Northern Ireland, that is a very grievous statement.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: My hon. Friend is aware that I agree with many of the ideas that he has put forward, but he has not dealt with one critical matter. Is he proposing, given the special circumstances in Northern Ireland, that a regional county council-type authority should also be a police authority? I fear that it could not be.

Mr. Gow: No, Sir, that is not my suggestion. It would be no part of my proposal—if my suggestions were followed—that the regional or county councils for the Province should also be the police authorities for the Province.

[Mr. Gow]

I should be deeply concerned if my right hon. Friend were to exclude, as he certainly appears to do, the possibility of integration regardless of what might be the wishes of the people of Northern Ireland. I have reason for concern. When the Anglo-Irish agreement was being fashioned, I have to assume that my right hon. Friend did care about the wishes of the minority but that he was careless—I use that word in its correct meaning—of the views of the majority. It may be that, when my right hon. Friend and some of his colleagues advised the Cabinet to enter into the Anglo-Irish agreement, he said to himself and perhaps to his colleagues, "Well, we may have a bit of trouble from some of the wilder elements in Northern Ireland but the majority of the Unionist people will acquiesce in this agreement." That may have been the view of my right hon. Friend.

In my opinion, the depth and strength of feeling in Northern Ireland on 19 June 1986 against the Anglo-Irish agreement is just as strong and deep as it was on 15 November 1985. I do not think my right hon. Friend has made any progress in persuading the people of Northern Ireland of something which I know he believes to be true — that the Anglo-Irish agreement will achieve peace, stability and reconciliation. I do not believe my right hon. Friend has been successful.

What concerned me at that time and what continues to concern me is that the Government believed that the Anglo-Irish agreement would be moderately acceptable to the majority. I have to assume that my right hon. Friend was surprised by the reaction in the Province. We know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was surprised because, in an article which appeared in the Belfast Telegraph on 17 December 1985, as a result of an interview with Desmond McCartan, she said:

"the reaction has been much worse than I expected. One is trying to find out why."

What is my right hon. Friend's answer? Will he say that, regardless of the growing opinion which, I believe, exists in the Province in favour of what I have described as integration — not absolute harmonisation nor total integration — it could equally be described as administrative devolution — the Government know best? Will the Government impose upon the people of Northern Ireland some kind of devolution or impose upon them the present system of direct rule regardless of their wishes?

I said that I wished to give way to my right hon. Friend so that I could ask him whether he was excluding from his consideration the kind of integration that I have described. Perhaps my right hon. Friend would be kind enough to tell the House his answer to that question.

Mr. Tom King: I have listened with interest to the points that my hon. Friend has made. The conclusions which he tried to draw at the end are in total conflict with what I have just said to the House.

I wrote down his words when he said that we would be seeking to impose some new solution—some devolution proposal on the people of the Province. He will accept precisely what I have said, which is that, so far from wishing to impose a decision on devolution, arrived at separately, we wished to enter into discussions to see whether it was possible to achieve a starting point.

My hon. Friend referred to my comments concerning total integration. I have made it clear that that was not a possibility, but my hon. Friend has said that that is not what he has proposed. He said that he has never advocated total harmonisation—that is another possibility which I made clear I did not think was practicable. I have said that we are prepared to consider the possible ways in which the handling of legislation on other matters could be looked at in this House. I included a caveat about the route to integration which I believe—my hon. Friend draws his conclusions and I draw mine—would not be practical. The Government would not propose that; nor, I believe, would the House approve it.

These are important matters and my hon. Friend has made a serious speech about them. It has become clear that it is dangerous to get into the world of slogans. There are slogans about devolution and integration, and everyone assumes that they know what the other individual means. I sought to spell out the areas which I thought were unrealistic and the areas in which the Government wished to proceed.

Mr. Gow: I hope that my right hon. Friend now understands what I mean by integration, which I sometimes call administrative devolution.

This is an important debate. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will not exclude from their consideration of the options for Northern Ireland that option which in my judgment would provide both the surest safeguards and protection for constitutional Nationalists in Northern Ireland and the greatest reassurance for constitutional Unionists.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Four years ago last Monday when my right hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon) and I represented the Labour Front Bench on Northern Ireland we said that a Labour Government would not have introduced the Northern Ireland Bill to set up the Assembly. We did not think that it was particularly workable, but we regarded it as a fair and honest attempt to do something about the problems of Northern Ireland. We specified that we did not think its chances of success were good. Four years later the Secretary of State has tabled an order to bring the Assembly to an end. It may be that much has happened in those four years, and I recognise that the Assembly lasted a little longer than I anticipated.

The Assembly has faced considerable difficulties and some of its achievements have also been considerable. Both my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) and I gave evidence to its Committees to assist the Assembly in its work. It is important to consider why we seek to wind up the Assembly, and in doing so we come back to the central problem for the Government, which is stating their position on Northern Ireland.

As I have said on many occasions, both when I spoke on Northern Ireland and since I have moved to my Home Office brief, the problem is that everybody in Ireland, both in the north and the south, knows exactly what they want for the future of the border, but that successive British Governments have not known what they want. We now have a further difference in that the British-Irish agreement, as I prefer to call it, makes it more clear than previously that the British Government are happy to work towards a united Ireland and the Unionists know that.

Although I understand the politics that say that we must not talk about certain matters because it makes difficult circumstances worse—I believe that that sort of politics rarely works—they are almost guaranteed to fail in this case because all the Unionists—the Democratic Unionists, the Official Unionists and all the other groups—know from the words and actions of the Government and the Labour party that the trend is towards a united Ireland. That is what makes the Unionist position so difficult.

If Unionist Members come to the House and participate, they will undermine their position. If they stay away, as they are at present doing except for the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), they will also undermine their position. That is why the Unionist parties are tempted to take to the streets and to attack the agreement. There they find the great unifier of hatred and fear of a united Ireland.

Yet that hatred and fear is more concentrated in certain parts of the Unionist parties than it is in Northern Ireland as a whole, and I believe that in recent years that hatred and fear has become less. Ordinary Unionists in the streets of Northern Ireland will now say, "If it is going to be a united Ireland, why don't we get it over and done with quickly?" They have said to me, "Since you have explained to us about human rights and joint citizenship, I suppose there are worse things." When one asks what they mean by worse things, they say, "We can't go on as we are, can we?" There is growing recognition in Northern Ireland that the island of Ireland is being treated as one political, economic and social entity, and that at the end of that road is a nation state. That is what we are moving towards and that is what the Unionists fear and are angry about.

Today there has already been talk of the family of the nation. That frequently occurs in politics generally, but perhaps more than ever in relation to the politics of Northern Ireland. The family in this context is taken to be that of the United Kingdom — England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The Secretary of State got into a little difficulty, which he got out of well, when he referred to the political parties not organising in Northern Ireland. He got into some difficulty about whether the link was cultural, political or whatever. The truth is that there is a great deal of cultural overlap, not only between England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, but between the United Kingdom and southern Ireland. That has always been true, but for historical reasons, which are long and complex and which none of us would perhaps ever agree on entirely, there is a fundamentally different political system in Northern Ireland, and Ireland has been divided.

Let us examine further what we mean by a family of nations. As the Secretary of State rightly noted, there is something profoundly odd and different about the position of Northern Ireland in this family of the United Kingdom. Nothing makes that difference more clear than the insistence of the peoples of Northern Ireland, above all the Unionists, to insert in Acts and statutes over many years that Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom so long as it wishes to remain so.

If we pursue the analogy of the family a little further and envisage walking into our family home at night to find that one member of the family has put a notice on his door saying, "I am a member of the family too, unless I choose to go", the meaning becomes clear. It means that that member feels uncertain of his position in the family. That is why I have always said that when Unionist parties insist on that phrase being used, they undermine and embellish the weakness of their political position. That is why the family argument is so profoundly dangerous to them. It is an argument, not about families but about political power and identity and the economic problems that stem from that.

We need to begin a discussion about how we move toward a united Ireland. Let us consider how the position has changed in recent years. In 1979 when I first entered the House I did not get involved in the politics of Northern Ireland until the end of that year, and about a year later I moved to the Front Bench. Between 1980 and 1981 it was frequently said to me inside and outside the House that whenever I talked about the unity of Ireland I was encouraging terrorism. Nobody says that now. That argument has gone. Indeed, in Committee on the Northern Ireland Bill, when the right hon. Member for South Down said that terrorism fed on hope, I said that it did not, but that it fed on despair. Whether we consider the terrorism in Northern Ireland or the terrorism which I fear we are about to see in southern Africa, it is clear that terrorism is founded on despair of the political system. It has often been said that the political system of any country, for all its warts, is the alternative to war. That is how we settle our disputes. Terrorism has done immense damage to the body politic of this country and to the body politic of Ireland. It has ripped apart not just the lives of people but political democracy and the economic hopes of people on both sides of the Irish sea.

The collapse of the Assembly is an example of what I meant in the past when I referred to there being no positive power in Northern Ireland. The problem for both the Republicans and the Unionists in Northern Ireland is that their powers are negative. They can prevent things from happening but they can rarely initiate anything.

It was a little paternalistic of the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) to accuse the Unionists and the Republicans of being unable to talk together. One group wants to take away the national identity of the other. The Unionist wants to take away the national identity of the Republican, and vice versa. As the right hon. Member for South Down pointed out, if the SDP and the Liberal party cannot agree on Polaris, why on earth should we expect the two groups in Northern Ireland suddenly and relatively easily to sit down and discuss together their future, which brings into question their national identity and, to some extent, their religious identity? Religion, or nationalism tainted by religion, is a profoundly powerful force. It is far stronger than social or economic class. I say that with regret, as a Socialist. Religion has a profound effect upon the political system and upon people's lives.

There is a way forward. It is the same as it has always been. The way forward is to open up discussions with Dublin. If it is true that in Northern Ireland there is only negative power, equally it is true that positive power lies in London and Dublin acting together. What has stood out very clearly during the six years that I have been interested and involved in the politics of Northern Ireland is that it is crying out for leadership. What stands out now in Northern Ireland is splintering of the political parties, both Republicans and Unionists. The splintering of the political entity of a state—or semi-state, as Northern Ireland has been in some ways—is an indication of a lack of leadership towards a common goal.

I have said before that we think of the various parties and groups in Northern Ireland as being strongly united. They are not. They only appear to be strongly united. Even in the paramilitary groups, the image of unity is far less strong than we believe it to be. If we consider the number of Republicans who have been killed by the paramilitary groups on the Republican side and the number of Unionists who have been killed by the paramilitary groups on the Unionist side, we find that in each case the number is greater than those who have been killed by the security forces. Imagine how strange it would seem if I said to the House that during the second world war the British armed forces killed more British people than were killed by the Axis forces. It would be nonsense. The internal splintering tells us so much about what has happened to politics in Northern Ireland. They are being ripped apart and they will continue to be ripped apart until London and Dublin provide strong leadership.

One of the reasons for my qualified welcome of the British-Irish agreement was precisely because it started out on that road. It is an important road. I regret that the Government were not more open about it. Instead they fed paranoia. Paranoia abounds in Northern Ireland. People fear being sold out.

The Secretary of State rightly referred to the comments of the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) who, at the time, expressed his concern about the agreement. I remember that the hon. Member for Upper Bann also said, when the agreement was announced, that if he had known that this was at the end of the road he would never have led his people to believe that the British Government would not betray them. Those were not his exact words, but they are very near to being his exact words. He was saying that the Unionists now know that the British will sell them out.

I do not like the word "sell-out". I remember that over and over again the Unionists said that they believed that they had cemented their place in the union. Why did they refer to the role of Northern Ireland during the first and second world wars? Why did they refer to the blood of men in the Northern Ireland regiments that had been shed during the first world war in the battle of the Somme? It was because they believed that they had cemented for themselves a place in the heart of their mistress. Alas, 50, 60 or 70 years later their mistress is doing exactly what she did then. She is saying, "All right, up to a point, but keep your distance. We will never, ever treat you as a normal part of the United Kingdom because you are not a normal part of the United Kingdom." That is why the Unionists feel so deeply betrayed.

However, people can change their political identity, and fit into new structures and new institutions. This House has the ability to bring that about, but only if the question is discussed openly. One of the reasons for my sadness about politics in this day and age is that people believe that we should not discuss difficult questions because they lead to arguments and fights. However, it is essential that we should discuss difficult questions. What everybody recognises as a difficult and unanswered question will not go away. It will stay there, and will continue to nag at us and aggravate us.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said that in many areas the economic, political and social systems of the north and the south could be integrated. He was quite right. I have mentioned many of them in the past. I have referred in particular to agriculture, because a large part of the economy of both the north and the south is founded on agriculture. The potential for the integration of food processing, biotechnology and education is very great. Colleges and universities in the north have spare capacity, whereas the south is looking for student places. There are so many areas in which integration could be expanded and built upon. In doing so, we should bring the people of the north together with the south. We should also increase and improve the link between Britain and Northern Ireland. That link is being forced further apart by the divisions within Northern Ireland. British failure to resolve our position in Northern Ireland has led to strains between Britain and Northern Ireland, although they are two nations which ought to be, and which historically have been, very close. That link must be rebuilt.

Finally, we must look at the position in which we now find ourselves by our failure to address the Northern Ireland problem since the division of Ireland in the early part of the century. More than 2,000 people have been killed and thousands have been injured. The lives of their families have been ripped apart. The economy of Ireland, in particular Northern Ireland, is under-developed at best and in tatters at worst.
